The English Ministers, and their agents, were not equally successful in some Courts of Germany. Mr. Thomas Harley, a near relation of the Lord Treasurer, who, about the beginning of this year, had been appointed to go to Hanover with a secret commission, having staid some months in Holland, to watch the progress of the Negotiations at Utrecht and the Hague, set out, at last, about the beginning of July for Germany. On the 12th of that month, N. S. he arrived at Hanover, accompanied by Mr. St. John, brother to the Lord Bolingbroke, and some other young English Gentlemen, who were all entertained at the Elector's expence. Three days after, Mr. Harley, who from the station of coadjutor to the Secretary of the Treasury, was now raised to the character of Ambassador Extraordinary, had a public audience of the Elector, and afterwards of the Princess Sophia, Electress Dowager, and of the Electoral Prince and Princess, by whom he was received with distinguishing marks of favour, as one so nearly related to the Prime Minister of Great-Britain. The design of this Embassy was to persuade the Elector to come into the British measures, which Mr. Harley pressed strongly, and, amongst other arguments, told him, 'That the contrary would do him an injury in the minds of the people, who were set upon peace.' But the Elector remained firm in the sentiments, which he formerly expressed in the Memorial presented about a year before by Baron Boibmar, and answered Mr. Harley to this effect: 'I do not put myself upon the foot of one pretending immediately to the Throne of Great-Britain. The Queen is a young woman, and, I hope, will live a great many years. When she dies, my mother is before me. Whenever it pleases God to call me to that station, I hope to act as becomes me, for the advantage of the people. In the mean time, speak to me, as to a German Prince, and a Prince of the Empire. As such, I must tell you, I cannot depart from what I take to be the true interest of the Empire and the Dutch.' Mr. Harley, having continued above two months at Hanover, set out from thence to return to Great-Britain.

Endeavours were likewise used about this time to bring the King of Prussia into pacific measures, with no better success than at the Court of Hanover. But, notwithstanding these and other disappointments, the British Ministers pursued their scheme with steadiness and resolution; which being chiefly founded on King Philip's renunciation of the Crown of France, the Lord

New scheme of peace proposed by the Dutch. Though the public Negotiation at Utrecht was, for some months, at a stand, upon account of the dispute between Mefnager and Rechteren; yet some private steps were made in the mean while for bringing the war to a conclusion: For on the 9th of October, N. S. the Ministers of the States declared to those of Great-Britain, 'That, for the good of peace, the States were willing to yield Lisle to France, and recede from their pretensions to have Doway, Valenciennes, and Maubeuge, which they had hitherto insisted upon; provided Condé and Tournay were included in the Barrier, the Tariffs of 1664 restored, and that Sicily be yielded to the Emperor, and Straßburg to the Empire.' This proposal was immediately transmitted to the Court of Great-Britain, where it was looked upon as more reasonable than any of the former schemes. On the other hand, the Imperial Ministers finding the States inclined to yield up Spain and the West-Indies to King Philip, to which they knew their Master was unwilling to consent, Count Zinzendorf proposed a plan, according to which the Emperor, and the States of the Empire should furnish four millions of crowns, which were supposed to be sufficient to put their forces in a condition to act offensively, and to maintain most of the Auxiliaries lately in the British pay. But, it having been found by long experience, that there was no great dependance to be made on such promises, some of the Princes, to whom those troops belonged, resolved to recall them upon various pretences.

The Earl of Strafford comes to England. On the 4th of October, one of the Queen's Messengers arrived at Utrecht with dispatches for her Ministers; and after a Conference with those of the States, the Earl of Strafford, the next morning, set out for England, and on the 13th arrived at Whitehall.

Various conjectures about it. The Earl's sudden departure from Holland occasioned various conjectures both at home and abroad. The general opinion was, that he was sent for to give the Queen and her Ministers a verbal account of the disposition, in which he left the Dutch as to peace and war, and to receive the Queen's instructions in relation to their late scheme. But those, who observed what passed at Court, ascribed his coming over to a misunderstanding, which, about this time, appeared to be among the Queen's servants. It is evident (from the Lord-Treasurer's account of public affairs, sent to the Queen in August 1714) that there had been several misunderstandings between him and the Lord Bolingbroke. He observes particularly, that, when it was found necessary to create some new Peers in the Session of Parliament in 1711, so many having been brought formerly out of the House of Commons of those who used to manage public affairs, it was proposed to Mr. Secretary St. John, that, if he would be contented to stay in the House of Commons that Session, the Queen would create him a Peer, and he should not lose his rank: Accordingly, after the Session was ended, the Queen ordered a warrant for him to be a Viscount; which put him into the utmost rage against the Lord-Treasurer and Lady Masbam. It availed but little to tell him, how much he had got in place; for, had he been created with the other Lords, it would have fallen to his share to have come next after Lord Trevor. But the Treasurer, with great patience, bore all that storm, of which Lady Masbam was often a witness; and Mr. Arthur Moore, a considerable time after, told the Treasurer, that Lord Bolingbroke said to him, he owed him a revenge upon that head. This discontent continued, till there happened an opportunity of sending him to France, of which there was, says the Treasurer, not much occasion; but it was hoped, this would put him in good humour; which it did, till, in October 1712, there were Knights of the Garter made; which occasioned a new resentment from Lord Bolingbroke, which frequently broke out in outrageous expressions publicly against all then made; who were the Dukes of Beaufort, Hamilton, and Kent; the Earl Paulet, and the Earls of Oxford and Strafford. The Duke of Hamilton made a private application to the Queen, desiring, he might be permitted to wear both the Garter and the order of the Thistle; but was answered, the same was unprecedented; and that the Duke of Argyle had laid down the Thistle, upon his being made Knight of the Garter.

Octob. 21 The Lord Lexington, who was appointed to King Philip to go to Spain, to preside the renunciation of King Philip to the Crown of France, having embarked at Portsmouth on the 15th of September, arrived, on the 7th, at Madrid, where he was received with great marks of honour and distinction. Before his arrival, upon information, that Sir — Burke resided there, as Minister of the King of England, whose arms he had set up before his House; the Lord Lexington complained of it to the Court, and demanded, that he should depart from Madrid, which he was immediately ordered to do. The Lord Lexington had then several Conferences with King Philip's Ministers about that Prince's renunciation; which being drawn up in form, and agreed to, his Majesty signed it on the 5th of November, N. S. and swore upon the Holy Evangelists, to observe it, in presence of the Council of State, and of the chief Nobility. The Cortez, or States of Spain, having been summoned to meet at Madrid, in order to enact this renunciation into a law, King Philip, attended by the President of Castile, and Council of State, went to that assembly, and told them, 'That the efforts, which the Nation made with so much zeal and fidelity, to secure his Crown in two perilous occasions, were of such a nature, as never to be forgot. And to shew his gratitude, to procure peace for his people, and to be never separated from them, he renounced all pretensions, which either himself, or his issue, might have to the Crown of France; and desired them to give their consent to it.' Upon this the Cortez confirmed and approved the renunciation, and the Crown of Spain, after King Philip's posterity, was limited to the House of Savoy. The Queen, and Prince of Asturias, and the Lord Lexington, were present at the whole solemnity. But it is to be observed, that his Lordship did not yet take upon him any character; and that some time before King Philip sent orders to the Marquis de Monteleone, who was then at Paris, to repair to the Court of Great-Britain.

The like renunciation was made some months after, by the Princes of France to the Crown of Spain: And King Philip was declared incapable of succeeding to the Crown of France. It was something strange, to see so much weight laid on these renunciations, since the King of France had so often, and so solemnly declared (upon his claiming, in the right of his Queen, the Spanish Netherlands; when the renunciation made by his Queen before the marriage, pursuant to the treaty of the Pyrenees, of all rights of Succession to her Father's Dominions, was objected to him) that no renunciation, which was but a civil act, could destroy the rights of blood, founded on the laws of nature: But this was now forgot, or very little considered.

The Spaniards invade Portugal.

N. S.

While these things were transacting, endeavours were used to bring the Crown of Portugal into the present measures of peace; and, lest persuasion should fail, it was thought proper to use more forcible arguments. The Marquis de Bay who commanded King Philip's forces in Effremadura, marched with his army, and incamped within half a league of Elvas. To increase the jealousy, which by this march he had given the Portuguese, as if he designed to besiege that place, he went to take a nearer view of it, and then returned to his camp. On the other hand, the Portuguese, deceived by these appearances, worked hard in repairing the fortifications of Elvas, and conveyed into it two battalions, drawn out of Campo-Major; which being the town the Marquis de Bay had a design upon, he marched with the whole army, and invested that place. This irruption of the Spaniards, to the number of near twenty thousand men, at a juncture, when Great Britain (the main support of Portugal for many years past) had reduced all her forces in that country, except two regiments, could not but make the Court of Portugal very uneasy. Their consternation was very much increased, upon the news, that the Spaniards had invested Campo-Major, the most regular fortification on the frontiers of Portugal; but which, at that time, was not provided either with a sufficient garrison, or with ammunition and provisions for a long siege. However, on this occasion, the Portuguese exerted themselves with vigour and resolution, which was in great measure owing to the conduct of Major-General Hogan, an Irish Gentleman, and of Brigadier Maffey, an experienced French Protestant Engineer, who formed, in conjunction with the Count de Ribeira, and several other Officers of note, the design of getting into Campo-Major, which was executed with very good success at the head of two or three hundred Portuguese Grenadiers, a day or two after the enemy had opened the trenches. Hogan having also got into the town with a supply of four or five hundred men, the Count de Ribeira, who commanded there in chief, made the necessary dispositions to defend the place to the last extremity, and was so well seconded by the officers and troops under him, that he obliged the Marquis de Bay to raise the siege. Notwithstanding this success, the expedition of the Spaniards had the effect desired by the Court of France and Great-Britain. For, the Portuguese finding they were like to be left by England, if they continued the war against Spain, the Count de Tarouca, the Portuguese Minister at Utrecht, was prevailed upon by the Bishop of Bristol to come into the Queen's measures, and sign the suspension of arms the 7th of November. He excused this proceeding to the Ministers of the Allies as a pure effect of necessity,

Thus ended the war in Portugal. As to the army in Spain, the latter end of September, Brigadier Price, who commanded the English, received a letter by a Trumpeter of the enemy, from Mr. Secretary St. John, with orders from the Queen to leave immediately the army of Count Staremberg, and march to the sea-side near Barcelona, and there to wait the arrival of Sir John Jennings, who was to transport them to Port-Mabon. This surprizing news (says the Author of the manuscript account) caused a great consternation among our Confederates, and very much enraged the Catalans, who found, they were going to be forsaken by those they had most reason to trust. To prevent the effects of their resentment, and our being molested upon our march by the Miquelets and other country people, the Queen of Spain sent four persons of distinction to be as safe-guards to us, and to take care we should be supplied with provisions. We came to Barcelona and incamped by the sea-side, on the very spot of ground where King Charles landed with the troops, when he besieged and took that City. Here we continued some time before Sir John Jennings arrived. With him came over Colonel Kane, with a Commission to break Lepel's regiment, that they might sell their horses, and to see the men on board, with the regiments of foot, and the train of artillery; which orders were executed in a very short time, and we were all carried to Port-Mabon.

The Duke of Hamilton (who had been made Master of the Ordnance, vacant by the death of Earl Rivers) was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary to the Court of France. The choice of the Duke for that embassy gave melancholy speculations to those who thought him much in the Pretender's interest, and knew, that he was considered, not only in Scotland, but likewise in England, as the head of his party. On the other hand the King of France named the Duke d'Aumont, first Gentleman of his bed-chamber to go into England with the same character of Ambassador Extraordinary; which was likewise agreeable to the Pretender's friends, to whose interest he was openly attached.

All this while the Duke of Ormond continued in his quarters in Ghent, where one of the Field-Deputies came to him the 7th of September, N. S. being sent by his colleagues, to sound him upon several points. He asked first, Whether the English troops were to stay at Ghent and Bruges the winter, or how long? To which the Duke answered, He could not tell, but saw no appearance of their being withdrawn as yet. He asked next, Whether the Duke would consent to the States putting some of their troops into Ghent, to take care of their convoys, and escort them to their frontier garrisons? The Duke said, He thought himself obliged not to suffer any troops, but those of the Queen, to continue in the town. However he had no intention, by taking or keeping possession of that place, to obstruct their convoys; and that the Dutch troops might still come to the counterscarp of the town, and receive whatever was to be carried to the camp, as had been practised ever since Ghent was in our hands. The Deputy's next question was, Whether the Duke would let part of the Dutch troops take their winter quarters in Bruges, as they had done ever since the reduction of that place? The Duke answered, He could

1712. could not admit of any troops whatever, besides those of the Queen, either into Ghent, or Bruges, till he had her Majesty's orders. The Lord Bolingbroke highly applauded the Duke's conduct on this occasion, and told him in a letter, 'That the Queen had received so much ill usage with respect to the commerce of her subjects in the Netherlands, and had so much reason to expect more of the same kind, that she was resolved to treat upon that head with those pawns in her hand.' But, upon recollection, the Lord Bolingbroke, in a second letter, acquainted the Duke, 'That the positive order, contained in his first, was not sent to prevent the admission of other troops besides her Majesty's, into Ghent and Bruges. That the Queen was enough satisfied, that his Grace would take effectual care to preserve those cautionary places, which could alone secure to her any tolerable conditions, with respect to the Netherlands, in the terms of peace, but he confessed he thought, it could be no way unnecessary to give his Grace a very positive and clear order, in an affair, which might perhaps make a great deal of noise.' The Duke not only punctually obey'd the orders which he received from England, but was also very forward in assisting the Queen's new Friends, the French, even at the expence of her old Allies. For being informed of a design, which the Dutch, from the late success of their enterprize upon Fort Knocque, had been encouraged to form, for surprizing Newport or Furnes; and that the fortifying Dismuyde was made use of as a pretence for drawing together a body of troops sufficient to put the design in execution, the Duke knew not, but the Queen might think it for her service, that the design should not succeed, since if the Dutch were not suffered to take possession of those garrisons, the Queen would not only have a greater influence towards settling the commerce of the Netherlands on a good foot, but would be able to secure, what was of the highest consequence at that time, a free communication between her troops, which were in Ghent, Bruges, or Dunkirk. He therefore, in a letter of October the 21st, acquainted the Secretary with this affair, and left his Lordship to judge of the importance of it, and the use that was to be made of it. But, if the Queen thought it most for her service to prevent it, he was humbly of opinion, some means should be found out to give advice of it to the Marshal de Villars, who might possibly think, we owed him that good office, in requital of some informations, his Lordship knew had been sent by the Marshal, with a design to serve her Majesty and the Nation.' The Queen was of the same opinion concerning the use to be made of the intelligence mentioned in this letter; but, the campaign being by this time at an end, the Duke asked and readily obtained leave to return to England; and, having taken a view of Dunkirk, embarked there, landed at Dover the first of November, arrived in London

the next day, and on the fourth waited on the Queen at Windsor, where he met with a most gracious reception (1).

The same day being the Anniversary of the birth of King William III., great rejoicings were made in the Cities of London and Westminster, by the well-affected to the Revolution, and the Protestant Succession. Among the rest, a considerable number of Lords, Gentlemen, and Citizens, being met at the Three Tuns and Rummer in Grace-Church-Street, to celebrate that festival, caused a great bonfire to be made before the house. The High-Church party, being offended at this, raised an opposite mob, who offering to disturb the rejoicing round the bonfire, a scuffle ensued, in which the aggressors were repulsed; but the Trained-bands being that day under arms, the fray was soon appeased, and all was quiet, till the bonfire was consumed, and the company in the tavern retired. However, this rejoicing was by the Tories represented as a set design to disturb the Government, particularly in the Post-Boy. But what was more ridiculous, a report was spread of a strange conspiracy against the Lord-Treasurer, by sending him that very day, 'a band-box, with three pistols charged and cocked, whose triggers being tied to a packthread fastened to the cover, the pistols would have gone off, and done execution, at the opening of the box, had not the same been miraculously prevented by Dr. Jonathan Swift, who being then in the room, whilst his Lordship was having, suspected something, and opened the box in such a manner, that no mischief was done.' This was the first story, that was whispered about; but the belief of such an extravagant plot was soon exploded; when it was found that the three pistols were no more than a steel set on a pistol-stock to strike fire, and two inkhorns or squibs; so that the lucky discoverer, Dr. Swift, was by many suspected to have been the ingenious contriver of this political machine.

Another accident happened about this time, Duke Hamilton and Lord Mobun had created a great animosity between these two Noblemen; so that, on the 13th of November, at a meeting at Mr. Orlebar's, a Master in Chancery's Chambers in the Rolls, the Duke having reflected on Mr. Whiteworth, (father of Lord Whiteworth, late Ambassador to the Czar) who was examined as a witness on the Lord Mobun's side, saying, 'He had neither truth nor justice in him; the Lord Mobun thought himself obliged to vindicate that Gentleman, which he did, by saying, 'He had as much as his Grace.' The Duke having made no reply, all seemed to end amicably; for they both continued in the same place above half an hour, and, at parting, the Duke, going out first,

(1) Burnet says, our army continued this winter about Ghent and Bruges; and we kept a sort of garrison in Dunkirk. But that was so ill supplied with artillery and ammunition, that it was visible they were not in a condition to keep the place, any longer than the French were willing to let them stay in it. And, during that time, they were neither allowed to have a place to worship God, nor to bury their dead in, tho' by a mortality that raged there some thousands died. Burnet, II. 615.

1712. first, made a low bow to the Lord Mobun, who, in like manner, returned his civility; so that none of the persons there present, suspected any consequence from what had passed. But, the next day, General Maccartney went twice to the Duke of Hamilton's house, with a challenge to him from the Lord Mobun; and, in the evening, the Duke, accompanied by Colonel John Hamilton, went to meet General Maccartney at the Rose-Tavern, and was a few minutes in private with him; whilst the Lord Mobun and the Colonel were in separate rooms, Mr. Maccartney went several times between the Duke and Lord Mobun; from which and other circumstances, his enemies took occasion to give out, that he had rather inflamed, than endeavoured to compose the quarrel. But all that can be fairly conjectured is, that the time and place of the duel was there fixed and agreed on. The Lord Mobun and General Maccartney lay that night at the Bagnio in Long-Acre; and on Sunday the 15th of November about seven o'clock in the morning went in a hackney-coach to the lodge in Hyde-Park, where being soon after met by the Duke of Hamilton, and his Second Colonel Hamilton, they all leaped over a ditch, into a place called the Nursery. Lord Mobun went not have had the Seconds engage; but the Duke insisted that Mr. Maccartney should have a share in the dance; from whence the General's enemies strengthened their suggestion, that he had been the instigator of the duel. All having drawn, the two Principals made such violent and desperate passes at each other, being rather intent to give than to parry thrusts, that they soon fell down, both mortally wounded; so that the Lord Mobun died on the spot; and the Duke, as his servants were carrying him to his coach (1). The two Seconds did not fight at all, as one of the witnesses deposed, or fought with such caution, that Colonel Hamilton received only a small wound in his instep, which, he said, happened by his own sword, as he was parrying down a full pass, that Maccartney made at him (2).

The Earl of Godolphin died of the stone, on the 15th of September, this year. He had served in considerable employments under four Princes of very different tempers and designs. Opposite opinions have been delivered of his merit and character. Great abilities and integrity have been ascribed to him by some; while others have freely censured him for notorious defects in the latter, and allowed him to have been great by the chance of place and distinction. The Treasurer's staff was attended with the ill-will and aversion of the Tories; for his rival, the Earl of Rocheester, by his turbulent zeal, had gained the highest place in their favour. As he had commonly acted in opposition to the Whigs, they likewise entertained great fears and jealousies of him. His whole Ministry was embarrassed with both these circumstances; and even prudence, good temper, and success could not secure him a general good will and confidence. However, the objections, which have been made to him, will, when every thing is duly weighed, be silenced, or perhaps turned to his advantage. He had concurred with the worst of King Charles II's Ministers, and adhered to the last to King James. In these two Reigns he gave no opposition; but the same active and passive obedience was not practised by him under King William. This was ascribed to his retaining principles, very inconsistent with an intire approbation of his Government; to which has been added a passionate admiration of and attachment to King James's Queen. The higher esteem therefore seems due to his memory, when we review his conduct in the fulness

(1) Burnet, on this occasion, says: I will add no character of him: I am sorry I cannot say so much good of him as I could wish, and I had too much kindness for him, to say any evil without necessity. Nor shall I make any reflections on the deplorable effect of those unchristian and barbarous maxims, which have prevailed so universally, that there is little hope left of seeing them rooted out of the minds of men; the false notions of honour and courage being too strong to be weighed down by prudent or religious considerations. Burnet II. 612.

Nov. 20.

(2) The High Church men and the Jacobites were so sensibly touched with the loss of one of their principal Champions, that they charged this unfortunate duel on the whole Whig-party; suggesting, 'That, having tried all other methods in vain, they returned to their expedient of Murder, and employed treachery and violence at once. That their General [the Duke of Marborough] set the example of party duels, which was only to give them a sanction; and deputed that infamous messenger of his challenge to be the general bully of the faction. That the present Lord Treasurer had almost miraculously escaped their last engine of assassination [meaning the band-box.] That the brave, Maccartney, who depended for his support on the Lord Mobun, was forced to keep up his patron's courage with wine, till within a very few hours of their meeting in the field: And that the mortal wound, which the Duke received, after his adversary was run through the heart, could not be given by any but Maccartney.' This last accusation being like to lay an indelible odium on the Whigs, great industry, and indeed all indirect means were used to propagate the belief of it. In order to that, Colonel Hamilton deposed before the Privy-Council, 'That, seeing Lord Mobun fall, and the Duke upon him, he ran to the Duke's assistance; and that he might with the more ease help him, he flung down both their swords; and, as he was raising the Duke up, he saw Maccartney make a pass at his Grace.' Upon which an advertisement was published by the Government, for the discovery of Lieutenant General Maccartney, suggesting that it had appeared upon oath, that the wound, wherewith the Duke died, was given him by Maccartney. On the other hand, it was alleged, in vindication of the Whigs in general, and of General Maccartney in particular, 'That the Duke of Hamilton and the Lord Mobun pursued their private animosities, occasioned by the law-suit before-mentioned, which had been depending many years; which plainly appeared from the Duke's having often been forewarned to avoid the Lord Mobun's company. That the latter might probably have been inclined to decide the matter by the sword, upon an apprehension, either that the Duke would at last remove the cause to the House of Peers, where he might hope to supply by friends and interest what he wanted in justice and equity; or that, upon his return from his embassy in France, he might beg and obtain of the Crown, the late Earl of Macclesfield's estate, which was the prize contended for, upon a pretence, that the outlawry against that Earl was not reversed in due form.' As to the suggestion, 'That General Maccartney stabbed the Duke of Hamilton, the falsity of that horrid imputation sufficiently appeared, both from the several depositions taken at the Coroner's Inquest, and from the reports and declarations of two or three eminent Surgeons, who

1712. of his power: In this situation it will appear, how truly superior he became to all prejudices and prepossessions. His deliberations were constant and determined for our prosperity at home, and our success abroad. If his difficulties and disadvantages, particularly those with the Queen, were duly explained, his attention to the welfare of the Nation would be the subject of great admiration. The Union of the two Kingdoms was his work; and, though this transaction has been often condemned by great numbers of both parties, yet that does not lessen the merit of the performance. All changes and alterations, tho' conducted with the utmost honesty and skill must be attended with several inconveniences; and it is too common with mankind to insist only upon these, while they pass over in silence the most substantial advantages. By means of this Union, the Protestant Succession was secured; the influence of France on the affairs of Scotland was much weakened; many occasions of feuds and animosities were removed; and the benefits refusing to the whole Island were immediate and important, and likely to be perpetually increasing. Our accounts of the manner of carrying on this affair are not sufficiently full and exact; for which reason the great instrument of it cannot have his just praise. Alliances and the force of recommendations imposed upon him in some instances; but his great concern was to employ men of capacity and integrity; and such were sure of his kindest regards. This became the more remarkable, because another great man was not so skilful and cautious, or very unlucky. He had a true sense of the Nation's welfare, and of the proper methods of promoting it. Rude and insolent reproaches from a certain quarter, on the account of his former attachments and correspondencies, were clear proofs of his having renounced them. No person was more earnest and skilful in projects for annoying the enemy by attempts on France, Spain, Dunkirk, and the West-Indies; but many of them were defeated by winds and other accidents. Late and expensive experiments have convinced us of the difficulties and hazards of West-India expeditions; and such attempts became improper, when encouragement was given to send King Charles into Spain. Had we secured that Monarchy for the House of Austria, when it was in our power, we should have been intitled to advantages superior to any conquest. The piece upon the management of the war, and the four answers to the conduct of the Allies, have clearly proved, that there was no partiality to the Duke of Marlborough; but that every part of the war was attended to in the most proper manner; and we have there accounts given of the advantages of the Minister's Treaties and our Alliances with Savoy and Portugal. Our military co-operations with Portugal were embarrassed with many difficulties and inconveniences. But what must have been the case, had the French party prevailed there? No impressions could have been made on Spain; which would have been a great disadvantage to the common cause. Without their ports, our fleet must have been exposed to many dangers and distresses. The prodigious benefits of the commerce then opened are well known, but have not been sufficiently acknowledged. Those, who study detraction, observe how many circumstances concurred to his successful management of the Treasury. The security and safety of the Bank, punctual payments, and the ready command of money in the funds, had been experienced several years, and most effectually silenced popular objections. Many defective ways of raising the supply in King William's time had suggested proper methods of caution; but, above all, our great success abroad was the life and support of public credit. But might not our advantages in some degree be ascribed to the Treasurer's exact care in payments? By his attention to our trade and commerce, did not he lay the foundation for a due and full supply? When all the marks of prudence and regularity are attended with success, the chief conductor hath a fair claim to a large portion of merit. He is said to have preserved great appearances of wisdom by silence and reserve, which are particulars of behaviour supposed to be inconsistent with a great and generous mind. But this was not owing to any thing mean and unworthy; for in all consultations on business he discovered a surprizing greatness of courage, and a quick and most exact discernment. His kind, equal, and obliging temper endeared his memory to all, who had the pleasure and advantage of his conversation. His behaviour to the Queen was so faultless, that, when she was influenced to dismiss him, shame and concern would not allow her to admit him into her presence; and, therefore instead of permitting him to resign into her hands the Treasurer's Staff, a letter was sent to order him to break it. Unbecoming instances of behaviour may be produced in the lives of great men of all ages and all employments. Had this been duly considered, such severe reproaches had not been cast upon this Minister for his love of play and horse-races; by which indeed he became too much, and too frequently engaged with the most worthless who were unanimous, 'That the wound the Duke received in his right arm, and which was allowed on all hands to have been given by the Lord Mohun, was the immediate occasion of his Grace's death.' Colonel Hamilton foully prevaricated at his trial on account of this duel, and persisted in accusing General Maccartney. But his silence at the place where they fought, and where they both continued a considerable time, taking care of their respective Principals, raised an unanswerable objection to the Colonel's evidence, and fixed upon him an infamous character, either for charging a Murder on an innocent man, or for suffering the Murderer of the noble person, whose Second he was, to make his escape, when it was in his power to secure him. Under this just imputation Colonel Hamilton lived obscurely the remainder of his days, becoming so odious to all men of honour, that he was obliged to sell his company in the guards, and died October the 17th, 1716, of a sudden vomiting of blood, which could not be stopped. Strict search was made after Lieutenant-General Maccartney; and, besides the five hundred pounds promised by the Queen's proclamation, three hundred more were offered by the Duchess of Hamilton, as a reward to whomsoever should discover him. But Mr. Maccartney having, after the fatal duel, walked to Kensington, and thence to Chelsea, went from thence to the Duke of Richmond's house in the Priory-Garden, near Whitehall; lay there that night; and, early the next morning, crossed the Thames; and then, in a disguise, went over to Flanders.

1712. less of men, gamesters and jockies. But after all, when this objection is thoroughly examined, nothing will appear but a faulty choice of improper amusements; and there were no imputations upon him of any fraudulent practices, tho' such were then not unfamiliar to persons of his rank. Nor did his love for these diversions ever draw him off from the duties of his high station. Complaints have perhaps been too justly made against those, who have the chief power in disposing of places, that the merit of persons of low rank, though very significant, is seldom duly considered. And therefore instances of this kind should not be deemed the peculiar fault of this great man. His letter to the Queen just before his dismissal furnishes us with the fullest ideas of his worth and character; and time hath abundantly verified the representations, which he therein made with dignity and decency, a becoming warmth, and an honest freedom. Such a sense of affairs, and such expressions, could only proceed from a mind truly great and truly good.

The Duke of Marlborough returns to his country in 1712.

Upon his death the Duke of Marlborough resolved to go and live beyond sea. He went away in the end of November, and his Duchess followed him in the beginning of February following. This was variously censured; some pretended it was the giving up and abandoning the concerns of his country; and they represented it as the effect of fear, with too anxious a care to secure himself. Others were glad he was free out of ill hands; whereby, if the Nation should fall into the convulsions of a civil war, he would be able to assist the Elector of Hanover, as being so entirely beloved and confided in by all our military men; whereas, if he had staid in England, it was not to be doubted, but, upon the least shadow of suspicion, he would have been immediately secured; but now he would be at liberty, being beyond sea, to act as there might be occasion for it.

There were two suits begun against him: The one was for the two and a half per cent. which the foreign Princes were content should be deducted for contingencies, of which an account has been given. The other was for arrears due to the builders of Blenheim-House. The Queen had given orders for building it with great magnificence; all the bargains with the workmen were made in her name, and by authority from her; and in the preambles of the Acts of Parliament, which confirmed the grant of Wood- stock to him and his heirs, it is said the Queen built the house for him. Yet now, that the tradesmen were let run into an arrear of 30,000 l. the Queen refused to pay any more, and set them upon suing the Duke of Marlborough for it, though he had never contracted with any of them. Upon his going beyond sea, both those suits were staid, which gave occasion to people to imagine, that the Ministry, being disturbed to see so much public respect paid to a man, whom they had used so ill, had set these prosecutions on foot, only to render his stay in England uneasy to him.

The Duke set out for Dover the 24th of November; embarked on board the Norib-Britain packet-boat; and, on the 1st of December, landed at Ostend, under a triple discharge of all the cannon on the ramparts. At his landing, he was received by General Cadogan and Brigadier de Caris, Governor of the place, and conducted by a vast concourse of people to Captain Brown's, where he dined. He supped with the Governor; lay that night at the Burgomaster's; and, the next day, set out for Antwerp. He was received with extraordinary marks of respect in all the Dutch garrisons, particularly at Maastricht, from whence he repaired to Aix la Chapelle. But General Cadogan paid dear for the civilities he shewed the Duke, being soon after dismissed from all his employments.

Upon the death of Duke Hamilton, it was for some days uncertain, who should succeed him as Ambassador to the Court of France, the Lord Bolingbroke being very much against the Duke of Shrewsbury's being employed in that station; but, however, he was named by the Queen for that employment, and went over to France in the end of December. The same yacht, which carried him to Calais, brought over the Duke d'Aumont, the French Ambassador, who was a good-natured and generous man, of profuse expence, throwing handfuls of money out of his coach, as he went about the streets. He was not thought a man of business, and seemed to employ himself chiefly in maintaining the dignity of his character, and making himself acceptable to the Nation.

On the 20th of November, the Earl of Stratford was sent back to the Hague with the French plan, which came to be called the Queen's new plan of peace (1). The substance of this plan of peace is contained in the conclusion of what the Earl said to the States. Annals of Q. Anne.

(1) A Deputation being made to him on the 8th of December, N. S. (to whom were added the Penitentiary and the Register Fagel) the Earl of Stratford assured them, 'That he was never more pleased with being there than on this occasion, as wishing nothing more, than to see the antient friendship and good correspondence between her Majesty and that State revived; and flattering himself, that he was charged with orders and instructions, which tended to procure a good peace for all Europe, and the firm security of that State; so a solid and lasting friendship and correspondence might thereby be established between her Majesty and their High Mightinesses. That he could not forbear saying, he wished the love of war, and the private interests of some persons, had never given occasion for a colonels in that friendship, which might have proved, and still might prove fatal to that State, if the last offers now to be made on the part of her Majesty should not be accepted. That the reflecting on what had passed might serve to prevent inconveniences for the future, since the refusal to agree to the suspension of arms proposed by her Majesty might have brought ruin on that State, and had cost them so dear; and that there was reason to fear much greater evils, in case their High Mightinesses should now refuse to conclude the peace jointly with her Majesty. That the last proposition or overture about peace made by their High Mightinesses, contained one point, which was contrary to the engagements her Majesty had before entered into; namely, that Sicily should be given to the Duke of Savoy. That, as to some other points, insurmountable obstacles had now arisen, which might have been got over, had not so strong opposition been made to her Majesty's measures, and had not her Majesty been constrained to agree separately to a suspension of arms. That the irresolution of that State had been attended by very unhappy accidents; and therefore her Majesty was very desirous they would at length come to fix upon some propositions, reasonable in themselves, and of such a nature, that, in the un-

1712. said to the Deputies of the States and the Pensionary, 'Pressing for a speedy resolution, whether the States were willing or not to sign the peace jointly with her Majesty, immediately and without delay, for otherwise her Majesty would be obliged to sign her peace, without waiting for them to come into it any longer than a fortnight or three weeks at farthest. That her Majesty, assuring herself that the States would not delay to conclude the peace with her, would procure Tournay for them, which, with many other places, were not to be expected from France, if the Queen should sign her peace separately. That, as to the Empire, there would be no alteration in what is contained in the Queen's speech relating thereto, nor in any thing with respect to the Emperor, only that Sardinia should be given to the Elector of Bavaria, and that the Duke of Savoy should have Sicily. That her Majesty was very desirous to have the concurrence of the States in all that related to that Duke, as well as to the Elector of Bavaria, and to oblige the Emperor to consent to the neutrality of Italy, and to withdraw his troops from Catalonia. That she further desired, that the Plenipotentiaries of the States at Ulrecht might be furnished with full powers to conclude forthwith the new treaty of Barrier.' This new Barrier treaty, of which he delivered a copy to Register Fagel, and by which the former was to be set aside, was designed for drawing the States in the more. By it the States were to maintain the Succession to the Crown, when required by the Queen, but not otherwise. This gave still new occasion for jealousy. For,

whereas, by the former treaty, they were strictly bound to maintain the Succession, so that they were obliged to oppose any attempts they saw made against it, they were by this treaty obliged to stay till they were sent to: And, if our Ministers should come to entertain ill designs that way, they would take care no notice should be given to the States.

The new plan being communicated to the States of the respective provinces, the members of those assemblies were variously affected. The cession of Tournay, after the Treasurer and Secretary in England had put France upon insisting to have it restored, was a great bait to the Dutch; and the threat, that they would lose it, with several other places, if the Queen signed her peace separately, changed the minds of many of them, and inclined them to give a favourable ear to the Lord Strafford's proposals. That Lord went incognito to Amsterdam, where he had several successful Conferences with the leading Magistrates. Amsterdam has always great influence on the States of Holland, as the States of Holland have on the States-General, and the disposition of that city is generally a rule for the cities and provinces in the affairs of war and peace. But the States of Ulrecht (where the Bishop of Bristol was not idle in the absence of Lord Strafford) were the first that consented to the new plan for the Peace and the Barrier; and nine days after the States of Holland did the same; by which time the other provinces had transmitted their several opinions to the States-General on that subject. All of them were unanimous lucky conjuncture, wherein affairs now stood, they might be obtained of France. That her Majesty had given him permission to declare further, that he well knew, her Majesty was determined to insist upon and even to procure from France, the cession of Tournay, to strengthen the Barrier of that State with a place of so great importance; but that he knew likewise, that her Majesty's conduct in this matter would wholly depend upon that of the States: And that, after the making so considerable a step in their favour, it was expected, that on their part, they should forthwith concur with her Majesty in concluding the peace, without starting new objections, and without making other demands. And that as soon as that State should declare themselves in an authentic manner, so that her Majesty could depend upon it; then her Majesty would cause a declaration to be made in full Congress, that the article of the cession of Tournay should be one of the conditions of peace sine qua non. That he was likewise to inform their High Mightinesses, That the King of France had made very strong Instances for his Ally, the Elector of Bavaria; and that the least, which his most Christian Majesty pretended to ask for him, was, that the said Elector should continue in the possession of Lucemburg, Namur, and Charleroy; subject however to the terms of the Barrier for the States-General, till the said Elector were restored to the Electorate of Bavaria, (exclusive of the Upper Palatinate) and placed in the rank and dignity of ninth Elector. That the King of France would also propose, that the Kingdom of Sardinia be given to that Elector, for effacing, by the title of King, the disgrace and mortification of being degraded from the rank of first Elector: And that her Majesty judged, that this point might be granted; that so the possession of Tournay may be secured to the States, and a peace made, which will be sure and lasting. That he was also to represent to their High Mightinesses, in her Majesty's name, that her Majesty was desirous both to re-establish and to maintain an intire union between Her and that State; and hoped and assuredly believed that their High Mightinesses were of the same sentiments with her in this matter. That therefore, it was necessary, without any loss of time, to remove all, that that State might seem to have gained, either to the immediate prejudice, or to the future danger, of her Majesty's and her Kingdoms interest. That he had brought with him a plan of a new treaty of Succession and Barrier; and must insist, that it might be signed before the conclusion of the peace. That, upon a discussion of the now-existing Barrier-Treaty, he would make it appear to the Ministers of this State, that many things were therein inserted, which in England were looked upon as disadvantageous to her Majesty's subjects, and which certainly could not be reconciled either to the letter, or the design of the Grand Alliance; nor were conformable to any principles, upon which the present Confederacy was made, and the War begun. That he would further shew, that the alterations and additions now proposed, were only such, as were necessary to rectify the mistakes, and explain what was dubious, and to supply some omissions in that treaty, and to take away some obstructions thence arising to the commerce of Great-Britain. That, the particular guaranty of the Succession and Barrier being thus explained and rectified, it would not only be an additional security to both Nations, and be cordially executed, whenever the occasion should happen, but would unite the two Nations in stricter bonds of friendship and affection: Whereas, on the other hand, that State could not but expect a slow execution of that Treaty, which, by the British Nation, had been declared dishonourable and disadvantageous to it. And, in short, that to pretend to hold the said Nation under an engagement of such a nature as this, could have no other effect, than to foment jealousy, and misunderstandings, which, one time or other, might break out into an open rupture. That, among the terms of the new plan, the fourth article of the treaty of Barrier imported, that her Majesty consented to the States putting garrisons, providing, changing, augmenting, 1712. nimous in one point, to come into the Queen's measures, but every Province (except Utrecht) gave their consent with some restrictions. Upon this the States wrote a letter to the Queen, signifying their resolution to enter into her measures, and to conclude and sign a peace jointly with her, as also to take with her new engagements on the Protestant Succession and Barrier treaty. However they desired her to interpose for restoring Strasbourg to the Empire, for adding Condé to their Barrier, and for settling the commerce on the foot of the ancient Tariff*; as also for obtaining more reasonable terms for the Emperor: But things were so fixed between the Courts of France and Great-Britain, that there was no room for intercession. The demand of Strasbourg was rejected by the French with so positive an air, that the British Court did not move it any more; nor did it appear that we obtained any one condition of the French, but what was offered in their own project.

* Of 1664.
The Barrier Treaty signed.

In conclusion, the States were forced to yield in every particular; and then our Ministers, to give some seeming content to the Nation, and to bring the States into some confidence with them, ordered the new Barrier Treaty to be signed: And it was given out by their creatures, that the French were highly offended at their signing this; making it previous to a general peace, and a sort of guaranty for it. Thus, after all the declamations that were made on the first Barrier Treaty, the Ministers came into a new one, which, though not so secure as the former, yet was liable to all the objections, which were made against that (1).

Soon after the signing of the Barrier Treaty, the King the Prussian Ministers at Utrecht received advice, that their King, who for some time had been indisposed, but afterwards was thought out of danger, had a relapse, and his distemper increased to such a degree, that on the 25th of February, about noon, he expired as he was speaking to the Prince his Son, and some of his Ministers; having preserved his senses to the very last. He was in the sixty-sixth year of his age, the twenty-fifth of his Government, as Elector of Brandenburg, and the thirteenth of his reign as King of Prussia. Four days before his death he gave a signal instance of his compassion for the persecuted Protestants of France, whom he recommended to the Queen of Great-Britain's protection by a very moving and affectionate letter. He was a virtuous man, and full of zeal in the matters of religion. He raised above two hundred new churches in his dominions. He was weak, and much in the power of his Ministers and Flatterers; but was so apt to hearken to whippers, that he changed twice the whole set of his Ministry. His assuming the title of a King, and his affecting an extraordinary magnificence in his Court, brought a great charge on himself, and on all about him, which made him a severe master to himself, and set him on many pretensions, chiefly those relating to the Prince of Friesland, which were not thought well grounded. He was succeeded augmenting, or diminishing them, as they should think fit, in the following places; namely, Furnes, Fort Knocque, Ypres, Menin, the town and castle of Tournay, Mons, Charleroy, the town and castle of Namur, the castle of Ghent, the forts Pearl, Philip, and Damme: That fort St. Dhona being joined to the fortifications of Slois shall be yielded in propriety to the States; and that the fort of Rodenhuysen, on this side of Ghent, shall be razed. That in the ninth article it is stipulated, that all the revenues of the places to be yielded up by France, which did not belong to the Crown of Spain, at the time of the death of King Charles II. shall be given to the States, towards maintaining the Barrier, except only so much as is necessary for the civil Government of the said towns, places, and castellanies; as also a million of guilders yearly out of the clearest revenues of the rest of the Spanish Netherlands. That what related to Bon, Huy, and Liege, should be settled with the Ministers of the Emperor and the Empire: But that her Majesty's opinion was, that the first of those places should be garrisoned by the Imperialists, and the other two by the States. That, in the last place, notwithstanding all the provocations, and all the delays on the part of that State, the Queen had hitherto keep the Negotiation open: That her Majesty thought she had retarded it long enough, and possibly too long in good policy. That therefore the offers, which her Majesty now made by him, were her ultimate resolutions: And that this was the last time she would address herself to their High Mightinesses, in case they should form new delays, and not answer her Majesty's good intentions for their own interests. That, in the mean while, her Majesty had judged herself obliged in consideration of the great services done by the Duke of Savoy for the common cause, and of the danger, to which he was exposed by his firm adherence thereunto, to take care, not only for his security, but likewise for his grandeur, by procuring for him Sicily, and the tracts of the country on this side the Alps; which were necessary to secure Exilles and Fenestrelles, and to cover Piedmont. That his Succession, after that of King Philip, was acknowledged by the renunciation

That her Majesty desired the concurrence of this State in all that had been promised to his Royal Highness; and that her Majesty desired likewise, that the States should join with her, to oblige the Emperor to a neutrality for Italy, and to withdraw his troops from Catalonia: And that her Majesty was resolved to make the neutrality a condition of transporting the said troops, which her Majesty would do at her own expence; for, without that neutrality, the Emperor might disturb all Italy, and particularly the Duke of Savoy, on account of his treaty in the year 1703; one of the Imperial Ministers having already threatened a Minister of the Duke of Savoy, therewith, which would certainly engage the Queen and the States in the troubles and wars in Italy. Then the Earl of Stratford communicated to the Deputies an answer, on the part of her Majesty, to the last memorial of the Emperor's Minister in England, by which her Majesty's sentiments in this matter were confirmed. His Lordship further represented, 'That her Majesty, being informed of the present disorders in the Spanish Netherlands, had sent over the Earl of Orerry to the Hague, to redress them, to concert thereupon with the Deputies of this State, and to resume the Administration in common with their High Mightinesses Deputies, and to keep the same, till the Emperor should accept the Netherlands on the conditions, which the Queen and their High Mightinesses should agree upon.' Adding, 'That the Earl of Orerry had orders not to do any thing in this affair, but according as he should find a disposition in their High Mightinesses to act in concert with the Queen.' Annals of Queen Anne.

(1) Those readers, that desire a larger account of what passed at Utrecht, may see it in the following particulars:

The Plenipotentiaries of the four associated Circles of Germany laid, the same day, a proposition before the British Ministers at Utrecht, wherein they represented, 'That they entered into the Grand Alliance, upon an invitation of King William, by a solemn treaty concluded at Nordlingen, and afterwards ratified by the present Queen of Great-Britain. That the Circles had,

The French try to elude their engagements to Great Britain. Rep. of the Com. of Secr.
 Though the treaty of peace was now almost concluded, yet the advantages, which Great-Britain was to expect from her endeavours to assist and support the cause of France, were in a great measure unsettled and undetermined. France began to cavil, and, as Lord Bolingbroke said, go back from what the King had promised the Queen; and his Lordship could not be persuaded, as he told Mr. Prior, 'That the French acted either fairly or wisely. They press us, says he, to conclude, that they may have others at their mercy; and at the same time they chicaned with us concerning the most essential article of all our treaty, and endeavour to elude an agreement made, repeated and confirmed.' The two great points of moment, in dispute, were concerning the fishery at Newfoundland, and in what manner the cession of Cape-Breton was to be made. The other was about the treaty of commerce. As to the first, it is to be observed, that, in the Queen's instructions to the Duke of Shrewsbury, he is directed to propose, as the Queen's last resolution, that she will consent to give and yield up to his most Christian Majesty the intire possession and propriety of the Island of Cape-Breton; but, with this express condition, that his Majesty shall, on his part, in consideration of the same, relinquish all manner of right to fishing and drying fish on the Coast of Newfoundland, or any part, reserved to his subjects by the articles signed at London the 27th of September, and 8th of October, 1711.

Several representations were sent backward and forward, shewing the fatal consequences of what was demanded by France: And though Lord Bolingbroke, in his letter to Mr. Prior of the 19th of January, 1712-13, insisted, that the Queen had never yielded what France pretended to, which then remained an unsurmountable difficulty; yet, in his letter to the Duke of Shrewsbury of the same date, he tells him, 'if the French close with the overture he then made them with regard to the disputes concerning commerce, the Queen is willing to accept the last expedient, proposed by Monsieur de Torcy for adjusting our differences about North America, and to consent, that the King, in the cession of Newfoundland, do reserve to his subjects a right of fishing and drying on the Coast of Newfoundland from Port Riche, North about, to Cape Bonavista.' And here no direction is given concerning Cape-Breton, of which the French got the intire cession and propriety, although, in the Duke of Shrewsbury's instructions, it is declared, 'That the Queen looked upon Cape-Breton to belong to her; and reckoned that Island a part of the ancient territory of Nova Scotia, which is by this treaty restored to her. But, if the Duke could not prevail upon them to agree with him in the article of commerce, he was to declare, that neither would the Queen agree with them in their proposition concerning Newfoundland.' As to Commerce, the great dispute about it is thus represented in the Lord Bolingbroke's letter to the Duke of Shrewsbury: In Torcy's answer to Lord Bolingbroke's memorial of the 24th of May, 1712, it was, among other things agreed, that Britain and France should grant to the subjects of each reciprocally the same privileges and advantages, which they shall either of them grant to the subjects of any other Nation whatsoever. Upon this foundation was established the principle of treating and being treated, as Gens amicitissima; and, pursuant to this principle, the Tariff of 1664, which was granted to Holland (except the four species of merchandize) was likewise to be granted to England; and by the eighth and tenth articles of the project of the treaty

had on their part, punctually performed all the conditions of that treaty, and had borne all the calamities of so bloody and ruinous a war at their own expence, without troubling her Majesty for one penny subsidy, with an entire confidence, that, as she always declared her satisfaction with the firmness and conduct of the Circles, her Majesty would not fail remembering the good services they did the public; and that they should reap the fruits of their labours, sufferings, and expences: But that notwithstanding her Majesty's gracious assurances, they heard with grief, that she persisted in the opinion, that an universal peace might be made, without the Circles enjoying the least comfort or effect of their Alliance; no amends, no barrier, no security; which would bring the utmost desolation upon the Circles, and leave a fatal remembrance to posterity. Wherefore they made their addresses to the justice and goodness of her Majesty, to the wisdom and equity of her Ministers, and to the generosity and honour of the whole English Nation, not to abandon so good and faithful Allies, nor leave them in the miserable condition, in which they had been plunged by former treaties. To this representation the British Ministers returned the following answer, 'That, if the associated Circles did not obtain all they desired, and all her Majesty could wish them, the blame was by no means to be laid at her door: First, because, during the war, the Empire had very much neglected the prosecution of it on that side; and the Emperor and other Princes and States had been very deficient in furnishing their respective quotas of troops, and other necessities; which if they had done, the war had been long since at an end, and they in possession of that which was now impossible to obtain: But that they had let the whole burden of the war to fall upon her Majesty and the States-General in Flanders; the getting whose money, by exorbitant bargains for their troops they seemed to have more at heart, than the providing their contingents for their own army. That, besides their negligence and remissness in the prosecution of the war, the opposition, they had made to her Majesty's measures for peace, had put it out of her power to serve them. That, when a cessation of arms was found necessary, they were told from her Majesty, that, if they would enter into it, the Allies being united in their counsels, might have obtained from the enemy any thing they could reasonably have insisted upon; but that they rejected that proposal, and deserted her Majesty, to follow Prince Eugene's chimerical projects, which had already been, and might prove more fatal to the common cause, if they did not prevent another campaign by reasonable proposals of peace. That her Majesty's case was therefore very hard, that, while she prosecuted the war with the utmost vigour, some of the Allies acted with almost as much coldness and indifference, as if they had been in peace, or had no concern in the war; and, when she found a peace necessary, they should then only begin to think of war. And, after all, when by this unaccountable way of acting, they had brought themselves into inextricable difficulties, they should cry out, that they were deserted, and endeavour to throw the odium and blame of it upon her. But that, nevertheless, she would still do for the four Circles, as well as for the rest of her Allies, all that she was obliged to by treaty, and whatever more they had, by their conduct, left in her power.' treaty of commerce it was so settled. But France, pretending now, that this Tariff would be too beneficial to the English, refused to grant it, till another Tariff should be made in Great-Britain, exactly conformable to that of 1664, whereby the British duties should be reduced as low as theirs were in France by that Tariff. 'This (Lord Bolingbroke in his letter to the Duke of Shrewsbury says) is an open violation of faith; and by this (adds he) they are removing a corner-stone, which was laid early in the foundation of a building brought almost to perfection; the fall whereof must prove at last of as fatal consequence to them as to us.' He confesses, 'I was strangely surprized, when I saw the precedent of the Ryswick Treaty quoted, to persuade us to refer our commerce, as the Dutch then did theirs, to Commissioners, to be treated of after signing the peace. The behaviour of the French on that occasion has given us warning; and it is from thence we have learned, that whatever is referred, is given up; and they must have a mean opinion of those, whom they would persuade to pursue the same method to get the Tariff of 1664, by which the Dutch then lost it.' But it is very remarkable, that his Lordship on the 24th of May, had himself proposed, That, several points relating to commerce, requiring a longer discussion than that crisis would admit, Commissioners should be appointed to settle and adjust the differences. Indeed, in his letter to the Duke of Shrewsbury, he offers an expedient, which was to solve all the difficulties; and tells his Grace, 'I am commanded to acquaint you, that, having fully opened to the French Ministers her Majesty's sense of the King's engagements to her upon this head, you are to propose to them, to strike out of the project of the treaty of commerce the ninth and tenth articles, and, instead thereof, insert one to the effect of that, which I have drawn, and which comes here inclosed.' And, as the acceptance of this amendment was to put an end to all differences, and, at the same time, gave such ample advantages to France, the French readily agreed to it; and inserted this article verbatim, as it was sent, in the treaty of commerce, which makes the ninth article of the treaty, as it now stands, and is the same, which was afterwards rejected by the Parliament. And this article, which has since been so universally condemned, appears to be the work of the English Ministry, and the price, for which they sold to France the Fishery of Newfoundland.

This treatment of France could not but give the Ministry the greatest uneasiness, though their apprehensions, lest the circumstances they were in should be known, far exceeded their concern at the disappointment, which Great-Britain was like to meet with. They had signed a separate treaty with France, in September 1711, upon this single principle, that the interests of Great-Britain were in the first place to be adjusted; and, as long as they had this to say, they were unconcerned at all other events. They had gone on for fourteen months together, and acted in every thing as the instruments of France, and were at last in danger of being disavowed by France in the most essential part of all their treaty. One of the chief inducements and principal conditions, upon which the fatal cessation of arms was granted, was, that no privileges or advantages relating to commerce with France shall be yielded to any foreign Nation, which shall not at the same time, be granted to the subjects of her Britannic Majesty; but France had now reached the full benefit of the suspension, and were at liberty to dispute the principle of Gens Amicissima.

answer, and the late steps of the States, it was generally believed, that the Negotiations at Utrecht would speedily be brought to a conclusion: But some unforeseen difficulties, started by the Court of France, made it necessary to renew the cessation of arms for four months longer; which was done by an agreement signed at London the 26th of November, and Verfijlles the 14th of December, N. S.

The Marquis de Monteleone, appointed by King Philip to be one of his Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, being about this time come to London, and the Queen returned from Windsor to St. James's, he had the next day a private audience, wherein he told her, 'That his Master had sent him to return her a thousand thanks for the great pains she had been pleased to take to procure peace to Europe. And that the whole Spanish Nation in particular, owed their lives to her Majesty: for, had the war continued, there was not one true Spaniard, who would not have spent the last drop of his blood in his Master's quarrel.' The Queen thanked her Brother, the King of Spain, for this compliment, and said, 'She thought herself very happy in being able to contribute to the safety of so brave a Nation, and so loyal a People.'

In the mean time, the Queen being informed, that the Electoral Prince of Saxony was expected at Rome, in order to make there public profession of the Papish Religion, she thought proper to renew her good offices with King Augustus, to persuade him to recall his Son out of Italy, and dismiss the Papish servants about him; and at the same time invited the King of Prussia, the Elector of Hanover, and the States-General, to join their efforts with her's to engage his Polish Majesty not to induce his son to change his religion. But all these endeavours were rendered fruitless by the powerful allurements offered by the Roman Catholics to engage the young Prince, namely, the prospect of a marriage between him and one of the Archduchesses, which would open him the way to the Imperial Throne, in case the present Emperor should die without male issue.

The express, sent by Count Zinzendorf to Vienna, Negotiating with the Queen's last plan of peace, being returned to her at Utrecht on the 3d of January, N. S. the Emperor's Utrecht Annals.

Plenipotentiaries had, at their own desire a long Conference with those of Great-Britain, in which they declared, that their Master was very well disposed to promote a general peace; and the same day they acquainted also the Ministers of the States with the Emperor's intentions. The ratifications of a treaty for a suspension of arms between France and Spain on the one side, and Portugal on the other, were now exchanged, having been delivered into the hands of the British Plenipotentiaries, who long before this time had little else to do in the Congress, than to act as Mediators. In this capacity they had, on the 8th, a long Conference with the Plenipotentiaries of France, in which they delivered to them the draught of a project for bringing the Emperor's home from Barcelona, and withdrawing the Imperial troops out of Catalonia. On the 15th Count Zinzendorf had a long Conference with the Portuguese Ministers, about the terms of peace offered by France to that Crown, which the Emperor did not entirely approve. The Marthal de Bieberstein arriving at Utrecht, the 16th, from the Court of Berlin, had a long Conference with the Earl of Strafford, by particular orders from the King of Prussia his Master. The same day the Ministers of France were in Conference with those of Great-Britain; and the next day Monsieur Boys

1712-13. In these circumstances were the English Ministry in January 1712-13; and, to extricate themselves, they gave up all points in dispute in North America, and the fishery of Newfoundland, upon the single consideration of the ninth article of the treaty of Commerce, which (as will be seen) the Parliament, with a just indignation, rejected. However, to bring France to a compliance, even upon these conditions, the Duke of Shrewsbury, in the same letter, was instructed to prevail with France to come to this resolution, without the loss of one moment's time. The Parliament was suddenly to meet; and it would be necessary for the Queen to communicate to both Houses the present state of the Negotiation. The Duke is then to represent to Torcy, 'How smoothly every thing would glide along, if the Queen was able to speak of her own interests as absolutely determined with France; and, on the other hand, what travels we shall be exposed to, and what confusion may arise, if our Negotiation appears to be still open, and if the secret comes to be divulged, that France refuses to make good in the treaty the full effect of former promises to the Queen.' His Lordship having finished what he had to say concerning her Majesty's particular interests, he proceeds upon the general plan of peace, and instructs the Duke what he was to inform the French Ministers would be the measure of her Majesty's conduct, and what they might expect from her. 'That as the French Ministers desire, that the Queen would precipitate the conclusion of her peace, and leave all the Confederacy at their mercy; they must be told, that, when the mutual interests of France and England are settled, as they will be, if the propositions contained in the first part of this letter are accepted, the Plenipotentiaries of Great-Britain shall publicly declare in the Congress, that they are ready to sign with those of France, and shall call upon the Allies to quicken the Negotiations, and conclude without loss of time. But, if they seek unnecessary delays, or make unreasonable demands, her Majesty, who had induced them to treat, will, by the same measures, engage them to conclude, or at least she will sign without them. And, the Queen having once declared her interests to be settled, and her treaty ready to be signed, the general peace becomes from that moment sure, and the remainder of the Negotiation easy. It is therefore wise for the French to comply with her Majesty.'

The great distraction, the Ministry was in, appears sufficiently from this long letter of Lord Bolingbroke's to the Duke of Shrewsbury; but still more, from two letters written by him about this time, and upon this subject, to Mr. Prior; one of January the 19th, the other of the 22d, O. S. The first was of the same date as his letter to the Duke, wherein he says to Mr. Prior, 'I have exhausted all my stock of arguments in the long letter, which, by the Queen's order, I write to the Duke of Shrewsbury. To you I can only add, we stand upon the brink of a precipice, but the French stand there too. Pray tell Monsieur de Torcy, from me, that he may get Robin and Harry hanged; but affairs will soon run back into so much confusion, that he will wish us alive again: To speak seriously, unless the Queen can talk of her interests as determined with France; and unless your Court will keep our Allies in the wrong, as they are sufficiently at this time, I foresee inextricable difficulties. My scheme is this: Let France satisfy the Queen; and let the Queen immediately declare to her Parliament, and in the Congress, that she is ready to sign; and, at the same time, let the French Plenipotentiaries shew a disposition to conclude with all the Allies.'

was also with the British Ministers, by whose interposition the difference between Monsieur Mynager and Count Rechieren was brought into a fair way of being accommodated, in order to the resuming of the general Conference. There was also that day a consultation at the Bishop of Bristol's house, between the Protestant Ministers, about the abolition of the clause relating to Religion in the fourth article of the treaty of Ryswick, and the measures to be taken, that the Protestants in Silesia and Hungary might, for the future, enjoy entire liberty of conscience. The Ministers of Great-Britain pressed this affair more earnestly than all the rest, and exclaimed against the Imperial Court for persecuting the Protestants of the Empire and Hungary. But they spoke in a less vehement stile of the persecutions, which the Protestants had suffered in France. Soon after the British Plenipotentiaries conferred with the Imperial Ministers, who seemed at last inclined to come into the Queen's measures for procuring a general peace. To that end, Count Zinzendorf drew up some proposals for setting on foot a Negotiation between the Imperial and French Ministers, which were delivered to the latter by the Lord Privy-Seal, who the next day acquainted that Count and Baron Kirchner, how far they had proceeded in that affair. The Plenipotentiaries of Prussia had also a long Conference with the British Ministers, in which they expressed their Master's inclination to conclude a peace, whenever the Queen should think fit. On the other hand, the Ministers of Saxony returned thanks to the British Plenipotentiaries on the behalf of their Master, for the great care that had been taken of his interests; and gave assurances, that they were ready to concur in whatever steps the Queen of Great-Britain should judge proper for the bringing the peace to a happy conclusion.

All this while the Ministers of the Protestant Powers Annals continued their private consultations about the abolition of the clause relating to Religion, in the fourth article of the treaty of Ryswick; and were very pressing with the Roman Catholic Ministers on that affair. But the Imperial and French Plenipotentiaries (agreed, perhaps, in this point only) found means to draw it out into length, referring it from the one to the other. The former pretended, it was the French inserted that clause into the treaty, and therefore ought to get it abolished: To which the French answered, 'That, it being an affair, which concerned the Empire, it was the business of the Imperialists to look after it.' The Roman Catholic Ministers of the Empire having demanded, that the Protestants should, by a deputation, communicate to them the resolution they had taken about that affair, the Counts Wertheren and Metternich were named to represent to them the justice of abolishing that clause, and put them in mind of the disputes, jealousies, and other ill consequences, with which it had been attended in the Empire. Count Zinzendorf signified, he was ready to return them an answer on the part of the Emperor; and a meeting being held for that purpose, he assured them, 'That his Master did not intend to oppose the abolition of the clause, but would acquiesce in the relief that should be given to the Protestants in a general treaty of peace.'

The same day the Queen of Great-Britain's answer to the letter of the States-General arrived at the Hague, but, being directed to her Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, it was not brought to the Assembly of the States till the

1712-13. And then he enumerates the several offers, which he would have France to make to the several Allies; and, though these were very general and insufficient, he says, if such overtures as these (made to the Allies) were not instantly accepted, our separate peace would, the Parliament sitting, be addressed for, and approved; and the cause of France, for once, become popular in Britain. If they were accepted, let Monsieur de Torcy sit down, and consider, what a bargain would be made for France. Let him remember his journey to the Hague, and compare the plans of 1709 and 1712. Monsieur de Torcy has a confidence in you: Make use of it once for all upon this occasion, and convince him thoroughly, that we must give a different turn to our Parliament and our People, according to their resolution at this crisis. The next letter from Lord Bolingbroke to Mr. Prior, was upon the same subject, and of the same strain: 'We are now (says he) at the true crisis of our disease: We die at once, or recover at once. Let France depart from that shameful expedient by which they thought to bubble us out of the advantages, which they had solemnly yielded, and all is well; otherwise, By God, both they and we are undone. The Queen can neither delay the meeting of the Parliament longer than the 3d, nor speak to the Houses till we hear from you. My compliments to Monsieur de Torcy. Let him know, that, if they do not agree with the Queen, I may, perhaps, be a Refugee. If I am I promise beforehand to behave myself better in France, than the French Refugees do here. Make the French ashamed of their sneaking chicanery. By Heaven, they treat like Pedlars, or, which is worse, like Attornies.'

As all these public transactions passed through the hands of Lord Bolingbroke, who, although he was Secretary of State, acted extra-provincially in all his correspondence with France; so it appears, at the same time that he was not the only person in the secret, but that a greater influence chiefly directed and governed all these Councils; and the Lord-Treasurer was in this transaction, as well as in the affair of Tournay, the chief Conductor; as may very reasonably be concluded from several letters, which Mr. Prior wrote about this time to his Lordship, though that Gentleman did not think fit to produce afterwards to the Committee of Secrecy, one letter from his Lordship to him. It is observed, that these letters to the Lord-Treasurer were chiefly wrote on the same days, that Mr. Prior sent dispatches to the Secretaries of State, giving an account of his proceedings, and desiring the Queen's directions upon them; but, it seems, he did not think that sufficient, without knowing his Lordship's particular pleasure upon them. Mr. Prior's dispatch to the Secretary's Office, giving a full account of the present State of the treaty, together with several papers, memorials, and propositions relating to the points in dispute, and concerning Commerce and North-America, is dated December 28, 1712. The day after Mr. Prior wrote to the Lord-Treasurer, and told him, 'I have written a book instead of a letter to my Lord Bolingbroke, which I desire your Lordship would be pleased to run over, that, knowing what I have done, you may honour me with your commands as to what I am to do.' He hoped his proposal about Newfoundland, which he sends his Lordship inclosed, was such as may terminate that affair to our advantage; and, if his Lordship was of the same opinion, he should have intire satisfaction.

On the 8th of January, 1712-13, Mr. Prior, having sent another full account in form to the Secretary of State, wrote the same day to the Lord-Treasurer, that he had been in Conference with next day, when it was read there, and also in the Assembly of the States of the Province of Holland, where-in were the following paragraphs:

'By the real and solid proofs we have given of our friendship for your State; by the continued efforts we have made to defeat the intrigues of those, who, either through private passion or interest, have endeavoured to divide you from us; and lastly, by the grief we have been afflicted with, when any attempt has been made to break the good intelligence, that was between us and your republic, it will be easy for you to judge of the satisfaction, which your letter of the 29th inst has given us.

Our conduct has ever run upon the constant principle of a sincere desire of preserving the balance of Europe, and to procure, not only the safety, but also the augmentation of your State.

Your resolution to enter with us into new engagements about the Succession and Barrier, to make a new treaty thereupon, and to conclude and sign it before the peace, cannot but be attended with the best consequences. And, when all occasions of dispute about the reciprocal interests of the two Nations shall be removed, we shall then be in a condition to concert with you the providing for those of our Allies, and to treat more effectually with the Potentates against whom we have made war.

The declaration you have lately made, that you are resolved to join with us, to enter into the measures we have taken for a peace, and to conclude and sign it jointly, and at the same time with us, will, in some measure, make amends for the misfortunes, that have been occasioned by the disunion of the Allies, and prevent those, that were to be feared for the future.

We shall take your interests to heart equally with our own; and we shall be ready to do all that lies in our power to advance them, being sorry, that we are not in a condition to support both yours, and those of our common Allies, as effectually as we could have done the last spring. Done at our Court at St. James's the 7th of January, 1712-13.

ANNE REGINA.

This letter quickened the pace of the Negotiation; but, previous to the general Conferences, it was absolutely necessary, that the differences which had so long obstructed them, should be adjusted; which, by the mediation of the British Ministers, was at last brought to pass on the 29th of January in this manner: Three of the Plenipotentiaries of the States, viz. Monsieur Vanderdussen, the Baron de Renfoude, and Count de Kniphuyzen, went to the Marshal d'Uxelles's Houle; where, in the presence of the three Plenipotentiaries of France, they were to declare, that the dispute between Monsieur Mefnager and Count de Rechteren had happened without the knowledge or approbation of the States-General. But Monsieur Vanderdussen, who was the spokesman, had scarce with gravity pronounced these words, Our Masters, the States-General, when the Marshal d'Uxelles interrupted him, and told him, 'Sir, the King, my Master, is thoroughly persuaded, that Messieurs the States-General had no knowledge of Monsieur de Rechteren's behaviour; and that they have too much respect for his Majesty to approve it.' This difficulty

1712-13. with the French Ministers, to adjust the points undecided between her Majesty and the King of France; that he had sent Lord Boltingbroke the result of those Conferences, as well what was agreed to by the French Ministers, as his own remarks upon each particular head, and says, 'I hope your Lordship will find the whole adjusted so far to your satisfaction, as that our Plenipotentiaries may receive their final orders. I will not doubt but the whole affair of Newfoundland is adjusted to your desire. There were some points insisted upon by our Plenipotentiaries, which the Ministers here thought very unreasonable; and to say a truth to my Lord-Treasurer plainly, which I a little mitigate to my Lord Boltingbroke, I think not very reasonable.' He then gives an account that Torcy was surprized, that the Dutch had but in part complied with what the Earl of Strafford declared to them to be her Majesty's resolutions, to which he hopes the Queen will send such an answer, as may cut off all delays; and, upon this occasion, Mr. Prior says to the Lord-Treasurer, 'This I only write to your Lordship, it being a thing, that should not be called in Council; and I have promised that the King should have her Majesty's answer upon it, as he desires.' January 19, 1712-13, N. S. Mr. Prior writes again to the Lord-Treasurer, and acquaints him, 'That the Duke of Shrewsbury now sends to Lord Boltingbroke the substance of their last Conferences with Monsieur de Torcy, upon the subject of Newfoundland; to which I take leave to add, that your friend Torcy is in the last concern to find the Duke's instructions so strict in a point, which cannot be given up by France, at 1712-13. at a time, when we well hoped that difference was adjusted. Pray, my Lord, let us have your distinct and positive orders hereupon by the first. I send your Lordship inclosed a copy of my letter to my Lord Boltingbroke; and the Duke of Shrewsbury desires, that he may have your orders to finish. I believe Torcy writes himself to you.' On the 23d of the same month, N. S. Mr. Prior writes once more to the Lord-Treasurer, and tells him, 'I have already wrote so amply to your Lordship on the two great points of Newfoundland, and the Tariff of 1664; and so expect daily your last orders upon these two points, that I will not trouble you at present further than to say, if these two are settled, the peace may be determined here to-morrow, and sent the next day to Utrecht to be signed.' And, on the 2d of February, Mr. Prior writes to his Lordship, 'If I desire you to write to me, it is, because I really think it for the Queen's service, that in this great post, where you have put me, I may be able to say, I have the immediate commands of my Lord-Treasurer; and, in regard to that friendship, with which you have so publicly honoured me, and which, by the bye, does all the business here.' And, on February the 4th, 'I shall direct myself as you shall be pleased to instruct me privately.'

If the Committee of Secreey had found among the papers delivered by Mr. Prior, the Lord-Treasurer's answers to these letters, it is highly probable, that it would have appeared from them, how far the giving up the fishery of Newfoundland, and the accepting of the ninth article difficulty being removed, the Dutch Plenipotentiaries went to the Lord Bishop of Bristol's House, where they were in Conference with him and the Earl of Strafford from eleven at night till between four and five the next morning, when the new treaty of Barrier and Succession was signed by the Ministers of Great-Britain, and those of the States-General; and, about an hour after, Mr. Harrison was sent over to England with it, for her Majesty's ratification, and approbation of some explanations, that were inserted by the Dutch Plenipotentiaries. The next day, January the 31st, the Emperor's Plenipotentiaries had for the first time a private Conference with those of France at the Bishop of Bristol's House, where an agreement was proposed concerning the transporting of the Emperess, the evacuation of Catalonia, and the amnesty for the Catalans: So that all things seemed now to tend to a general peace.

On the 4th of February, N. S. the Plenipotentiaries of France and Prussia met, for the first time, at the Lord Privy-Seal's House, and the following days the Ministers of the Emperor and the Queen of Great-Britain had several Conferences together, in which Count Zinzendorf communicated a second plan, which was said to come very near the contents of the Queen's speech from the Throne. The 9th, the Plenipotentiaries of France were in Conference with those of Portugal, and afterwards with the Ministers of Savoy, at the House of the Lord Privy-Seal. But the Negotiations were for some days put to a stand by the sudden departure of the Abbot de Polignac, who the night between the 10th and 11th of February set out for the Court of France, on pretence of his being lately named Cardinal by the Pope, at the recommendation, as was said, of the Chevalier de St. George. Before his departure, he received from the British Plenipotentiaries, a proposal of the Emperor and Empire, importing, 'That Catalonia should be evacuated, upon condition, that the inhabitants had a full pardon, and a confirmation of all their privileges. That the Elector of Bavaria should have the title of King, but not the Island of Sardinia; and that his Electorate (but not the Upper Palatinate) should be yielded to his Electoral Highness's Son; so that he himself should not set foot in the Empire. That the Electorate of Bavaria should be the last of the nine. That Landau should remain to the Empire: And, in the last place, that France should demolish Saar Louis, and several other places: Which Monsieur de Polignac promised to lay before the King his Master.

The Plenipotentiaries of France had almost from the beginning of the Negotiations demanded passports of the Dutch for the admission of the Duke of Osuna, the Marquis de Montelone, and the Count de Bergheek, to the Congress, as Plenipotentiaries of Philip V. King of Spain; which the States-General had still declined to grant, for fear of disobliging the Emperor, with whom it was their interest to keep firmly united. But the Imperial Ministers having by this time consented, in their Master's name, to the evacuation of Catalonia, and Neutrality in Italy, which was a kind of tacit acknowledgment of King Philip's title to the Crown of Spain, and the West-Indies; the States-General, by the mediation of the British Ministers, were at last prevailed with to grant the passports. The passports, which the French Plenipotentiaries demanded also for the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria, were granted with less difficulty, and delivered to them about the middle of March.

The Courier, sent to the French Court, being come back to Utrecht, the Negotiation for evacuating Catalonia, and for a cessation of arms in Italy, was on the 19th of February set again on foot. On the 27th the Imperial and French Ministers were together in Conference, in the presence of the British, by whose mediation, they at last agreed upon the subject of evacuating Catalonia, and a Convention was ordered to be drawn up for that purpose. On the second of March, the Ministers of France and Savoy conferred about a Convention for the Neutrality in Italy. See Annals of Queen Anne.

1712-13. article of the treaty of Commerce, was owing to his immediate orders. It seems however to be a very extraordinary proceeding, that the Queen's Ministers in France acting by her authority, and under her instructions, should apply to the Lord-Treasurer for his distinct and positive orders to release them from the Queen's positive instructions, because they are thought by the French Ministers to be too strict. And if it be a doubt by whose order or advice it was procured, so much is certain, that these applications had their desired effect; and the Newfoundland fishery was given up; and the advantages, which Great-Britain was to receive from being treated upon the foot of Gens Amicissima, were all buried in the ninth article of the treaty of Commerce.

The difficulties relating to North America and Commerce being in this manner determined, France was wholly intent upon concluding and signing with Great-Britain, without taking in the rest of the Allies; and in this they had the good fortune to have the concurrence and assistance of the British Ministry. By good management the dispute raised at Utrecht had been so ordered, that the Ministers of the Allies could not obtain any Conference with those of France, till the points in difference were adjusted between England and France; by which means it was February 1712-13, before the Dutch and French were suffered to meet. And, it being now the business of France to conclude with England separately, the temper the French Plenipotentiaries appeared in, made all business so impracticable, that the British Plenipotentiaries were under a necessity of complaining of it to Lord Bolingbroke, and to acquaint him, February 3, 1712-13: 'The French appear so very uncomplying in every point debated, and so very froward and positive in their refusal of a great many things, which the Dutch took to be granted and settled, as well by her Majesty's speech, as the declarations lately made by Lord Stratford, that the disappointment they met with, put them into the greatest consternation. Reason was also given us to participate in these contents, and to regard several things, which appear contrary to what her Majesty has declared, as very unfair: Yet all that could be said, prevailed not.' But it is not surprizing, that the instances of the British Plenipotentiaries had so little effect with the French, who then expected, that orders should be sent to the British Ministers immediately to sign the peace, which, according to their expectation, were sent February 20, 1712-13, by St. John, Brother to the Lord Bolingbroke, to conclude and sign with France as soon as the Duke of Shrewsbury should send them advice, that the propositions he was to make at the French Court were accepted; and, on the 28th, Lord Bolingbroke with the utmost joy acquainted them, 'That he had received from the Duke of Shrewsbury the expected returns, and which he doubted not would have reached their Lordships. He had therefore, without staying to enter into any other detail, dispatched a Courier to them, to renew those instructions, which he hoped were clearly enough signified in those papers, which his brother carried. He acquaints them, that the Duke of Shrewsbury had declared, that their Lordships had orders, in case the French complied, as they now actually have done, to sign her Majesty's peace with France without farther delay; and that his Grace had also declared, that in this case her Majesty would open the Parliament, by the telling them, she had made a peace with France. These two considerations, his Lordship says, were perhaps the most prevalent inducements to the French Court, to come roundly into her Majesty's propositions; and the Queen thinks herself, for this reason, still the more obliged punctually and religiously to fulfil these promises. The latter she will herself perform on Tuesday; and the former, it is her positive command, that your Lordships make good as fast as the necessary forms of preparing and executing the instruments will allow. And his Lordship looking upon it now, that the chief difficulties, relating to the treaty of peace, were removed; as likewise in the treaty of commerce, by the article drawn by himself, and proposed by the Duke of Shrewsbury, he gives them positive orders, without any delay, to execute the treaties of peace and commerce between Great-Britain and France. On the 7th, and on the 20th of March, O. S. Lord Bolingbroke repeats these positive orders, and insists, that the peace should be concluded with that precipitation, which her Majesty would have used.

The Court of France, being acquainted with the Duke's these good dispositions of the English Ministry, of Berry and Orleans, and re-nounce the Crown of Spain, Annals. thought proper now to comply with the Duke of Shrewsbury's demand, that the Dukes of Berry and Orleans should make a solemn renunciation to the Crown of Spain in the Parliament of Paris, in like manner as King Philip had renounced the Crown of France in the Cortez of Spain. This was solemnly done on the 15th of March; and, at the same time, were erased out of the Registers of the Parliament the Letters Patents, by which the rights of the King of Spain to the Crown of France were preserved, when he set out for Madrid. It will be necessary now to turn a little to the affairs of the North.

The favourable turn, which towards the end of the year 1712, attended the Swedish affairs, of both in the North of Germany and in Turkey, as it prefigured new dangers to the Empire, and made the States and the Emperor uneasy, was, no doubt, a powerful motive to incline them to hearken to the instances of the British Ministers, to come into the Queen's measures. The Muscovites, Danes, and Saxons, who miscarried in their design to reduce Pomerania in the year 1711, seemed confident to have taken such measures in 1712, as to be able to drive the Swedes from their territories on this side the Baltic: But their not going into the field so soon as they intended, proved the cause of their disappointment. The Muscovites and Saxons had undertaken to conquer Pomerania; but through the misunderstanding of their Generals (some being for the siege of Stralsund, others of Stetin, and others again for the attack of the Isle of Rugen) the whole campaign was spent in fruitless debates, and all that the Czar and King Augustus could do at last, was, to quarter their troops in Pomerania, as they had done the year before, in order to keep the Swedes in awe.

The King of Denmark made a better use of his time, he besieged and took Staden, and reduced the Duchy of Bremen. After which, upon slight pretensions, he obliged the City of Hamburg to pay him three hundred thousand N. S. Crowns, which proved a seasonable supply to subsist his troops. The Northern Allies seem-

The affairs of the North. of the year 1712, attended the Swedish affairs, of both in the North of Germany and in Turkey, as it prefigured new dangers to the Empire, and made the States and the Emperor uneasy, was, no doubt, a powerful motive to incline them to hearken to the instances of the British Ministers, to come into the Queen's measures. The Muscovites, Danes, and Saxons, who miscarried in their design to reduce Pomerania in the year 1711, seemed confident to have taken such measures in 1712, as to be able to drive the Swedes from their territories on this side the Baltic: But their not going into the field so soon as they intended, proved the cause of their disappointment. The King of Denmark made a better use of his time, he besieged and took Staden, and reduced the Duchy of Bremen. After which, upon slight pretensions, he obliged the City of Hamburg to pay him three hundred thousand N. S. Crowns, which proved a seasonable supply to subsist his troops. The Northern Allies seem-

1712-13. ing contented with these successes, had sent their troops into quarters, when an unexpected motion of the Swedes obliged them once more to take the field. Count Steenbock, who some time before was arrived in the Island of Rügen, being sensible of the impossibility of subsisting his forces in the narrow compass of land he was possessed of, resolved to look for quarters in the country of Mecklenburgh; and succeeded in his design without the loss of a man. The Northern Confederates resolved to draw their forces from their lines, in order to oblige the Swedish General to return into Pomerania, where they knew he could not maintain his army. But when it was generally expected, that both armies were ready to engage, a cessation of arms, for fifteen days, was on a sudden concluded between the Polish and Swedish Generals. This suspension expiring, the troops were all again in motion. The King of Denmark, who appeared against the truce, marched five days before from Holstein towards Mecklenburgh, in order to join his Allies, and endeavour to fight the Swedes. But Count Steenbock, with great foresight, resolved to prevent, and engage the Danes, before they were reinforced; which he did near Gadebusz, where the Danish troops and some Saxon cavalry suffered almost a total defeat. The Swedish General was not wanting to improve this success; and entering Holstein, not only raised great contributions, but, in a barbarous manner, and upon frivolous pretences, burnt the Danish open town of Altena near Hamburg. At the same time the Swedes were animated by reports from Constantinople, of the war being like to break out again between the Turks and the Czar, on pretence, that the Czar had not performed one of the most essential articles of the late peace, namely, the withdrawing of his forces from the territories of Poland. This new rupture was attended with the disgrace of the Grand Vizir, who was the third Turkish Minister of that rank, who fell a sacrifice to the intrigues of the King of Sweden, and of those, who supported his interest at the Ottoman Porte. The King of Sweden had all the assistance the French could give him in soliciting this war, which gave the Emperor great apprehensions. He was afraid disorders in Hungary might follow upon it, which would defeat the measures he had taken to settle matters in that Kingdom, so that, being safe on that side, he might turn his whole force against France, and, by that means, encourage the States to continue the war. Those in Holland, who pressed the accepting the offers that France made them, represented that as a thing not possible to be supported: The promises of the Emperor and the Princes of the Empire had so often failed them, that they said, they could not be relied on: And the distractions in the North made them apprehend, that those Princes might be obliged to recall their troops, which were in the service of the States.

The sudden and unexpected prosperity of the King of Sweden soon came to an end. Whilst he was using all possible means to engage the Turk into a new war with the Czar, the party at the Porte, that opposed it, studied to get rid of him and his importunities. By his intractable obstinacy he threw himself into great dangers. Orders were sent him to march back into his Kingdom: And they undertook to procure him a safe passage to it; but he treated the person that was sent with this message, with great insolence, and fortified himself, as well as he could, with the Swedes that were about him, and resolved to defend himself. A force much superior to his, was brought against him; but he maintained himself so resolutely in his house, that some hundreds of those who attacked him were killed: The Turks, upon that, set fire to the house, whereupon he was forced to surrender, and was put under a guard; and most of his Swedes were sold for slaves; he was carried to a house near Adrianople, but not suffered to come to Court; only the Sultan disowned the violence used to his person. In the mean while, the Czar shipped an army from Peterburgh, that landed in Finland: The Swedes were not able to stand before him; every place, as he advanced, submitted to him; and he was now Master of Abo, the Capital of Finland, and of that whole Province. Steenbock, with his army, maintained himself in Tonningen, as long as their provision lasted: But, all supplies, being carefully stopped, he was forced at last to deliver up himself, and his army prisoners of war; and these were the best troops the Swedes had, so that Sweden was struck with a general consternation.

Though the Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht had received such positive orders from Lord Bolingbroke to sign the peace, the behaviour of the French was so different from what had been promised, that they were mightily perplexed, and scrupled to sign a separate treaty. They wrote to the Lord Bolingbroke, 'That they could say a great deal to justify their cautious proceedings with the French; and were satisfied he would be of the same opinion if he were to see their way of negotiating with all the Allies; and how hard it was for the British Ministers to obtain, what to his Lordship seemed impossible the French should make any difficulty to grant.' What made them still more averse, was the great importunity, with which the French pressed them to conclude with them alone, of which they apprehended the consequences at home; and, to justify themselves, they had acquainted the Duke of Shrewsbury, in a letter of March 20, That, besides other considerations, their chief objection was, that though they had orders to sign a particular peace, yet their full powers under the Great Seal, only authorized them to negotiate, agree, and conclude the conditions of a good and general peace, agreeable to the interests of all and each of the Allies. The Lord Bolingbroke in his letter of the 20th of March, O. S. pretended, that he had not sagacity enough to find the objections the Plenipotentiaries had made to their first full powers. However, for their satisfaction he sent them a new Commission, and repeated to them positive orders to sign and conclude with France. By this new commission, he tells them they had a power, as before, to treat and conclude the conditions of a good and general peace, which, as his Lordship explained, was no more than to offer, jointly with the Ministers of France, the plan of a general peace to the Allies. But the difficulties of the Plenipotentiaries made the Lord Treasurer, who never failed to exert himself, when it was absolutely necessary, think it high time to interpose his authority; and accordingly, on the 31st of March, wrote to the Earl of Strafford in this manner: I must felicitate your excellency upon the success of all your zeal, and the true

1712-13. love you have shewn to your Queen, your Country, and the repose of all Europe. The remaining danger is, lest we should suffer shipwreck in the sight of Port. The Nation here are five hundred to one for peace. The warriors are driven from their out-works; the last retrenchment they have is delay; and I must say, this operates much here. The ferment begins to work; and it will be impossible to answer for the turn the House of Commons will take, if these delays provoke them farther. They all feel how many hundred thousand pounds this needless protraction costs them. We now maintain forty-nine thousand effective men by land, and thirty-thousand, within a trifle, by sea. In the mean time the merchants lie off, and will not come into Port. The amusement of stories invented by the faction, and the correspondence and encouragement that party gives to their friends to hold out, and to wait for some unhappy accident, that may unravel all which is done: Add to this, the ill-humour which will grow in members by being kept so long in town idle; and, in one word, all, that has been unsettled for many days, is not worth one day's charge England is at extraordinarily by this delay. I find this seems to be the prevailing universal opinion here; and that France has acquitted herself. The only stop is now at Utrecht. But this stop did not now remain long; and, as the Treasurer never yet appeared in vain, all further obstructions at Utrecht were after this soon removed (1). For on the 7th of April, N. S. the British Ministers declared to the Dutch and Imperial Plenipotentiaries, that they were ready, as well as the Plenipotentiaries of some other Princes, to sign their respective treaties on Tuesday the 11th of that month. The Plenipotentiaries of the Emperor immediately declared, that neither they, nor the Ministers of the Empire, were ready to sign the treaty; nor would they hearken to peace, without the restitution of Straßburg; adding, that they were ordered to make such a protestation against such a treaty of peace. The Ministers of the States deputed three members of their body, Randwyck, Vanderdussen, and Renfwoude, to go to the Hague, to receive new instructions on this important affair. They arrived there Sunday morning, and, after having conferred with the Pensionary, had a Conference with the Deputies of the States. The Pensionary communicated the same day to the States of Holland and West-Friesland what had been transacted at Utrecht; whereupon the States declared for peace. The Deputies of the States had a second Conference with their Plenipotentiaries, and the next morning their last orders were drawn up, and communicated to the States of Holland, who having approved the same, the Plenipotentiaries set out in the evening for Utrecht, with the character of Ambassadors, accompanied by Monsieur Van Spanbroeck, the new Plenipotentiary of the pro-

mont. Count Zinzendorf, who came the 10th in the morning from Utrecht to the Hague, had immediately a Conference with the Pensionary, in which he used all imaginable endeavours to have the signing of the peace put off, at least till he had received new instructions from Vienna, and declared, that if the States signed before his Master, his Imperial Majesty would immediately withdraw his troops out of the Netherlands: But, finding his reasons and representations ineffectual, he protested against this peace, as he had done before at Utrecht, whither he returned that evening. The same day in the morning, upon the return of Messieurs Randwyck, Vanderdussen, and Renfwoude, the Dutch Ministers had a Conference with the British Plenipotentiaries; and then another with those of France, at the Lord Privy-Seal's house, from four in the afternoon till two in the night, wherein was settled whatever related to the treaty of peace and commerce with the States-General. The 11th in the morning the Ministers of the Protestant Allies had a Conference together in the Town-House, to which the Marquis de Miremont, appointed by the Queen of Great-Britain, to take care of the interests of the Protestants of France, was, for form sake, invited; but the result of this consultation was only, that a representation should be made in favour of those Sufferers to the Ministers of France, which was immediately laid before them by the British Plenipotentiaries. This done, they went to Count Zinzendorf's, and communicated to him the plan, which they had agreed on with the Ministers of France, for the Emperor and Empire; having stipulated, that his Imperial Majesty should have time to consider, whether he would accept of it, or no, till the first of June, N. S. during which interval, however, France would not grant a cessation of arms; and withal declared to him, that they were going to sign the Queen's peace. After this, the British Plenipotentiaries went to the other Ministers of the Allies, to whom they made the same declaration; and, being returned to the Lord Privy-Seal's house, the French Ambassadors repaired thither, and about two in the afternoon signed, with those of Great-Britain, the treaties of peace and commerce. One instrument of the treaty was drawn up in Latin by the British Ministers; and another, on the part of the French, in their own language; each party signing first, in their respective instruments: And it was agreed, that the ratifications should be exchanged at Utrecht within four weeks. The Ministers of Savoy, who soon after came to the Lord Privy-Seal's house, signed also with those of France their Master's treaty, which was drawn up in French, and by which it was particularly stipulated, 'That his Royal Highness should not take upon him the title of King of Sicily, till after the peace was concluded and signed with Spain.' This done, all

(1) It is observable, that among all the demands that were made, upon account of any Prince or State in the Grand Alliance, none, at this time, met with the least regard from the British Court; when, at the same time, the interest of the Prince of Ursini, who, at this juncture, had a prevailing influence at the Court of Madrid, was espoused in the strongest terms. For, in the same letter, where the Lord Bolingbroke says, 'That her Majesty did not much enter into the notion of the degradation of Hanover, as a matter of any importance,' his Lordship declares, 'That the Principality, in some part of the Spanish Netherlands, with a revenue of thirty thousand crowns, demanded for the Prince of Ursini, must be made to the Emperor, and all parties concerned, a condition, sine qua non, of the general peace.' Rep. of the Com. of Sec.

1712-13. all the Ambassadors, who had signed the peace, as well as those, who intended to sign it, namely, those of Portugal, Prussia, and the States-General, went and dined at the Earl of Strafford's. As soon as dinner was over, most of those Ministers retired to their houses, to collate their respective treaties; and, afterwards returning to the Earl of Strafford's, the Portuguese Ambassadors signed their treaty, drawn up in their own tongue, about eight o'clock in the evening, as the Prussians did theirs in French about eleven; the French having insisted, that they should sign before those of the States, because, in the treaty, their Master was styled King, and acknowledged as such by France. The Ambassadors of the States did not sign till near three hours after, having not only been taken up longer than the rest in collating their treaties of peace and commerce, but endeavoured to have some expressions altered, particularly as to the title of the Emperor, who, in the instruments drawn up in French, was not styled otherwise than head of the House of Austria; but they were obliged to recede from all their pretensions. This important Negotiation being thus brought to a conclusion, the British Ministers immediately dispatched an express to Mr. St. John Secretary to the British Embassy, who, the day before, set out for the Brill, in order to carry over to Great-Britain the treaties of peace and commerce, for the Queen's ratification. At the same time, the French Ministers dispatched a Courier to Monsieur de Beringhen, who set out the 10th for Malines, in order to wait there the news of the signing of the peace. The other Ministers dispatched also expresses to their respective Courts. The States-General sent copies of the treaties to the respective Provinces, as they did likewise, to the towns of the Province of Holland in particular. But when the terms of peace were divulged, the body of the people was highly dissatisfied to find, that woollen manufactures, sugars, and some other merchandizes were excepted from the Tariff of 1664, and continued charged with high duties; being apprehensive, that by these exceptions their trade with Spain, which sets all the other branches of their commerce in motion, would in a manner be ruined.

The Imperial Ministers dissatisfied at the offers of France. Annals. On the 13th of April, Count Zinzendorf having declared to the Ministers of Great-Britain, and of the States-General, that he was to set out two days after for Germany, the British Plenipotentiaries, on the 14th, delivered to him a writing, intitled, Offers and demands of the French King, for making peace with the House of Austria and the Empire. The Imperial and other German Ministers expressed the highest indignation at their being so meanly treated, as to have terms imposed upon them by France, in relation to the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria. They also resented the slight put upon the Emperor by the French and Spaniards refusing to give him that title; and they were particularly dissatisfied with the Dutch for signing, before the return of the express sent last to Vienna. But the Dutch excused themselves, alledging the common plea of the necessity of affairs. It was now given out, that the Emperor and Empire would carry on the war, and hazard their all, rather than submit to these conditions. And, as France might turn all her force against Germany, Count Zinzendorf intimated to the Ministers of the Empire, that it would be necessary to cause, not only the Imperial troops to march from Flanders to the Rhine, but also those formerly in the pay of Great-Britain. To this purpose it may be observed, that the King of Prussia signed the peace only in that quality, and not as an Elector of the Empire, though it was said, he made a private agreement with France, to furnish no more troops than his quota, in case the Emperor and Empire should continue the war.

On the 3d of April being Good-Friday, Mr. St. John arrived at Whitehall with the treaties of peace and commerce, signed the Tuesday before between the British and French Plenipotentiaries, and the news, that the Ministers of Portugal, Savoy, Prussia, and the States-General, had likewise signed their respective treaties; which was immediately notified in the evening by popular rejoicings. Four days after, the Queen held a Council at St. James's, in which the Lord Keeper Harcourt was declared Lord-High-Chancellor of Great-Britain; and at the same time the Duke of Atol was sworn of the Privy-Council. This done, the Queen proposed to the Board the ratifying the treaties of peace and commerce: To which the Earl of Cholmondeley objected, saying, 'This matter being of the highest importance for her Majesty and her Kingdoms, as well as all Europe, it required the maturest consideration; and these treaties containing several terms of the Civil Law, in which the least equivocation might be of great consequence, and being, besides, couched in Latin and French, it seemed very necessary to have them translated into the vulgar tongue.' He was supported by another member, but, the time agreed on for the exchanging of the ratifications not admitting of delays, their opinion was over-ruled, and so the Queen ratified the treaties. The next day the White-staff, as Treasurer of the Household, was taken from the Earl of Cholmondeley, and Sir Richard Temple was removed from his command of the Regiment of Dragoons, formerly commanded by the Earl of Essex. The peace being thus signed and ratified, the Queen resolved not to defer any longer the meeting of the Parliament. Accordingly on the 9th of April, to which day it was last prorogued, she went to the House of Peers and made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Ended the last Session with my hearty thanks for the solemn assurances you had given me, by which I have been enabled to overcome the difficulties contrived to obstruct the general peace.
"I have deferred opening the Session until now, being very desirous to communicate to you, at your first meeting, the success of this important affair. It is therefore, with great pleasure, I tell you, the treaty is signed, and in a few days the ratifications will be exchanged.
"The Negotiation has been drawn into so great a length, that all our Allies have had sufficient opportunity to adjust their several interests. Though the public charge has been thereby much increased, yet I hope my people will be easy under it, since we have happily obtained the end we proposed.
"What I have done for securing the Protestant

"tant Succession, and the perfect friendship there is between Me and the House of Hanover, may convince such, who wish well to both, and desire the quiet and safety of their country, how vain all attempts are to divide us; and those, who would make a merit by separating our interests, will never attain their ill ends.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"As great a progress has been made in reducing the public expence, as the circumstances of affairs would admit.

"What force may be necessary for securing our Commerce by sea, and for Guards and Garrisons, I leave intirely to my Parliament.

"Make yourselves safe, and I shall be satisfied.

"Next to the protection of the Divine Providence, I depend upon the loyalty and affection of my people.

"I want no other guaranty.

"I recommend to your care those brave men, who have served well, by sea or land, this war, and cannot be employed in time of peace.

"I desire you to provide the supplies you shall judge requisite; and to give such dispatch, as may be necessary for your own ease and the public service.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The many advantages, I have obtained for my own subjects, have occasioned much opposition and long delay to this peace.

"It affords me great satisfaction, that my people will have it in their power, by degrees, to repair what they have suffered during so long and burdensome a war.

"The easing of our foreign trade, as far as is consistent with national credit, will deserve your care.

"And to think of proper methods for improving and encouraging our home trade and manufactures, particularly the Fishery, which may be carried on, to employ all our spare hands, and be a mighty benefit, even to the remotest parts of this Kingdom.

"Several matters were laid before you last Session, which the weight and multiplicity of "other business would not permit you to perfect. I hope, you will take a proper opportunity to give them a due consideration.

"I cannot, however, but expressly mention my displeasure at the unparalleled licentiousness in publishing seditious and scandalous libels.

"The impunity, such practices have met with, encourages the blaspheming every thing sacred, and the propagating opinions tending to the overthrow of all Religion and Government.

"Prosecutions have been ordered, but it will require some new law to put a stop to this growing evil, and your best endeavours in your respective stations, to discourage it.

"The impious practice of duelling requires some speedy and effectual remedy.

"Now we are entering upon peace abroad, let me conjure you all, to use your utmost endeavours for calming men's minds at home, that the arts of peace may be cultivated.

"Let not groundless jealousies, contrived by a faction, and fomented by a party-rage, effect that, which our foreign enemies could not.

"I pray God to direct all your consultations for his glory and the welfare of my people."

The Queen being retired, and the Commons Debate gone back to their House, the Duke of Beau-urged, that it could not be said to be general, since the Emperor, the Elector of Hanover, and other Princes and States of the Empire were not yet come into it. But they were answered, that it might justly be called general, since the major part of the Allies had signed it. After this another motion was made, that, in the address of thanks, a clause might be inserted, That her Majesty would be pleased to lay before the House the treaties of peace and commerce: But the question being put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of seventy-four against forty-three. The address of congratulation being agreed to, tho', without any approbation of the peace, it was presented to the Queen (1). The Commons observed the same caution in their address, and waved the motion for having the treaties laid before them (2).

(1) In their address, 'They returned thanks for communicating to them, that a peace was concluded; by which they hoped, with the blessing of God, that the people would, in a few years, recover themselves after so long and expensive a war; and they congratulated her Majesty upon the success of her endeavours for a general peace. They declared, that they never had the least doubt, but that her Majesty, who was the great support and ornament of the Protestant Religion, would continue to take, as she had always done, the wisest measures for securing the Protestant Succession, towards which nothing could be more necessary than the perfect friendship there was between her Majesty and the House of Hanover. And they assured her Majesty, that, as she expressed her dependance, next under God, upon the duty and affection of her people, they thought themselves bound, by the strictest ties of Religion, Loyalty, and Gratitude, to make all the dutiful returns, that could be paid by the most obedient Subjects to the most indulgent Sovereign.

(2) There was a small debate about the words, to see accomplished, which, by a great majority, were voted to stand. The address was as follows:

'We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great-Britain in Parliament assembled, beg leave, with all humility, to approach your Royal person with our unanimous acknowledgments for all the benefits we enjoy under your Majesty's most auspicious Reign.

The many and great successes, which have attended your Majesty's arms, had left nothing to be wished, but such a peace, as might be conducted by your Councils, which now we have the happiness to see accomplished. And as we are truly sensible of your Majesty's gracious and generous intentions, in undertaking that great work; so we have all possible reason to admire your 1713. Most of the Corporations and other bodies of men soon followed the example of both Houses of Parliament, in returning the Queen thanks for the peace, before they knew what that peace was. However, General Stanhope having renewed the motion for addressing the Queen, to communicate to the House the treaties of Peace and Commerce, it was carried in the affirmative, with the addition of the words, in due time, insisted on by the Court-party; and so the address met with a gracious reception, and the Queen was pleased to answer, that she intended to communicate to her Parliament the treaties this House desired, as soon as it was practicable.

After the addresses of thanks for the Peace, and a vote for a Supply, the Commons in compliance to the Court, proceeded to the stigmatizing of those that delighted in war. To this end Mr. Shippen made a report of mismanagements from the Committee, to examine the debts due to the army. They passed a slight censure on William Churchill, a Member of their House, for being, when a Commissioner for sick and wounded, a Partner in contracts relating to that office. They also made an attempt to fasten a misdemeanor on the Earl of Wharton, for taking 1000*l.* of one Hutchinjon for procuring him the office of Register of Seizures in the Customs, but it was dropped, because it was done before the last act of indemnity.

On the 28th of April the ratifications of the treaties of peace and commerce were exchanged at Utrecht between the Ministers of Great-Britain and France; and, being brought to London, by Mr. Ayscough, Chaplain and Secretary to the Earl of Strafford, the Queen on the 4th of May, the same day of the month on which the war had been proclaimed eleven years before, signed a Proclamation for publishing the peace; which was performed the next day with the usual ceremonies. The ratifications of the treaties between France and the States-General were also to have been exchanged on the 29th of April; but upon an unexpected difficulty about the Elector of Bavaria's renunciation of the Spanish Netherlands (yielded to him by King Philip) which the Dutch Ministers alledged not to be in due form, that exchange was deferred till the 12th of May, N. S. About this time most of the Ministers at Utrecht received by the post under a cover, a printed Protestation of the Pretender to the Crown of Great-Britain, who styled himself James the Third, and addressed himself to all Kings, Princes, Republicks, &c. By the date April 12, 1712, it appeared to have been drawn up a year before, and imported, 'That, since after a war so long and so pernicious to all Christendom, all parties seemed ready to come to a peace, and were speedily about to sign it, he thought it fit and necessary by this solemn protestation, to assert his undoubted right against any thing, that might be done towards the diminution of it. That he would not enlarge upon what had been unjustly done against him, since nobody could doubt of the justice of his cause. Nor was he indeed only moved with the condition of his own affairs, but, being incapable to change his affection towards his subjects, he could not, without the most sensible grief, behold, that neither their blood, nor their wealth, had hitherto been spared, to support the great injustice, that had been done him; and that they were at last reduced so far, that if a peace were made exclusive of him, they must necessarily become a prey to Foreigners. That, since he understood, that the Confederate powers had no regard to his right, he thought himself most indispensably obliged to himself, to posterity, and to his subjects, not to seem, by his silence, to consent to what was transacting to the prejudice of him, and the lawful heirs of his Kingdoms. And therefore he solemnly protested against all that might be agreed or stipulated to his prejudice, as being void by all the laws in the world.' No manner of public notice was taken of this Protestation.

Baron de Kirchner, the only Imperial Minister now at Utrecht, having received repeated orders to leave that place, the British Plenipotentiaries made their last effort to remove the difficulties, that still obstructed the conclusion of a general peace. At their request, the Imperial Minister met those of France, at the Lord Privy-Seal's House, where the French made some new overtures your steadiness in carrying it on, and overcoming the many difficulties contrived to obstruct it: And it is with the highest satisfaction we congratulate your Majesty upon the happy conclusion of this treaty; for we are so much convinced of your Majesty's tender regard to the public welfare, and the many instances of your wisdom have taught us to have so perfect a reliance upon it, that we cannot doubt but your Majesty hath procured all reasonable satisfaction for your Allies, and established the interest of your own Kingdoms in such a manner, as to make us not only secure for the future, but a flourishing and a happy people.

Your Majesty can give no higher proof of the care you take of posterity, than by the concern you are pleased to express for the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, upon which the future happiness of this Kingdom so much depends. We hope, and trust, that nothing will ever be able to interrupt the friendship between your Majesty and that illustrious Family, since the wicked designs of those, who would endeavour to separate your interests, must be too plain ever to succeed.

Your faithful Commons can never enough express the grateful sense they have of the many gracious assurances contained in your Majesty's speech; and after what your Majesty hath done to ease your subjects of the heavy burthen which before lay upon them, and after your unparalleled goodness in demanding nothing from them for the time to come, but what they themselves shall judge requisite for their own safety; the best return they can make, will be a ready and dutiful compliance with every thing you have been pleased to recommend; and they cannot fail most cheerfully to set about providing the supplies necessary for this year's service. Your Majesty's repeated Condescensions must in the strongest manner engage the hearts and affections of all your subjects to your Majesty; and we are satisfied we cannot more truly represent them, than by contributing our utmost endeavours to make your reign as prosperous, glorious, and easy to yourself, as it is beneficial and happy to your people.'

To which address the Queen returned this answer.

'That this address could not but be very agreeable to her, as it came from her loyal Commons, and as it was a continuation of those expressions of duty and affection, which they had shewn through this whole Parliament.'

The treaties of peace and commerce laid before the Parliament.
By H. C. Burnet.

The Parliament had now sat a Month, when Mr. Benson, Chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered to the House of Commons a message from the Queen, importing, 'That as it is the undoubted prerogative of the Crown to make peace and war, she had ratified the treaties of peace and commerce with France, which had been signed by her order, and had concluded a treaty with Spain, which would be signed, as soon as the Spanish Ministers were arrived there. That she determined from the first, on this extraordinary occasion, to communicate these treaties to her Parliament, and had therefore, now ordered them to be laid before the House.' After this message he presented to the House the copies of the treaties of peace and commerce made at Utrecht, with translations of them.

Substance of the treaties.
Burnet.

By the treaty of peace, the French King was bound to give neither harbour nor assistance to the Pretender, but acknowledged the Queen's title and the Protestant Succession, as it was settled by several Acts of Parliament: Dunkirk was to be razed, in a time limited, within five months, after the ratifications; but that was not to be begun, till an equivalent for it was put into the hands of France. Newfoundland, Hudson's Bay, and St. Christopher's were to be given to England; but Cape Breton was to be left to the French, with a liberty to dry their Fish on Newfoundland: This was the main substance of the articles of peace (1). The treaty of commerce settled a free trade, according to the Tariff in the year 1664, excepting some commodities, that were subjected to a new Tariff in the year 1699, which was so high, that it amounted to a prohibition: All the productions of France were to come into England under no other duties, but those that were laid on the same productions from other Countries; and, when this was settled, then Commissaries were to be sent to London, to agree and adjust all matters relating to trade: The treaty of commerce with Spain was not yet finished. As for the Allies, Portugal and Savoy were satisfied; the Emperor was to have the Duchy of Milan, the Kingdom of Naples, and the Spanish Netherlands: Sicily was to be given to the Duke of Savoy, with the title of King: And Sardinia, with the same title, was to be given to the Elector of Bavaria, in lieu of his losses: The States were to deliver up Lisle, and the little places about it: And, besides the places of which they were already possessed, they were to have Namur, Charleroy, Luxembourg, Ypres, and Newport: The King of Prussia was to have the Upper Guelder, in lieu of Orange, and the other Eitates, which the family had in Franche Comé. The Emperor was to have time to the first of June, to declare his accepting it.

The treaties being read, a day was appointed to consider of the treaty of commerce, particularly the eighth and ninth articles; by the eighth all the subjects of Great Britain and France were to enjoy, as to all duties and impositions whatever, the same privileges, which any other Nation, the most favoured, did then, or shall hereafter enjoy. By the other article, a law was to be made within two months in Great Britain, that no more customs be paid for goods brought from France than what are payable for the like goods imported from any other country in Europe. These were articles very disadvantageous to England. During King Charles the Second's reign, our trade with France was often and loudly complained of, as very prejudicial to the Nation; there was a commission appointed in the year 1674, to adjust the conditions of our commerce with that Nation; and then it appeared, in a scheme that was prepared by very able Merchants, that we lost every year a million of money by our trade thither. This was then so well received, that the scheme was entered into the journals of both Houses of Parliament, and into the books of the Custom-House: But the Court at that time favoured the interests of France so much, preferably to their own, that the trade went still on till the year 1678, when the Parliament laid, upon all French commodities, such a duty, as amounted to a prohibition, and was to last for three years, and to the end of the next Session of Parliament: At the end of the three years, King Charles called no more Parliaments; and that Act was repealed in King James's Parliament: But, during the whole last war, high duties were laid on all the productions and manufactures of France; which by this treaty were to be no higher charged, than the same productions from other countries. It was said that, if we had been as often beat by the French, as they had been by us, this would have been thought a very hard treaty; and, if the articles of our commerce had been settled, before the Duke of Ormond was ordered to separate his troops from the Confederates, the French could not have pretended to draw us into such terms, as they had insisted on since that time, because we put ourselves into their power. We were engaged by our treaty with Portugal, that their wines should be charged a third part lower than the French wines; but, if the duties were, according to this treaty of commerce, to be made equal, then, considering the difference of freight, which is more than double from Portugal, the French wines would be much cheaper; and, the Nation

Objections to them.

(1) It was observed on these articles: As to Newfoundland, it was thought that the French settling at Cape Breton, instead of Placentia, would be of great advantage to them with relation to the Fishery, which is the only thing that makes Settlements in those parts of any value. The English have always pretended, that, the first discovery of Newfoundland being made in Henry the Seventh's Time, the right to it was in the Crown of England. The French had leave given them, in King Charles the First's time, to fish there, paying tribute, as an acknowledgment of that license: It is true, they carried this much further, during the Civil wars; and this grew to a much greater height in the Reign of King Charles the Second: But, in King William's time, an Act of Parliament passed, asserting the right of the Crown to Newfoundland, laying open the trade thither to all the subjects of Great Britain, with a positive and constant exclusion of all Aliens and Foreigners. (1) The 1713. Nation generally liking them better, by this means we should not only break our treaties with Portugal, but if we did not take off their wines, we must lose their trade, which was at present the most advantageous that we drove any where: For, besides a great vent of our manufactures, we brought over yearly great returns of gold from thence; four, five and six hundred thousand pounds a year. We had brought the silk manufactures here to so great perfection, that about 300,000 People were maintained by it. For carrying this on, we brought great quantities of silk from Italy and Turky, by which people in those countries came to take off as great quantities of our manufactures: So that our demand for silk had opened good markets for our woollen goods abroad, which must fail, if our manufacture of silk at home should be lost: Which, if once we gave a free vent for silk (stuffs from France among us, must soon be the case; since the cheapness of provisions and of labour in France, would enable the French to underfell us, even at our own markets. Our linen and paper manufactures would likewise be ruined by a free importation of the same goods from France.

Notwithstanding all this, a motion was made on the day appointed, May 14, to bring in a bill to make good the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce with France. A debate arose, which lasted till ten in the evening, when it was resolved, by a great majority, that the bill should be brought in (1).

The peace had been proclaimed in London, and afterwards throughout Great-Britain, with the loudest acclamations of the people, who fondly expected great benefits from it; but it was not long before the eyes of the generality were opened. For, about the beginning of May, Signior Bruciada, the Portuguese Minister in Lon- don, in a memorial represented to the Court, 'That, in case any breach was made in the treaty concluded in 1703, whereby the duties on French wines were stipulated to be, at least, one third higher than on those of Portugal, the King, his Master, would renew the prohibition of the woollen manufactures and products of Great-Britain?' Which alarmed not only the Portugal Merchants in London, but also all persons concerned in the woollen manufacture. On the other hand, the treaties of peace and commerce having been published in print, that of commerce raised such a general clamour, as awakened the whole Nation, which before seemed to have been sunk into a lethargy. Several Gentlemen, and particularly Mr. Robert Walpole, General Stanhope, Sir Theodore Janssen, &c. exerted themselves, and published several excellent pieces, which shewed the advantages of the trade with Italy, Spain, and Portugal, to which Nations we constantly exported more than we imported from them, and brought the balance in money; whereas a trade with France would be destructive of our home-manufactures, and of our commerce with other nations. These things came to be so well understood, that, even while flattering addresses were coming to Court from all parts of England, petitions were sent up from the Towns and Counties concerned in trade, setting forth the prejudice which they apprehended from this treaty of commerce. The treaty, however, was to be supported at any rate; the persons concerned in making it, either could not, or would not, see the mistakes in it; and the nation was to be convinced, that through their great skill in trade, they had made an excellent treaty of commerce. To these ends Daniel de Foe was employed; though, in a weekly paper published some years before, called the Review, he had very often condemned the

(1) The substance of the debate on this occasion was as follows:

Mr. Arthur Moore, one of the Commissioners of trade, and whose skill and knowledge in commercial affairs, the British Ministry had chiefly relied on in drawing up the treaty in question, endeavoured to shew the great advantages, that would accrue to the Nation from a free trade with France; and Sir James Bateman, Sir Thomas Hanmer, Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Ward, Mr. Shepherd, and some others, spoke on the same side. Mr. Nicholas Lechmere endeavoured, on the contrary, to prove, that the trade with France would be very prejudicial to our woollen, silk, and paper manufactures, and to our commerce with Portugal; and he was supported, not only by General Stanhope, Mr. John Smith, Mr. Nathaniel Gould (an eminent Merchant, formerly Governor of the Bank of England) Sir Peter King, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. Wortley Montague, the Lord Castlemajor, and some others of the Whigs; but also by Sir George Newland and Mr. Robert Heyham, who had before gone with the Court. Mr. Moore, in order to make good his assertion, having enumerated the different sorts of commodities of the growth and manufacture of Great-Britain, which the French drew from hence before the two last wars, insinuating, that in all probability they would do the same again for the future, if a free trade with them were set upon an equal foot: Mr. Gould answered him, that he begged the very thing in question; and that, in his opinion, the opening a free trade with France would rather be highly detrimental to the Nation. To make this out, Mr. Gould urged, 'That, since the Revolution, the state of commerce was entirely changed; and as France had set up, and very much encouraged woollen manufactures, and made shift without several goods, which they drew from hence; so England had learned to be without the product of France, by setting up silk manufactures and paper-mills; encouraging the making of all manner of toys, &c. which saved and gained vast sums of money to the Nation, and employed an infinite Number of artificers, who would be reduced to beggary, if the importation of French goods of the same kind were allowed; because the French had their work done for less money, and consequently could sell their commodities cheaper. He added, that the most valuable branch of our trade was that to Portugal; the increase of which, of late years, was mainly owing to the great quantities of wines, that were imported from thence, and consumed in Great-Britain, instead of French wines, by reason of the high duties laid on the latter. But, if these duties were, pursuant to the treaty of commerce in question, reduced and made equal with those on Portugal wines, the importation and consumption of the latter would infallibly decrease, and thereby our profitable commerce to Portugal be in danger of being lost.' On the other hand, Sir William Wyndham took this occasion to reflect on the late Ministry, 'who in his opinion, had let slip the opportunity of making a good peace, when they had it in their power: But that a time might come, and, he hoped was not far off, when the mismanagement of the enemies to their country should be animadverted upon. As to our Portugal trade, he said, that that Kingdom would ever have occasion for the woollen manufactures and the corn of England, and consequently be obliged to take off great quantities from hence, as they did before the year 1703, even at a time, when the Court

French trade as detrimental to this Kingdom. He undertook, however, 'the cause now, and published a paper thrice a week, by the title of Mercator, or Commerce retrieved; being considerations on the state of the British trade, particularly as it respects Holland, Hanover, and the Dutch Barrier; the trade to and from France; the trade to Portugal, Spain, and the West-Indies, and the fisheries of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia: With other matters and advantages accruing to Great-Britain by the treaties of peace and commerce lately concluded at Utrecht. In this paper he undertook to prove, that the trade to France, though contrary to all experience, had always been beneficial to this Kingdom, and would be so again upon the foot of the treaty. And as he had the art of writing very plausibly, and those, who employed him, and furnished him with materials, had the command of all public papers in the Custom-House; he had it in his power to do a great deal of mischief, especially amongst such, as were unskilled in trade, and at the same time very fond of French wines, which it was then a crime to be against. Several ingenious Merchants, of long experience, and well skilled in trade, joined together to contradict the impositions of this Writer: They knew he had many heads besides the advantages of public papers to help him; and therefore thought the publication of a joint weekly paper the most feasible way to confute him, and set our trade in a clear light, because they were sensible that it was impossible for any one man to be master of so much experience, as was required to furnish materials from so many different branches of our trade, as would be touched upon in this debate. The paper they published was, in opposition to Daniel de Foe's title, called the British Merchant, or Commerce preserved, and was published twice a week (1). The person, to whom the public was chiefly obliged for this paper, and who had the greatest hand in it, was Henry Martin, who was afterwards made Inspector General of the Exports and Imports. He was assisted by Sir Charles Cooke Merchant, afterwards made Commissioner of trade; Sir Theodore Janssen, Bart. James Milner, Nathaniel Torriano, Josua Gee, Christopher Haynes, David

Martin, Merchants; and Charles King, who afterwards collected and reprinted those papers. Lord Hallifax and General Stanhope had likewise a considerable share in the encouragement of this paper, which had so great an effect, that the thoughts of the Whigs about commerce, which, at first, were represented as the result of discontent and spirit of party, appeared to be the universal sense of all traders.

The House of Commons gave an aid of two shillings in the pound, though the Ministers hoped to have carried it higher; but the Members durst not venture on that, since a new election was soon to follow the conclusion of the Session. They proceeded next to renew the duty on malt for another year; and here a debate arose, that was kept up some days in both Houses of Parliament, whether it should be laid on the whole Island. It was carried in the affirmative; of which the Scots complained heavily, as a burden, that their Country could not bear: And whereas it was said, that these duties ought to be laid equally on all the subjects of the united Kingdom, the Scots insisted on an article of the Union, by which it was stipulated, that no duty should be laid on the malt in Scotland during the war, which ought to be observed religiously. They said, it was evident, the war with Spain was not yet ended: No peace with that Crown was yet proclaimed, nor so much as signed: And though it was as good as made, and was every day expected, yet it was a maxim in the construction of all laws, that odious matters ought to be strictly understood; whereas matters of favour were to be more liberally interpreted: It was farther said on the Scots side, that this duty was, by the very words of the act, to be applied to deficiencies during the war: So this act was, upon the matter, making Scotland pay that duty during the war, from which the articles of Union did, by express words, exempt them. A great number of the English were convinced of the equity of these grounds, which the Scots went upon, but the majority was on the other side. So, when the bill had passed through the House of Commons, all the Scots of both Houses met together, and agreed to move for an act, dissolving the of Portugal had laid high duties on English goods and merchandizes. General Stanhope made hereupon a long speech, wherein, among other things, he said, 'That the affair now in question was not a party business; neither did it concern the late or the present Ministry, but the whole British Nation, and therefore, for his own part, he would freely speak his thoughts about it with the utmost impartiality. That, the peace being made, it was now preposterous to say any thing for or against it. But, that as no treaty could bind the Commons of Great-Britain to make any act or deed against their own interest; the only point to be considered was, Whether a free trade with France would be advantageous or no? And that, in order to clear that important matter, it was necessary to consult the Merchants and Manufacturers who had presented several petitions and representations about it.' This was likewise urged by Mr. John Smith, who made a motion for adjourning the debate, and taking the papers before them into consideration. But the main question being put, was carried in the affirmative by a majority of two hundred and fifty-two voices against one hundred and thirty. Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair, Sir Gilbert Dolben made his report from the Committee, and, after further debate, the Whigs, finding themselves over-powered by the Court-party, most of them went out of the House; and so it was resolved by above an hundred voices against twelve or thirteen, that a bill be brought in, to make effectual the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce and navigation between Great-Britain and France.

(1) The authors of this work, Vol. I. p. 180. 2d Edit. assert, 'that, if the 8th and 9th articles of the treaty of commerce between us and France had been rendered effectual by a law, this very thing had been more ruinous to the British Nation, than if the City of London were to be laid in ashes. This City has been once burnt to the ground; but the people were still in being. They were, notwithstanding this calamity, a constant mart for the product and manufactures of the country. But, if such a law, as that above-mentioned, had passed, France would have gone on from that moment to exhaust the treasures of the Kingdom. We should have presently lost our best markets both at home and abroad. Our Gentlemen must have felt a sudden and universal decay of their rents; and our common people must have either starved for want of work, come to the lands or the parish for subsistence, or have retired to foreign parts for bread.'

1713. the Union; they went first to the Queen, and told her how grievous, and indeed intolerable this duty would be to their Country, so that they were under a necessity to try, how the Union might be broken. The Queen seemed uneasy at the motion; she studied to divert them from it, and assured them, that her officers should have orders to make it easy to them. This was understood to imply that the duty should not be levied; but they knew this could not be depended on: So the motion was made in the House of Lords, and most of the Lords of that Nation spoke to it: They set forth all the hardships that they lay under since the Union; they had no more a Council in Scotland; their Peers at present were the only persons in the whole Island, that were judged incapable of Peerage by descent; their laws were altered in matters of the highest importance, particularly in matters of treason; and now an imposition was to be laid on their malt, which must prove an intolerable burden to the poor of that Country, and force them to drink water. Upon all these reasons, they moved for liberty to bring a bill to dissolve the Union, in which, they would give full security, for maintaining the Queen's Prerogative, and for securing the Protestant Succession. This was opposed with much zeal by the Ministers, but was supported by others; who, though they did not intend to give up the Union, yet thought it reasonable to give a hearing to this motion, that they might see how far the Protestant Succession could be secured, in case it should be entertained; but the majority were for rejecting the motion: When the malt-bill was brought up to the Lords, there was such an opposition made to it, that fifty-six voted against it, but sixty-four were for it, and so it passed (1).

The matter of the greatest consequence in this Session was, the bill for settling the commerce with France, according to the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty, which had been ordered by the Commons to be brought in. The Traders in the City of London, and those in all the other parts of England, were alarmed, with the great prejudice this would bring on the whole Nation. The Turkey Company, those that

(1) This affair more at large is thus related: During the adjournment of the Parliament for a week on account of the Whitsun-Holidays, there appeared an uneasiness in many of the Scots Members upon the disappointment of their endeavours to get their country eased of part of the Malt-Tax. Hereupon they conferred with several of the Scots Peers sitting in Parliament; and laying aside all party-distinctions, consulted together how to redress their grievances. They deputed the Duke of Argyle, the Earl of Mar, Mr. Lockhart, and Mr. Cockburne, who by word of mouth represented to the Queen, 'That their countrymen bore, with great impatience, the violation of some articles of the Act of Union; and that laying such an insupportable burthen as the Malt-Tax upon them was like to raise their discontent to such an height, as to prompt them to declare the Union dissolved.' To this unexpected remonstrance, the Queen answered, This was a precipitate resolution; and she wished they might not have reason to repent it: But, however, she would endeavour to make all things easy. The Scots Members being met again the next day, and their Deputies having made their report of her Majesty's answer, it was unanimously agreed, that before they proceeded farther, they should lay their grievances before the House of Lords. Accordingly on Thursday the 28th of May, after the Lords had adjourned the debate about the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce, the Earl of Findlater made a motion, that some day should be appointed to consider the State of the Nation: Whereupon the Lords appointed Monday the 1st of June, when all the Lords in town were summoned. The debate began between one and two, being opened by the Earl, who made the motion, and who represented the grievances of the Scots Nation, which he reduced to four heads: 'First, Their being deprived of a Privy-Council. Secondly, the laws of England in cases of treason extending to Scotland. Thirdly, The Scots Peers being incapable of being made Peers of Great-Britain, as it was adjudged and declared in the case of the late Duke of Hamilton. And, Fourthly, the Scots being subjected to the Malt-Tax, which would be the more insupportable to them now, in that they never were subjected to it, during the war, and had reason to expect to reap and enjoy the benefits of peace: Concluding, that, since the Union between the two Nations had not those good effects, as were expected from it, he therefore moved, That leave might be given to bring in a bill for dissolving the said Union, and securing the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, securing the Queen's prerogative in both Kingdoms, and preserving an entire amity, and good correspondence between the two Kingdoms.' This motion was seconded by the Earl of Mar; but opposed by the Lord North and Grey, who, in a long speech, endeavoured to shew, that the complaints of the Scots were groundless, and the dissolving the Union impracticable; not without some reflections on the poverty of the Scots Nation. He was answered by the Lord Eglington, who allowed the Scots Nation to be poor, and therefore unable to pay the Malt-Tax. The Lord North and Grey replied, 'That it was nothing but what was agreed to by the treaty of Union; the fourteenth article of which imported, that Scotland should not be charged with any imposition on malt during the war only, which was now at an end.' The Earl of Hly confessed, that there was such a clause, but that the same article imported, 'That, seeing it could not be supposed, that the Parliament of Great-Britain would ever lay any sort of burdens upon the united Kingdom, but what they should find of necessity, at that time, for the preservation and good of the Whole, and with due regard to the circumstances and abilities of every part of the united Kingdom; therefore it was agreed, that there should be no farther exemption insisted on, for any part of the united Kingdom, but that the consideration of any exemption, beyond what was already agreed on in this treaty, should be left to the determination of the Parliament of Great-Britain.' He urged, 'That, when this treaty was made, the Scots concluded the Parliament of Great-Britain would never go about to lay any imposition, that they had reason to believe grievous; and having set forth the inability of the Scots to pay the Malt-tax, concluded for the Earl of Findlater's motion. Hereupon the Earl of Peterborough made a long speech, wherein he endeavoured to shew the impossibility of dissolving the Union, saying, among other things, 'That he had often heard the Union compared to a Marriage; and, according to that notion, since it was made, it could not be dissolved by any power upon earth. That, though England, who, in this national marriage, must be supposed to be the Husband, might in some instances have been unkind to the Lady, yet she ought not presently to sue for a divorce, the rather, because she had very much mended her fortune by this match: Adding, 'That the Union was a contract, than which nothing could be more binding.' To this the Earl of Hly answered, 'That, if the Union had the same sanction as Marriage, which was an ordinance of God, he should be for observing it as religiously as that; but that he thought there was a great difference.' To which the Earl of Peterborough replied, 'He could not tell how it could be more solemn than it was, that traded to Portugal and Italy, and all who were concerned in the woollen and silk manufactures, appeared before both houses, and set forth the great mischief, that a commerce with France, on the foot of the treaty, would bring upon the Nation; while none appeared on the other side, to answer their arguments, or to set forth the advantage of such a commerce. It was manifest, that none of the trading bodies had been consulted in it; and the Commissioners for trade and plantations had made very material observations on the first project, which was sent to them for their opinion: And afterwards, when this present project was formed, it was also transmitted to that Board by the Queen's order, and they were required to make their remarks on it: But Arthur Moor, who had risen up from being a Footman without any education, to be a great dealer in trade, and was the person of that Board, in whom the Lord-Treasurer confided most, moved, that they might first read it every one a-part, and then debate it; and he desired to have the first perusal: So he took it away, and never brought it back to them, but gave it to the Lord Bolingbroke, who carried it to Paris, and there it was settled. The bill was very feebly maintained by those who argued for it; yet the majority went with the bill till the last day; and then the opposition to it was so strong, that the Ministers seemed inclined to let it fall: But it was not then known, whether this was only a feint, or whether the instances of the French Ambassador, and the engagements that our Ministers were under to that Court, prevailed for carrying it on. It was brought to the last step; and then a great many of those, who had hitherto gone along with the Court, broke from them in this matter, and beset themselves so effectually, that when it came to the last division, a hundred and eighty-five were for the except they expected it should have come from Heaven like the Ten Commandments: Animadverting, in the conclusion, on the Scots, 'as a people, that would never be satisfied: That they would have all the advantages of being united to England, but would pay nothing by their good will: And that they had more money from England, than all their estates amounted to in their own Country.' To him the Duke of Argyle replied, in a very warm speech, wherein, among other things, he said, 'That he was by some reflected on, as if he was disgusted, and had changed sides; but that he despised their persons, as much as he undervalued their judgments. That it was true, he had a great hand in making the Union: That the chief reason which moved him to it, was the securing the Protestant Succession; but that he was satisfied, that might be done as well now, if the Union were dissolved: That he spoke as a Peer of England as well as of Scotland: That he believed in his conscience, it was as much for the interest of England as of Scotland, to have it dissolved; and, if it were not, he did not expect long to have either property left in Scotland, or liberty in England. He urged, that the tax upon malt in Scotland was no less unequal, than the taxing land by the acre throughout England would be; because land is worth five or six pounds an acre about London, and not so many shillings in remote parts of the Country. That this was the case between the Scots and English malt; the latter being worth three or four shillings the bushel, the other not above one; so that if this tax were collected in Scotland, it must be done by a regiment of dragoons.' Some other Scots Peers said, 'That the end of the Union was the cultivating amity and friendship between the two Nations; but it was so far from having that effect, that they were sure, the animosities between the two Nations were now much greater than before the Union; and therefore they were of opinion, that, if the Union were dissolved, the two Nations would be better friends.' The Lord Chief-Justice Trevor urged, on the other hand, the impossibility of such a dissolution; and he was supported by the Lord-Treasurer, who said, 'That the Earl of Findlater's motion was no less strange than unexpected: That, the Union being made by two distinct Parliaments of both Kingdoms, he did not see how it could be dissolved, now the two Nations were in different circumstances, because the power that made it, was no more in being; and nothing could make it void, but the power that created it: Concluding, that, if the Scots had any grievances to complain of, there might be some other method thought of to redress them, without proceeding to that extraordinary way of dissolving the Union, which had been made in so solemn a way, and brought about with so much difficulty.' This was answered by the Earl of Nottingham, who represented the advantages of the Union, if the views, with which it was made, had been steadily pursued. He added, 'That, though the two Nations were now in other circumstances, than when the Union was made, yet the same power that was in the two Parliaments, when they were separated and distinct, was lodged in them now they were consolidated; and therefore, if they had power to make it, they certainly had it still to dissolve it: And that he knew not any thing, but what the Parliament could do, except destroying the present Constitution; which, he owned, they had not power to do. That the inconveniences which had attended the Union, could not be foreseen, till the trial was made: And, since the Scots, who were the best judges of the affairs of their Kingdom, found, that it did not answer the ends proposed, he was for dissolving it.' The Earl of Sunderland said, to the same purpose, 'That, tho' he had a hand in making the Union, yet if it had not that good effect which was expected from it, he was likewise for dissolving it.' The Lord Viscount Townshend said, 'That he was of the same opinion, provided that means could be found to secure the Protestant Succession; and therefore he desired to know, what security the Scots could give for that essential point, before they proceeded any further? To this some of the Scots Lords replied, 'That would appear when the bill was brought in: That then it was a proper time to shew what security they could give; and therefore moved, That the question might be put immediately, Whether a bill should be brought in, or not? The Earl of Nottingham desired, that another day might be appointed to consider further of a matter of such consequence, that the Lords might be better apprized of it. The Lord Halifax declared also for dissolving the Union, provided it could be made appear, that the Succession could be secured; but yet desired, that a further day might be appointed to consider of so important a matter. And the Earls of Mar and Loudon, who were before for putting the question immediately, declared themselves better satisfied with that Lord's reasons. There were several other speeches made both by the English and Scots Lords, particularly by the Earl Paulet, and the Earls of Scarborough and Scarsdale. And it is observable, that, when the danger England would be in from the Pretender, if the Union were dissolved, was urged, the Lord Townshend answered, 'That the Queen, Lords, and Commons of England, if joined in one interest, need fear no enemy in the world; and therefore ought to despise the Pretender and all his abettors.' The Duke of Argyle, having mentioned the Pretender, said, 'He knew not what appellation to give him, his name being now as uncertain as his parents.' But the Earl of Scarsdale called him the Prince, or, added he, the Pretender, which you will. Upon the whole matter, all the English Court Lords were against dissolving the Union; and, on the other hand, such Whig Peers, as appeared

Address of thanks for the treaties of peace and commerce. June 26.

The rejecting this bill being an express condemnation of the treaty of commerce, and laying the Managers of it open to future inquiries, the Ministry used their utmost efforts to procure a palliative address from the Commons; which the majority of that House were the more ready to come into, because the Whigs began to exult, as if they had already triumphed over their adversaries. Sir Thomas Hanmer, by whose influence chiefly the bill had been lost, was engaged to make a motion for an address, returning her Majesty the humble thanks of this House, for the great care she had taken of the security and honour of her Kingdoms in the treaty of peace; and also, for what she had done in the treaty of commerce with France, by laying so good a foundation for the interests of her people in trade: And humbly to desire her Majesty, that she would be pleased to appoint Commissioners, to treat with Commissioners on the part of France, for adjusting such matters, as should be necessary to be settled in the treaty of commerce between her Majesty and France; that the treaty might be explained and perfected, for the good and welfare of her people.

Many of the Members, who voted against the bill, being absent, it was carried for the address by a majority of one hundred and fifty-six voices against seventy-two: Whereupon General Stanhope made a motion, 'to represent in the address the sense of the House, that her Majesty's Commissioners, who were to treat of the commerce between Great-Britain and France, should insist, that liberty be given to her Majesty's subjects to trade to all the ports in the French King's Dominions.' But this was rejected.

The address being presented to the Queen by the whole House, she 'thanked them most heartily for an address, which so fully expressed their approbation of the treaties of peace and commerce with France: Adding, that it was with no small difficulty, that so great advantages in trade were obtained for her subjects; and that she would readily comply with their desires, in continuing her utmost care to secure the benefits she had stipulated for her people.' This was very surprizing, since the House of Commons had sufficiently shewn, how little they were pleased with the treaty of commerce, by their rejecting the bill, which was offered to confirm it; and this was insinuated in their address itself. But it was pleasantly said, that the Queen answered them, according to what ought to have been to be for it, had principally in view the fomenting the discontents of the Scots, in order to incline them to chuse, at the next election, such representatives as should oppose the present Ministry. The question being put upon the Earl of Findlater's motion, it was carried in the negative by four voices, there being fifty-four Lords present on each side; and seventeen proxies for the negative, and only thirteen for the affirmative. It is remarkable, that the Lord-Treasurer having, in the course of this debate, advanced, 'That, though the malt-tax were laid, it might be afterwards remitted by the Crown, and not levied,' the Earl of Sunderland said, 'He wondered such expressions, as tended to establish a despotic dispensing power, and arbitrary Government, should come from that noble Lord.' To this, the Lord-Treasurer said, 'That his family had never been for promoting and advising arbitrary measures, as others had done? Which the Earl of Sunderland taking to be a reflection upon his father, he not only vindicated him, but added, 'That the other Lord's family was hardly known in those days.' Pr. H. L.

(1) The proceedings at large were as follow: On the 9th of June, the Commons, in a Grand Committee, took that bill into consideration, Sir Robert Davaers being in the Chair; and heard Mr. Cooke, a Merchant, who, in behalf of the Levant Company, made a long speech; wherein, with great solidity of reason, he shewed, how detrimental the opening a trade with France would be to the British woollen and silk manufactures, and to all the branches of our trade. The Merchants being withdrawn, the Commons took their allegations into consideration; and, among the rest, General Stanhope, to corroborate what Mr. Cooke had alledged, quoted the preamble of an act of Parliament, made in the thirteenth year of King Charles the Second, which runs thus: 'Forasmuch as it has been by long experience found, that the importing French wines, brandy, linnen, silk, salt, and paper, and other commodities of the growth, product, or manufactures of the Territories and Dominions of the French King, has much exhausted the treasure of this Nation, lessened the value of the native commodities and manufactures thereof, and caused great detriment to this Kingdom in general: Be it therefore enacted, &c.' Hereupon the Speaker, supposing that Mr. Stanhope had made a mistake, said, There was no such thing in that act. But Mr. Stanhope insisted, that the Clerk should read the said act; and, his quotation appearing to be right, he and other Members animadverted with some vehemence on the Speaker's blunder. At last, the debate cooled, and was put off till the next day; and it was resolved, that the Petitioners, who had not been yet, should then be heard.

On the 10th of June, the Queen came to the House of Peers, and, the Commons attending, her Majesty gave the Royal assent to the act for continuing the duties on malt, &c. the act to revive and continue the act for taking and stating the public accounts, &c. and to some other private and public bills. The Commons being returned to their House, and having resolved themselves into a Grand Committee upon the bill relating to the treaty of commerce, the Spanish, Italian, and Portugal Merchants, and the Weavers of London, were admitted to be heard upon their several petitions. Mr. Torriani, who spoke in behalf of the Spanish trade, having animadverted on the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce, and mentioned the tenth and eleventh as relating to the two former, some Court-Members were offended at it; and, after he had done speaking, moved the Committee, that a mark of their displeasure might be set upon him. But General Stanhope, Mr. Lechmere, Sir Peter King, and Mr. John Smith said, 'That, unless they gave the Merchants full liberty of speech, the House would never be able to form a right judgment on that important affair; and they hoped, that no man should be reprimanded for standing up for the trade of Great-Britain.' This, with a noble spirit, which appeared in the House on behalf of the Merchants, by the great number of Members, both Tory and Whig, who, all at once, stood up to defend Mr. Torriani, made the Courtiers drop that matter; and then Mr. Wyatt spoke for the Italian Merchants, Mr. Milner for the Portugal trade, and Colonel Lekeux for the London Weavers. The Merchants being withdrawn, the Speaker resumed the Chair; and it was resolved, that the Grand Committee should, the next day, consider further of the bill, and that the other Petitioners be then heard. It was also ordered, that the Ministers of the Levant Company, and all memorials, petitions, representations, schemes of trade, and papers relating thereunto, that were either before the Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, or before the Commissioners of the 1713. been in their address, and not according to what was in it. Besides, it was observable, that her promise, to maintain what was already stipulated, did not at all answer the prayer of their address. However, the Speaker having, early the next day, reported the Queen's answer to a very thin House, it was unanimously resolved to return her thanks for it.

about the equivalent for Dunkirk.

As it did not appear in the treaty of peace, what equivalent the King of France was to have for Dunkirk, the Commons addressed the Queen, desiring to know what that equivalent was. Some weeks passed before they had an answer; but, at last, the Queen by a message said, that in pursuance to the treaties, as well between her and the French King, as between that King and the States, the equivalent to be given for the demolition of Dunkirk was already in the hands of his most Christian Majesty. This still left the matter in the dark, no further explanation being made of it; however, though many Members were dissatisfied with this dubious answer, the majority acquiesced in it. At the same time the Queen being also addressed 'for an account of what she had stipulated for the sake of Great-Britain in Flanders, and how the same was secured, the report of the Commissioners of trade about this matter was laid before the Commons; which being read, an address was presented to her, 'That she would take care, the towns in Flanders in her possession be not evacuated, till those who were to have the Sovereignty of the Spanish Netherlands agreed to such articles for regulating trade, as might put the subjects of Great-Britain upon an equal foot with those of any other Nation.' To this she returned a favourable answer.

This was all that passed in this Session of Parliament with relation to the peace. It was once apprehended, that the Ministers would have moved for an act, or at least for an address, approving the peace, but no such motion was made (1).

the Customs, relating to the trade between England and France, be laid before the House.

The next day, June 11, the Grand Committee heard several Petitioners, and read many petitions, and other papers; and, two days after, a clause was ordered to be inserted in the bill, declaring, 'That the privileges, liberties, and immunities, as to all duties, impositions, or customs relating to commerce, or to any other right whatsoever, that had been, or might be granted by France, with respect to the subjects, goods, or merchandizes, of any foreign Nation, should be understood to extend as well to the four species of goods, excepted in the ninth article from the Tariff of 1664, as to all other merchandizes whatsoever imported into France by the subjects of Great-Britain. Then the Commons, in a Grand Committee, made a further progress in the bill, and went through it on the 15th of June. Three days after, Sir Robert Davaers reported the amendments made to the bill; which, with some others, were agreed to by the House. Then a motion being made, that the bill be ingrossed, it occasioned a warm debate from three o'clock in the afternoon till near eleven at night. General Stanhope, Sir Peter King, Mr. Gould, Mr. Hampden, and some others, shewed the disadvantage of an open trade with France, upon the foot of the last treaty of commerce: And the Member, who spoke most in favour of the bill, was the same, who had been chiefly employed in that treaty, Mr. Arthur Moore; but, some of his arguments being strained and precarious, the majority even of his own party adhered to the opinion of Sir Thomas Hanmer, who made a long and elaborate speech, wherein, among other things, he said, 'That, before he had fully examined the affair in question, he had given his vote for bringing in the bill; but, that having afterwards maturely weighed and considered the allegations of the Traders and Manufacturers in their several petitions and representations, he was convinced, that the passing of it would be of great prejudice to the woollen and silk manufactures of this Kingdom; consequently increase the number of the poor, and, in the end, affect the land. That, while he had the honour to sit in that House, he would never be blindly led by any Ministry; neither, on the other hand, was he biased by what might weigh with some men, viz. the fear of losing their elections. But that the principles, upon which he acted, were the interest of his Country, and the conviction of his judgment; and, upon these two considerations alone, he was against the bill.' This speech made a great impression on many of the Members; and, Mr. Aylmer, one of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and Mr. Francis Annesley, one of the Commissioners of the public accounts, having spoke also against the bill, the question, Whether it should be ingrossed, was at last carried in the negative, by a majority of one hundred and ninety-four voices, against one hundred and eighty-five. It was observed, that, of the four Members for the City of London, one only, Sir William Withers, voted for the bill; and that Sir Richard Hoare, then Lord-Mayor, Sir George Newland, and Sir John Coss, voted against it; as did also the two Members for Westminster, Mr. Medlicot, and Mr. Thomas Croft. On the other hand, it was given out that the Lord-Treasurer, foreseeing the ill effects of passing such a bill at this juncture, wrote, the night before, a letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons, desiring him to use his interest, that it might drop; which step he might probably be induced to take from the opposition the bill was like to meet with in the House of Lords; where, that very afternoon, July 17, the Earls of Anglesey and Abington, and some other Peers, had declared against it. However, some suspected either the reality or true design of such a letter, because most of the Court and Sets Members voted for the bill. Pr. H. C.

(1) Bishop Burnet says, that, if such a motion had been made he would have spoken the following speech, being the only one he ever prepared beforehand, which he has inserted in his history, in order to deliver down to posterity his thoughts of this great transaction.

'My Lords, this matter now before you, as it is of the greatest importance, so it may be seen in very different lights; I will not meddle with the political view of it; I leave that to persons, who can judge and speak of it much better than I can: I will only offer to you what appears to me, when I consider it, with relation to the rules of morality and religion; in this I am sure I act within my proper sphere. Some things stick so with me, that I could have no quiet in my conscience, nor think I had answered the duty of my function, if I did not make use of the freedom of speech, that our constitution and the privileges of this House allow me: I am the more encouraged to do this, because the bringing those of our order into public councils, in which we have now such a share, was originally intended for this very end, that we should offer such considerations, as arise from the rules of our holy religion, in all matters that may come before us. In the opening my sense of things, I may be forced to use some words, that may perhaps appear severe: I cannot help it, if the nature of these affairs is such, that I cannot speak plainly of them, in a softer strain: I intend not to reflect on any person: And I am sure I have such a profound respect for the Queen, that no part of what I may say, can be understood to reflect on her in any sort: Her intentions are, no doubt, as she declares

 Burnett.
 Fr. H. C.

The House of Commons was, as to all other things, except the affair of commerce, so entirely in the hands of the Ministers, that they ventured on a new demand of a very extraordinary nature, which was made in as extraordinary a manner. The civil list, which was estimated at 600,000 l. a year, and was given for the ordinary support of the Government, did far exceed it. And this was so evident, that, during the three first years of the Queen's Reign, 100,000 l. was every year applied to the war; 200,000 l. was laid out in building of Blenheim-House; and the entertaining the Palatines had cost the Queen 100,000 l. So there was apparently a large overplus, beyond what was necessary towards the support of the Government. Yet these extraordinary expences had put the ordinary payments into such an arrear, that, at Midsummer, 1710, the Queen owed 510,000 l. But, upon a new account, this was brought to be 80,000 l. less; and, at that time, there was an arrear of 190,000 l. due to the civil list: These two sums amounting to 270,000 l. the debt that remained, was but 240,000 l. Yet now, in the end of the session, when upon rejecting the bill of commerce, most of the Members were gone into the Country, so that there were not one hundred and eighty left, a message was sent, on the 25th of June, to the Commons, from the Queen, 'acquainting them with the difficulties, which, in a particular manner, she lay under, by the debts contracted in her civil Government, occasioned by several extraordinary expences formerly incurred; so that she thought herself obliged, in justice to many creditors, to order an estimate to be laid before them of what was owing on the civil list, in the year 1710. Adding, she had used unexampled parsimony, to remove, if possible, this burden from herself; but, that the granting away, and lessening some part of her revenue by Parliament, having made that impracticable, she therefore hoped, that they who on all occasions, had shewed themselves so well-affected to her, would not be unwilling to empower her to raise such a sum of money on the civil list funds, as might enable her to discharge the debts, and settle the expence to be regularly paid for the future. With this message was presented to the House an estimate of the debts owing to the several heads of expence about Midsummer, 1710; to which Mr. John Smith, one of the Tellers of the Exchequer, having raised some objections, saying, in vindication of the late Ministry, 'That to his certain knowledge, the debts of the civil list, in the month of August, 1710; did not amount to one hundred and fifty thousand pounds; for the payment of part of which there were some monies standing out, besides great quantities of tin, whereas, by the estimate now laid before them, the debts to Midsummer 1710, that is, about two months before, were made to amount to four hundred thousand pounds.' A motion was then made to address the Queen for an account of the arrears of the civil list funds, standing out at Midsummer 1710: And also, for an account of the debts of the civil list, as they were at this time, and of the arrears of the civil list funds to pay the same: But this was rejected, to the great surprise of many. On the contrary, a bill for enabling the Queen to raise five hundred thousand pounds on the civil list revenues, to be applied towards payment of such debts and arrears owing to her servants, tradesmen and others, was read, June 30, a second time, and committed. After this, the motion made some days before, being again proposed with better success, it was resolved to address the Queen, first, for 'an account of the debts on the civil list to Midsummer declares them to be, all for the good and happiness of her people; but it is not to be supposed, that she can read long treaties, or carry the articles of them in her memory: So, if things have been either concealed from her, or misrepresented to her, She can do no Wrong: And, if any such thing has been done, we know on whom our Constitution lays the blame.

The treaties that were made some years ago, with our Allies are in print; both the Grand Alliance, and some subsequent ones: We see many things in these, that are not provided for by this peace; it was in particular stipulated, that no peace should be treated, much less concluded, without the consent of the Allies. But, before I make any observations on this, I must desire you will consider how sacred a thing the public faith, that is engaged in Treaties and Alliances, should be esteemed.

I hope, I need not tell you, that even Heathen Nations valued themselves upon their fidelity, in a punctual observing of all their treaties, and with how much infamy they branded the violation of them: If we consider that which revealed religion teaches us to know, that man was made after the image of God, the God of all truth, as we know who is the father of lies; God hates the deceitful man, in whose mouth there is no faithfulness. In that less perfect religion of the Jews, when the Gibeonites had, by a fraudulent proceeding, drawn Jeshua and the Israelites into a league with them; it was sacredly observed; and the violation of it, some ages after, was severely punished. And, when the last of the Kings of Judah shook off the fidelity, to which he had bound himself to the King of Babylon, the Prophet thereupon said with indignation, Shall he break the oath of God, and prosper? The swear- ing deceitfully is one of the worst characters; and He who swears to his own hurt, and changes not, is among the best. It is a maxim of the wisest of Kings, that the throne is established in righteousness. Treaties are of the nature of oaths; and, when an oath is asked to confirm a treaty, it is never denied. The best account that I can give of the disuse of adding that sacred seal to treaties, is this:

The Popes had for some ages possessed themselves of a power, to which they had often recourse, of dissolving the faith of treaties, and the obligation of oaths: The famous, but fatal story of Ladislaus, King of Hungary, breaking his faith to Amurath the Turk, by virtue of a papal dispensation, is well known. One of the last publick acts of this sort, was, when Pope Clement the Seventh absolved Francis the First, from the treaty made and sworn to at Madrid, while he was a prisoner there: The severe revenge that Charles the Fifth took of this, in the sack of Rome, and in keeping that Pope for some months a prisoner, has made Popes more cautious, since that time, than they were formerly: This also drew such heavy but just reproaches, on the Papacy, from the Reformers, that some stop seems now to be put to such a barefaced protection of perjury. But the late King told me, that he understood from the German Protestant Princes, that they believed the Confessors of Popish Princes had faculties from Rome, for doing this as effectually, though more secretly: He added, that they knew it went for a maxim among Popish Princes, that their word and faith bound them as they were men, and members of society; but that their oaths, being acts of religion, were subject to the direction of their Confessors; and that they, apprehending this, did, in all their treaties

1713. mer 1710. And, secondly, for 'a yearly account of the neat produce of the civil list funds, since her Accession to the Throne.' This last address was made upon a suggestion, that the civil list funds yielded now above eight hundred and fifty thousand pounds. But, whether this was so or not, it is certain, no answer was returned to the address.

Reasons against it. The bill for raising the 500,000 l. met with great opposition, as it appeared to be of bad consequence, since the granting of such demands to one Prince would be a precedent to grant the like to all future Princes; and as the account of the Queen's debts was deceitfully stated, so it was known, that the funds, set off for the civil list, would increase considerably in times of peace. However, though there was a great superiority in point of argument against the bill, there was a considerable majority for it. And all people concluded, that the true end of getting so much money into the hands of the Court, was to furnish their creatures sufficiently for carrying their elections.

But it was granted.

The Lords were sensible, that the method of procuring this Supply was contrary to their privileges, since all publick Supplies were either asked from the Throne, or by a message sent to both Houses at the same time. This practice was inquired into by the Lords: No precedents came up to it; but some came up so near it, that nothing could be made of the objection. But the Ministers apprehending, that an opposition would be made to the bill, if it came up alone, got it consolidated with another of 1,200,000 l. that was before them. And the weight of these two joined together made them both pass in the House of Lords, without opposition.

Address to get the Pretender removed. Pr. H. L.

While this was in agitation, the Earl of Wharton moved in the House of Peers, 'That an address be presented to the Queen, that she would use her most pressing instances with the Duke of Lorraine, and with all the Princes and States in amity or correspondence with her, not to receive, or suffer to continue in their Dominions, the Pretender to the Imperial Crown of these Realms.' Several Members being surprized at this unexpected motion (which was designed to try the inclinations and affections of some persons) there was a pause for a long while. At last, the Lord Norb and Grey broke silence, and endeavoured to have that motion laid aside; representing, that such an address would shew a distrust either of the Queen, or of the Ministers: And that her Majesty would be puzzled what to do, in case the Princes and States in amity with her, should be unwilling to comply with her instances, since it would not be in her power to compel them: Concluding with this question, 'Where would they have the Pretender reside, since most, if not all the powers in Europe, were in amity with her Majesty?' To this the Earl of Peterborough answered, 'That, since he began his studies in Paris, the fittest place for him to improve himself was Rome.' After some warm expressions between the Earl of Wharton and the Lord-Treasurer, the motion made by the Earl was carried; and on the 2d of July, the House of Lords attended the Queen with their address. To which she answered, 'That she took extreme kindly their address; and the thanks they gave her for what she had done, for establishing the Protestant Succession. That she would repeat her instances to have that person removed, according to their desire: And that she promised herself, they would concur with her, that, if they could cure their animosities and divisions at home, it would be the most effectual method to secure the Protestant Succession.' This answer seemed to im-

with the Princes of that religion, depend upon their honour, but never asked the confirmation of an oath, which had been the practice of former ages. The Protestants of France thought they had gained an additional security, for observing the edict of Nantes, when the swearing to observe it was made a part of the coronation oath: But it is probable, this very thing undermined and ruined it.

Grævius, Puffendorf, and others who have wrote of the law of Nations, lay this down for a rule, that the nature of a treaty, and the tie that arises out of it, is not altered by the having, or not having an oath; the oath serves only to heighten the obligation. They do also agree in this, that Confederacies do not bind States, to carry on a war to their utter ruin; but, that Princes and States are bound to use their utmost efforts in maintaining them: And it is agreed by all, who have treated of these matters, that the common enemy, by offering to any one Confederate all his pretensions, cannot justify his departing from the Confederacy; because it was entered into with that view, that all the pretensions, upon which the Confederacy was made, should be insisted on, or departed from, by common consent.

It is true, that in Confederacies, where Allies are bound to the performance of several articles, as to their quota's or shares, if any one fails in the part he was bound to, the other Confederates have a right to demand a reparation for his non-performance: But, even in that case, Allies are to act as friends, by making allowances for what could not be helped, and not as enemies by taking advantages, on design to disengage them from their Allies. It is certain, Allies forfeit their right to the Alliance, if they do not perform their part: But the failure must be evident, and an expostulation must be first made: And, if upon satisfaction demanded, it is not given, then a Protestation should be made, of such non-performance; and the rest of the Confederates are at liberty, as to him who fails on his part: These are reckoned among the customs and laws of Nations: And, since nothing of this kind has been done, I cannot see how it can be made out, that the tie of the confederacy, and by consequence, that the public faith has not been first broken on our side.

My Lords, I cannot reconcile the carrying on a treaty with the French, without the knowledge and concurrence of the other Confederate States and Princes, and the concluding it without the Consent of the Emperor, the principal Confederate; not to mention the visible uncalinefs, that has appeared in the others, who seem to have been forced to consent, by declarations, if not by threatenings; from hence I say, I cannot reconcile this, with the articles of the Grand Alliance, and the other later treaties, that are in print: This seems to come within the charge of the Prophet against those who deal treacherously with those who had not dealt treacherously with them; upon which the threatening that follows may be justly apprehended: It will have a strange sound among all Christians, but more particularly among the Reformed, when it is reported, that the Plenipotentiary of the Head of the Reformed Princes said openly to the other Plenipotentiaries, that the Queen held herself free from all her Treaties and Alliances: If this be set for a precedent, here is a short way of dispensing with the public faith; and

1713. port, that the Queen had already pressed the Duke of Lorrain to remove the Pretender; though the Ministers in the House of Lords, and particularly the Duke of Buckingham, President of the Council, acknowledged, that they knew of no applications made to the Duke of Lorrain, and therefore thought the words of the answer related only to the instances the Queen had used, to get the Pretender to be sent out of France. But the natural signification of the words seeming to relate to the Duke of Lorrain, the Earl of Sunderland made a motion for a second address, which was supported by the Earl of Nottingham; and, after some opposition, it was ordered, 'That an address be presented to the Queen, to thank her for her answer to their address, and for the assurances she had given them, of repeating her instances for removing the Pretender; and to express their surprize, that such instances had not had their full effect, notwithstanding the French King, and the King of Spain, had shewn their compliance with her desires on that occasion: And to assure her, that this House would support her, in whatever she should judge proper for obtaining a demand, which was so warranted by the laws of Nations, and so necessary for the honour and safety of her Majesty, and for the present and future peace and quiet of the people.' All the answer brought to this address was, that her Majesty received it graciously. Though applications of this nature were known to be ungrateful both to the Queen and her Ministers, yet, on the 1st of July, General Stanhope made a motion in the House of Commons, to the same purpose with that of the Earl of Wharton in the House of Peers, and was seconded by Mr. Lechmere. The only objection, against it, was made by Sir William Whitlocke, who said, he remembered, 'That the like address was formerly made to the Protector, for having Charles Stuart removed out of France; notwithstanding which, that Prince was, some time after, restored to his Father's Throne.' But, the Members, who were suspected of favouring the Pretender, being unwilling to discover their inclination in so critical a juncture, when the Parliament was so near expiring, and a new election coming on, it was, according to Mr. Stanhope's motion, resolved unanimously,

'That an address be presented to her Majesty, acknowledging the great care she had always taken, particularly in the late treaties of peace and guaranty, to prevent the Pretender to her Throne being in a condition to disturb these Realms; and to beseech her, that she would use the most speedy and pressing instances with the Duke of Lorrain, and with all other Princes in amity with her, that they would not, under any pretext whatsoever, receive, or suffer to continue within their Dominions, the person, who, in defiance of her Majesty's most undoubted title to the Crown, and the settlement thereof in the Illustrious House of Hanover, had assumed the title of King of these Realms; and, to assure her, that the Commons of Great-Britain would, on all occasions, support her in such steps, as should be necessary towards rendering those instances effectual.' The address, being prepared and approved, was, July 8, presented by the whole House to the Queen, who coldly told them, 'She thanked them for it, and would give directions according as they desired.' Which, however, was not complied with till two or three months after, at the solicitation of the Lord-Treasurer. It was generally believed, that the Duke of Lorrain did not consent to receive the Pretender, till he sent one over to know the Queen's pleasure upon it, of which he was very readily informed.

Those, who inquired into the reasons of these addresses against the Pretender, rightly ascribed them, not only to the good reception he met with in Lorrain, but also to the affection, which many shewed openly for him in Great-Britain. To this purpose it is remarkable, that two addresses were about this time presented to the Queen by Sir Hugh Paterson, introduced by the Earl of Mar, and afterwards inserted in the London Gazette. The first, of the Magistrates and Town-Council of the Burgh of Inverness in North Britain, contained the following paragraphs: 'We, without reserve, depend on your Majesty's wisdom in securing our Religion, and the Succession to the Hereditary Crown of Great-Britain in the family of your Royal Progenitors, the most ancient line of Succession in the world; being as much convinced, that our guaranty is intirely in your hands, as your serene Majesty does if this was spoken by one of our Prelates, I am afraid it will leave a heavy reproach on our Church; and, to speak freely, I am afraid it will draw a much heavier curse after it. My Lords, there is a God in Heaven, who will judge all the world, without respect of persons: Nothing can prosper without his blessing: He can blast all the counsels of men, when laid in fraud and deceit, how cunningly soever they may be either contrived or disguised: And I must think that a peace made in opposition to the express words of so many treaties, will prove a curse instead of a blessing to us: God is provoked by such proceedings, to pour heavy judgments on us, for the violation of a faith so often given, which is so openly broken: By this our Nation is dishonoured, and our Church disgraced: And I dread to think, what the consequence of those things is like to prove. I would not have expressed myself in such a manner, if I had not thought, that I was bound to it by the duty that I owe to Almighty God, by my zeal for the Queen, and the Church, and by my love to my Country. Upon so great an occasion, I think my post in the Church and in this House lays me under the strictest obligations to discharge my conscience, and to speak plainly without fear or flattery, let the effect of it, as to myself, be what it will: I shall have the more quiet in my own mind, both living and dying, for having done that, which seemed to me an indispensable duty.

Two remarkable addresses in favour of limited Succession.

I hope this House will not bring upon themselves, and the Nation, the blame and guilt of approving that, which seems to be much more justly censurable: The reproach that may belong to this treaty, and the judgments of God, that may follow on it, are now what a few only are concerned in. A national approbation is a thing of another nature; the publick breach of faith, in the attack that was made on the Smyrna fleet forty years ago, brought a great load of infamy on those, who advised and directed it; but they were more modest than to ask a publick approbation of so opprobrious a fact: It lay on a few; and the Nation was not drawn in to a share in the guilt of that, which was then universally detested, though it was passed over in silence: It seems enough, if not too much, to be silent on such an occasion. I can carry my compliances no further.' Burnet, Vol. II. 623.

1713. does place yours in your people.' The other address, from the Town-Council and Inhabitants of the Loyal Burgh of Nairn; had this passage in it: 'We know not with what modesty we can presume to address your Majesty in the matter of Succession, lest we should seem to call in question your Majesty's unquestionable prudence, or the faithfulness of your Majesty's Council: And therefore we sincerely declare, that our utmost wishes reach no further, than that our posterity may reap the effects of your Majesty's wise choice, while we think ourselves happy under your Majesty's Administration all our days.' But, on the other hand, an address from the City of Glasgow, in a quite different strain as to the Succession, was presented to the Queen by the Members for that City, introduced by the Duke of Argyle.

Thanksgiving for the peace.
July 7.

The Queen having appointed the 7th of July for a public thanksgiving, for the safe and honourable peace lately concluded, and invited her Parliament to attend her to St. Paul's, both Houses went with the usual State; but the Queen not having intirely recovered her strength since her last fit of the gout, she could not be present at that solemnity. The Whigs were absent for another cause. In the evening there were great bonfires and illuminations throughout the Cities of London and Westminster, and magnificent fireworks were played off on the Thames over-against Whitehall.

July 16.
Fr. H. C.

On the 16th of July, the Queen came to the House of Peers to pass the bills, and put an end to the Session, when she made the following speech to the Parliament:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's speech to both Houses.

"I Come now to put an end to this Session with great satisfaction, and return you all my hearty thanks for the good service you have done to the public.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I must particularly thank you for the Supplies you have now given: I will take care to apply them, as far as they will reach, to satisfy the services you have voted.

"I hope, at the next meeting, the affair of commerce will be so well understood, that the advantageous conditions, I have obtained from France, will be made effectual for the benefit of our trade.

"I cannot part with so good and so loyal an House of Commons, without expressing how sensible I am of the affection, zeal, and duty, with which you have behaved yourselves; and I think myself therefore obliged to take notice of those remarkable services you have performed.

"At your first meeting you found a method, without farther charge to my people, to ease them of the heavy load of more than nine millions; and the way of doing it may bring great advantage to the Nation.

"In this Session you have enabled me to be just in paying the debts to my servants.

"And, as you furnished Supplies for carrying on the war, so you have strengthened my hands in obtaining a peace.

"Thus you have shewed yourselves the true representatives of my loyal Commons, by the just regard you have paid to the good of your Country and my Honour. These proceedings will, I doubt not, preserve the memory of this Parliament to posterity.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"At my coming to the Crown, I found a war prepared for me. God has blessed my arms with many victories, and at last has enabled me to make them useful by a safe and honourable peace.

"I heartily thank you for the assistance you have given me therein, and I promise myself, that, with your concurrence, it will be lasting.

"To this end I recommend it to you all, to make my subjects truly sensible what they gain by the peace; and that you will endeavour to dissipate those groundless jealousies, which have been so industriously fomented amongst us, that our unhappy divisions may not weaken, and in some sort endanger, the advantages I have obtained for my Kingdoms.

"There are some (very few, I hope) who will never be satisfied with any Government: It is necessary therefore, that you shew your love to your Country, by exerting yourselves, to obviate the malice of the ill-minded, and to undeceive the deluded.

"Nothing can establish peace at home, nothing can recover the disorders, that have happened during so long a war, but a steady adhering to the Constitution in Church and State.

"Such, as are true to these principles, are only to be relied on; and, as they have the best title to my favour, so you may depend upon my having no interest nor aim, but your advantage, and the securing of our religion and liberty.

"I hope, for the quiet of these Nations, and the universal good, that I shall next winter meet my Parliament resolved to act upon the same principles, with the same prudence, and with such vigour, as may enable me to support the liberties of Europe abroad, and reduce the spirit of faction at home."

Few speeches from the Throne have been more severely reflected on than this was. It seemed strange, that the Queen, who did not pretend to understand matters of trade, should pass such a censure on both Houses, for their not understanding the affair of commerce; since at the bar of both Houses, and in the debates within them upon it, the interest of the Nation did appear so visibly to be contrary to the treaty of commerce, that it looked like a contempt put upon them, to represent it as advantageous to England, and to rank all those, who opposed it, among the ill-minded, or at least among the deluded. Nor did it escape censure, that she should affirm, that the Nation was by the Parliament eased of the load of nine millions, without any further charge, since the Nation must bear the constant charge of interest at six per Cent. till the capital should be paid off.

The sharpness, with which she expressed her self, was singular, and not very well suited to her dignity or sex: Nor was it well understood, what could be meant by her saying, that she found 1713. found a war prepared for her at her coming to the Crown; since she herself began it upon the addresses of both Houses. It was also observed, that there was not in all her speech one word of the Pretender, or of the Protestant Succession. But that, which made the greatest impression upon the whole Nation, was, that this speech discovered plainly, that the Court was resolved to have the bill of commerce pass in the next Session. All people concluded, that the Ministers were under engagements to the Court of France to get it settled; and this was taken to be the sense of the Queen's words concerning the making the peace lasting.

After this speech both Houses were prorogued to the 28th, but never to meet again, being dissolved before that day came. And thus ended the third and last Session of the third British Parliament, which some have distinguished by the epithet of pacific. It may however be observed, that how far soever the Commons carried their obsequiousness to the Ministers in the affair of peace; yet the majority could not be prevailed with to approve the treaty of commerce, so destructive to the trade of England, (1).

Rejoicings upon the expiration of Sacheverel's sentence.

The sentence of the House of Lords, by which Dr. Sacheverel was forbid to preach during the space of three years, expiring on the 23d of March, that day was celebrated in London, and in several parts of the Kingdom, with extraordinary rejoicings. The Sunday following in the afternoon the Doctor preached the first time at his Church of St. Saviour's, where a great multitude thronged to hear, or at least to see him, expressing their joy at his returning to the exercise of his function. His subject was the duty of praying for our enemies from St. Luke xxiii. 34. Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. In his sermon he made a tacit but obvious parallel between his sufferings and those of Jesus Christ. Not long after, the House of Commons, to shew their dislike of his former prosecution and censure, desired him to preach before them at St. Margaret's Westminster on the 29th of May, being the Restoration Day; which he did, and had the thanks of the House for his Sermon. Nor was the Court backward in rewarding his late service; for, the Rectorship of St. Andrew's Holborn, becoming vacant, he was promoted to that rich benefice.

He is made Rector of St. Andrew's.

Other promotions.

About this time also Dr. Jonathan Swift, who had served the present Managers by writing several libels against the Whigs and last Ministry, by whom he had been disappointed in his solicitations for preferment, was by the Duke of Ormond promoted to the Deanery of St. Patrick, Dublin.

In the end of May, died Sprat, Bishop of Rochester; his parts were very bright in his youth, and gave great hopes; but these were blasted by a lazy libertine course of life, to which his temper and good nature carried him, without considering the duties, or even the deficiencies of his profession: He was justly esteemed a great Master of our language, and one of our correctest writers. Atterbury succeeded him in that See, and in the Deanery of Westminster: Thus was he promoted, and rewarded for all the flame, that he had raised in our Church. Dr. Smalridge, a Divine of the same principles with Atterbury, and Dean of Carlisle, was made Dean of Christ-Church, Oxford. At the same time, care was taken to put the most important towns in the Kingdom in the hands of such persons, as were prepared blindly to follow the Queen's measures. With this view, the Earl of Dorset, being removed from being Governor of Dover, and Warden of the Cinque-Ports, was succeeded by the Duke of Ormond, whose son-in-law, the Lord Asburnham, was made Deputy-Governor and Deputy-Warden; and Sir Henry Bellasis was appointed Governor of the town of Berwick upon Tweed. Not long after a pension of five thousand pounds per annum was granted to the Duke of Ormond, for the term of fifteen years, out of the revenues of Ireland, in consideration of his eminent services; and the Lord Asburnham was appointed Colonel and Captain of the first troop of horse-guards in the room of the Earl of Portland, who was ordered to dispose of that post for the sum of ten thousand pounds. Sir John Powel, one of the Judges of the Queen's Bench, dying in June on his return from Bath, was succeeded by Sir Thomas Powis; and Sir William Banister, a Sergeant at law, was made one of the Barons of the Exchequer, in the room of Sir Salathiel Lovel, lately deceased. The Duke of Montague having obtained the Queen's leave to travel beyond sea, resolved to follow the fortune of the Duke of Marlborough, his father-in-law. The Duke of Montrose, who was well-affected to the Protestant Succession, being removed from the place of Lord Privy-Seal of Scotland, was succeeded in it by the Duke of Arbol; which change rather increased than abated the present ferment in that part of Great-Britain. For, on the one hand, the Presbyterian Ministers refused to observe the public thanksgiving day for the peace, appointed by the Queen; and, on the other hand, the friends of the Pretender, made great preparations to celebrate his birth-day.

The danger with which the Hanoverian Succession was threatened, appeared to be the more real and imminent, by reason of the great countenance, which the Roman Catholics and Jacobites received from the distinguishing marks of favour, which at this juncture, were shewn to the Duke d'Aumont, Ambassador Extraordinary from France, who came to London on the second of January, 1712-13, and was lodged at Powis House in Ormond-Street. He was at first attended in public with great acclamations by the populace, amongst whom he threw out from his coach handfuls of money; but, having soon

He is insulted by the mob.

(1) Burnet concludes his History with saying: I am now come to the end of the War, and of this Parliament, both at once: It was fit they should bear some proportion to one another; for, as this was the worst Parliament I ever saw, so no Assembly, but one composed as this was, could have fate quiet under such a Peace: But I am now arrived at my full period, and so shall close this work: I had a noble prospect before me, in a course of many years, of bringing it to a glorious conclusion; now the scene is so fatally altered, that I can scarce refrain myself from giving vent to a just indignation in severe complaints: But an Historian must tell things truly as they are, and leave the decanting on them to others: So I here conclude this History of above three and fifty years. Burnet, Vol. II. 631.

1713. discontinued that custom, they changed their note, and insulted him with the cry of, no Papist, no Pretender; and great insolencies were offered before his House by some, who being opposed by others, it occasioned a scuffle between them; whereupon it was thought proper to order the Constables of the Parish to look to the security of his House. Nor was this precaution unnecessary; for by this time there was a general clamour among the people against him, on account of great quantities of wines, silks, and other goods, which his domestics were said to have imported custom-free, to the prejudice of the Tradesmen of London and Westminster. The fact was, some French Merchants took that opportunity to bring over a good deal of Burgundy and Champagne; which, before his arrival, were sold by retail at his house, and other places, at lower rates than at the Taverns; and at the same time, other Frenchmen who pretended to be of his retinue, brought also silks, buttons, perukes, toys, and other small wares, which they exposed to sale, unknown to the Ambassador. But though it was certain, that all the wines imported on this occasion (except two tuns allowed to an Ambassador Extraordinary) paid the full duties, which amounted to about 2500*l*. And though the Duke d'Aumont, upon his arrival at London, forbid the selling of wines or any other commodities in his house, yet the people put up the sign of a Bunch of Grapes before it in the night-time; and several ballads were writ both in French and English, one of them called, The Merchant a-la-mode, containing many severe reflections, not only against the Ambassador, but against the Queen's Ministers; strict search was made after the publishers of it, one of whom was committed to Newgate. Besides these public insults, several letters were sent to the Ambassador, to give him notice, that his house would be set on fire; which, whether by design or accident, happened on the 26th of January. That day the Duke d'Aumont entertained at dinner the Ambassador of Venice, the Envoys of Sweden and Florence, the Lord Waldegrave, and some other persons of distinction, whom, by way of jest, he acquainted with the threatening letters he had received. But the company were soon alarmed in good earnest by a cry of fire; which, having broke out about three in the afternoon in an upper room, spread itself with such violence, that, in less than two hours, the whole house was burnt to the ground; and all that the Ambassador's domestics could do, was to save his plate, and part of his richest furniture. The Duke of Ormond, having notice of this accident, caused detachments of the horse and foot-guards to march to Ormond-street, to secure the Ambassador's goods, and went himself to direct and encourage the Engineers and Firemen. The loss, the Ambassador and his Domestics sustained, was by some magnified to an immense degree, whilst others made it inconsiderable. How the fire began, was then, and still remains a more difficult question to be resolved. It was at first given out, that it happened by the carelessness of his Confectioner. Others said, the house was set on fire by an iron pot full of charcoal, that had been put in the middle of a room newly painted, in order to dry it. Others again reported, it was set on fire by two Bricklayers, who had been employed to mend the tiles of the house, and who did it, at the instigation of the Whigs. 1713. Upon this suspicion, the two Bricklayers were taken into custody, and an advertisement was published in the London Gazette, 'That her Majesty thought fit to promise, that if any of the persons, who wrote the letters to the Duke d'Aumont, or any other person whatsoever, should discover the contrivers or actors of so scandalous and wicked a design, so that they, or any of them, might be brought to justice; such person, or persons, should receive the reward of five hundred pounds, and her Majesty's pardon for the offence.' The strictest inquiry, that could be made, not affording ground to fix this fire upon any particular person, the generality continued in their first opinion, that it happened through accident. But many, who considered, that, as soon as the Queen was informed of the misfortune, that had befallen the French Ambassador, she gave immediate orders, that the best apartment in Sohamet-House should be prepared for his accommodation, began to entertain a suspicion, that Powis House was designedly set on fire, for a pretence to remove the French Ambassador to a royal palace on the Thames, where any person might have private access to him. Others carried their surmises so far, as to imagine, that the Pretender himself was come over with the Ambassador, and had private interviews with the Queen and some of her Ministers. These jealousies were increased by the frequent entertainments and balls, which the Duke d'Aumont gave in his apartment; where a great concourse of persons resorting in masks, he had an opportunity to sound the sentiments of many about the Chevalier de St. George.

Mr. Prior, having, in the Queen's name solicited the release of the French Protestants, who were on board the galleys on account of their Religion; the Marquis de Torcy took that opportunity of complaining to him, that the French Refugees in England made it their business to inveigh against the King his Master; and naming, in particular, Mr. Dubourdieu, a French Minister of the Royal Chapel in the Savoy (who indeed had distinguished himself that way) desired, he might be punished, and made an example to the rest. At the same time, Torcy directed the Duke d'Aumont to demand the same at the Court of Great Britain; upon which he presented a memorial against Dubourdieu, to desire that exemplary punishment might be inflicted on him and all Ministers, who abused their pulpits by declamations against his Master.

Mr. Prior having beforehand acquainted the Lord Bolingbroke with the purport of this memorial, which clashed with the Constitution of our free Government, the Queen was prepared with an answer, 'That this was none of her business, but the Bishop of London's;' to whom the memorial was referred, with orders to examine Dubourdieu. He having appeared before the Bishop with four Elders of his Church, the Bishop communicated to them the French Ambassador's memorial; and asked the French Minister, What he had to say to it? Dubourdieu answered, 'The memorial containing only general complaints, he had nothing else to say, but that, during the war, he had, after the example of several Prelates, and other Clergymen of the Church of England, freely preached against the common enemy and persecutor of the Church; and 1713. and that, the greatest part of his sermons being printed with his name affixed, he was far from disowning them; but that, since the proclamation of the peace, he had not said any thing that in the least concerned the person of the French King. The Bishop made him repeat the words, Since the proclamation of the peace; and asking of the Elders, Whether this was true? They answered, That it was. Upon which the Bishop said, he would make his report to the Queen: Which he did in such a manner, that the French Ambassador found no encouragement to insist on his demand.

On the 1st of July, the Duke d'Aumont made his public entry with great magnificence, attended by two Gentlemen of horse, twelve Pages, thirty footmen, and nine of his own coaches, five of which were drawn by eight horses, the other by six; his liveries being of scarlet-cloth, covered with a gold and green lace. Having, according to custom, been splendidly entertained for three days at the Queen's expence in Somerſet-Houſe, he was from thence conducted to his first audience of the Queen, to whom he addressed himself in a speech full of compliment and flattery.

About the middle of July, the French Ministry resolved to try the weight of their interest with the Court of Great-Britain. Monsieur Tugge, Deputy from the Magistrates of Dunkirk, presented to the Queen an address or petition, wherein he begged her Majesty's clemency for sparing the harbour and port of that town. But he was told by the Lord Bolingbroke, 'That the Queen beheld with sorrow the damages, which the inhabitants of that town would sustain by the demolition of its ramparts and harbour: But she did not think it convenient to make any alteration in an affair agreed on by a treaty.' Tugge, not discouraged by this repulse, presented a second address, wherein he suggested, 'That the preservation of the harbour of Dunkirk, without works and fortifications, might, in time, be equally useful, and become even absolutely necessary, both for her Majesty's political views, and the good of her subjects. This he endeavoured to evince, by a long deduction of several particulars, and then concluded with presuming to hope, 'That her Majesty would graciously be pleased to recall part of her sentence, by causing her thunderbolts to fall only on the martial works, which might have incurred her displeasure, and by sparing only the mole and dykes, which, in their naked condition, could, for the future, be no more than an object of pity.' What answer was returned to this memorial, never came to public knowledge; but Tugge, whether of his own head, or by the encouragement of other persons, having caused it to be printed and dispersed in English, to try how it would be relished by the people, Mr. Richard Steele, who with Mr. Addison, and Mr. Arthur Maynwaring, exerted himself in defence of the liberties of England, and of the Whig cause, and who, at this very juncture, was writing a weekly paper, called the Guardian, answered Tugge's memorial with great spirit, and, in order to expose it to the resentment of all men, who valued their Country, or had any respect to the honour, safety, or glory of their Queen, suggested, in his paper of the 7th of August, 1713, 'That the British Nation expected the immediate demolition of Dunkirk.

1713. 'That the very common people knew, that within two months after the signing of the peace, the works towards the sea were to be demolished, and, within three months after it, the works towards the land.

'That the peace was signed the last of March, O. S.

'That the Parliament has been told from the Queen, that the equivalent for it is in the hands of the French King.

'That the Sieur Tugge has the impudence to ask the Queen, to remit the most material part of the articles of peace between her Majesty and his Master.

'That the British Nation received more damage in their trade from the port of Dunkirk, than from almost all the ports of France, either in the Ocean, or the Mediterranean.

'That fleets of above thirty sail have come together out of Dunkirk, during the late war, and taken ships of war, as well as merchantmen.

'That the Pretender sailed from thence to Scotland; and that it is the only port the French have, till you come to Brest, for the whole length of the Channel, where any considerable naval armament can be made.

'That destroying the fortifications of Dunkirk is an inconsiderable advantage to England, in comparison to the advantage of destroying the mole, dykes, and harbour, it being the naval force from thence, which only can hurt the British Nation.

'That the Dutch, who suffered equally with us from those of Dunkirk, were probably induced to sign the treaty with France, from this consideration, that the town and harbour of Dunkirk should be destroyed.

'That the situation of Dunkirk is such, as that it may always keep runners to observe all ships sailing on the Thames and Medway.

That all the suggestions, which the Sieur Tugge brought concerning the Dutch, were false and scandalous.

'That, whether it might be advantageous to the trade of Holland or not, that Dunkirk should be demolished, it was necessary, for the safety, honour, and liberty of England, that it should be so.

'That, when Dunkirk was demolished, the power of France, on that side, should it ever be turned against us, would be removed several hundred miles further off Great-Britain than it was at present.

'That after the demolition, there could be no considerable preparations made at sea by the French in all the Channel but at Brest; and that Great-Britain being an island, which cannot be attacked but by a naval power, we might esteem France effectually removed by the demolition from Great-Britain, as far as the distance from Dunkirk to Brest.

These reflections were not only a great mortification to Tugge and the other French agents, but also gave no small offence to some of the British Ministers, as appeared by the severe animadversions that were published by the authors of the Examiner. But, on the other hand, the necessity of the immediate demolition of Dunkirk was urged by several other writers, and particularly by Mr. Toland in a Pamphlet, intitled, Dunkirk or Dover.

Demolition of the fortifications
kirk.

About the beginning of September, the Colonels Armstrong and Clayton were appointed Commissioners to see the fortifications of Dunkirk demolished; and at the same time two Captains of men of war were, by the Admiralty, named to see the harbour filled up. Accordingly, on the 7th of September, the two Colonels set out for Dunkirk, where three French Battalions, and as many Swiss being come, and incamping, the one without Port-Neuport, the other without Port-Royal, they began on the 26th the demolition, the French between these two gates, and the Swiss between the Baſon and the Citadel. The same day a dispute arose between Sir James Abercromby, the British Commandant, and Monsieur le Blanc, the French Intendant of the Province, about the manner of carrying it on. The French intended to have made a breach in the ramparts, or main fortifications of the town; but the two English Commissioners having made the Commandant sensible, that, if the same was permitted, the English garrison was not safe, and the French, might easily make themselves masters of the place; Sir James insisted, and it was at last agreed to by le Blanc, that all the outworks, both towards the sea and the land, should be first demolished; next the harbour ruined and filled; afterwards the main fortifications of the place razed and destroyed; and last of all, the citadel. This point being cleared, the French and Swiss soldiers went to work again, and removed the great guns from Fort Gallard, Fort de Revers, the Risbank, and the two forts at the heads or entrance of the port; and the miners made preparations to blow up these forts, and the other outworks; which was done towards the end of November. But notwithstanding all this, the French found afterwards an expedient to evade the letter of this treaty, by making a new canal in Maraye, which had a communication from the sea to the baſon of Dunkirk.

The Duke d'Aumont having taken his audience of leave at Windſor about the end of August, he set out from London on his return to Paris the 7th of November.

Before the Queen left Kensington, she resolved to bestow some marks of her favour on the Earl of Peterborough, who, though not in any great confidence with the prime Managers, had yet been instrumental in the change of the Ministry in 1710, and had supported their pacific measures. He was on the 3d of August elected Knight of the Garter, in the room of the late Duke of Hamilton; and the next day installed at Windſor, with the Dukes of Beaufort and Kent, Earl Paulet, the Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, and the Earl of Strafford; Sir Jacob Banks standing proxy for this last. About the same time the Bishop of Bristol, Lord Privy-Seal, was translated to the See of London, vacant by the death of Dr. Henry Compton, a generous and good-natured man, but easy and weak, and much in the power of others. On the 8th of August, a proclamation was published for dissolving the Parliament, and another, on the 17th, for calling a new one.

favour of the Presents.

Some days before, several letters subscribed with an H (the initial letter of the Earl of Oxford's family-name) were sent by the post to the Mayors, and other Magistrates of divers Corporations, recommending to them to promote the interest of the Pretender in the next elections; which it was suggested, would be acceptable to the Queen and Ministry. Some of these letters having been transmitted to the Secretaries of State, an advertisement, signed by the Lord Dartmouth, was inserted in the Gazette, promising the Queen's pardon, and a reward of one hundred pounds, to any person, who should discover the Author of the letter. This occasioned various conjectures. Some ascribed the letters to the disaffected Whigs; others to the Pretender's friends, both of whom hated the Lord-Treasurer, the Whigs, for having done too much, and the others, for having done too little for the Pretender's interest. On this account he was in a very difficult situation, especially, as he had been for some time upon ill terms with the Lord Bolingbroke, as appears from his own letter to the Queen, of the 9th of June 1713. Before the last Session of Parliament, Bolingbroke had formed a scheme to put himself and Chancellor Harcourt at the head of the High-Church party, and had opposed the Duke of Soreauſbury's being sent over to France. However, with Lady Masham's assistance, the Lord-Treasurer brought his own scheme to bear, which was, 'That the Duke of Ormond should stay in England, to attend the army affairs, which was necessary at the time of disbanding: That the Duke of Soreauſbury should go to Ireland, as Lord-Lieutenant, upon his return from France: That the Earl of Findlater should be Chancellor of Scotland; the Earl of Mar third Secretary of State; the Lord Dartmouth Privy-Seal; Mr. Speaker Bromley Secretary of State; and Sir William Wyndham Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of Robert Benson, lately created Lord Bingley, and named Ambassador Extraordinary to the Court of Madrid. This new scheme perfectly defeated that of Lord Bolingbroke and his friends, which threw them into a great rage; and the Lord Chancellor declared the promotion of the Earl of Findlater to be against law, and would not treat that Earl with decency; and Lord Mar and Secretary Bromley received many instances of ill usage. Most of these changes were declared from the middle of August to the middle of September; and, about that time, Thomas Foley was appointed Auditor of the imprest accounts, in the room of Mr. Maynwaring deceased; the Lord Lansdown, Treasurer of the Household, in the room of the Earl of Choldmondley, formerly removed; Sir John Stonehouse, Comptroller of the Household, in the room of the Lord Lansdown; the Lord de la War, Treasurer of the Chamber, in the room of the Lord Fitzbarding deceased; Francis Gwin, Secretary of War, in the room of Sir William Wyndham; and Thomas Moore, brother to Athur Moore, Paymaster of the land-forces abroad, in the room of Mr. Bridges. About this time, likewise, the Duke of Northumberland and Sir John Stonehouse were sworn of the Privy-Council; and the Earl of Denbigh made one of the tellers of the Exchequer.

All this while the party writers and managers on both sides were extremely busy in preparing the minds of the people to favour their respective interests in the new elections for Parliament men. But notwithstanding the weight and influence of the Court, and the visible partiality

A million raised in two or three days by the Treasurer.

There happened about this time an incident, which did not a little contribute to secure the Treasurer's interest at Court. An advertisement had been inserted in the London Gazette, whereby it was proposed to raise three hundred thousand pounds for paying off part of the debts of the Navy, by way of Loan, on the security of the South-Sea Stock, deposited, for that purpose, into the hands of the Chamberlain of London, and the Deputy-Tellers of the Exchequer. Whether monied men did not like the security, or the trustees; or whatever was the reason, not above seventy thousand pounds were subscribed into this Loan in six or seven weeks; which made many believe, it would never be filled up. But, upon an order of the 9th of September by the Lord-Treasurer, that whoever should subscribe one hundred pounds to the Loan, should be intitled to buy ten Tickets of ten pounds each in the Household Lottery of five hundred thousand pounds, there was the next day such a croud of Subscribers, both at the Exchequer and Guild-Hall, that more than the three hundred thousand pounds were subscribed. The Treasurer improving the opportunity, enlarged the Loan to five hundred thousand pounds, which in a few days was filled up, as was at the same time the Lottery of the like sum: So that, by this means, the Treasurer raised a million Sterling in two or three days, which greatly advanced his credit and reputation.

The Marquis de Miremont intercedes for the Protestants in the Gallies.

The Marquis de Miremont, whom the Queen had sent to Ulrecht with a commission to take care of the interest of the French Protestants, being come over, waited on the Queen, and returned her thanks for procuring the enlargement from the Gallies of France of one hundred and thirty-six Protestants. He desired her still to interpose her good offices for the deliverance of one hundred and eighty-five more of these sufferers, who were still detained in the Gallies on the same account. The Marquis de Rochegude spoke to her likewise in their behalf, and delivered to her letters from the States and the Princess Sophia to the same purpose. The Queen, who had been given to understand, that all the French Protestant sufferers had been enlarged, was surprized to find, there were so many still under affliction; and desired the Marquis de Rochegude to give her a list of them. The Archbishop of York, Lord Almoner, having likewise been informed about this matter, he seconded both the French Marquises solicitations with great Zeal; which had the desired effect. About this time Charles Rois, Colonel-General of the Dragoons, and Lieutenant-General, was appointed Envoy Extraordinary to the King of France.

petition presented as in- through for solving Union.

Some days before a very remarkable thing happened in Scotland. George Lockhart of Carnwath, an avowed friend of the Pretender, having been unanimously chosen Member of Parliament for Edinburgh; a great number of the inhabitants signed a petition, to be presented to the House of Commons, for bringing in a bill to dissolve the Union. This done, the populace went to the Parliament Close in Edinburgh, and there, by the Statue of King Charles II. drank healths to the Queen, the dissolution of the Union, and all true Scotch- men; and afterwards went to the Market-Cross; and did the like, with repeated acclamations. It was likewise reported, that some Scots Merchants caused a petition to be presented to the King of France by Mr. Arbutnot, their agent at Roan, representing their grievances in point of trade, and other matters, and desiring his protection for their redress, in consideration of the antient alliances between France and Scotland. But, this application bordering upon treason, no further steps were made in it.

About the latter end of the year 1713, the following incident happened: By the Regency-bill, which was to take place on the Queen's death, power was given to the person next in Succession, to nominate as many as he or she pleased, to act with the great Officers named in the bill. This was, properly speaking, the safeguard of the Protestant Succession. The act was very particular, in directing several things to be done in that affair, by the person next in Succession abroad, and by his Minister or Agent here. Mr. William Benson, apprehending some omissions in this respect, by which the nomination could not be of any use, applied to Baron Botmar for information, and found his fears were not groundless. The act directed, that the instruments of Nomination should be three in number, and transmitted hither to the Resident of the person next in Succession, whose Credentials were to be inrolled in Chancery; and, after such inrolment, the Resident was to deposit one part with the Archbishop of Canterbury, another with the Lord-Chancellor or Keeper, and the third was to remain with the Resident, and that the Seals of these three persons should be fixed to the covers in which the instruments were included. Now Botmar, in whose hands one of these instruments was left, had not the character of Resident; and Mr. Kreinberg, who was Resident, and whose Credentials were inrolled, was not concerned in the matter. Nor was Botmar's, nor Kreinberg's, nor the Chancellor's Seal affixed to the instruments, but the Seal of Baron Schultz and of the Lord Cowper, who was no longer Chancellor. If therefore the Queen had died, whilst the matter was in this situation, these instruments could not have been opened, because the act had not been complied with. In this light Benson represented the affair to Botmar, who desired that Chief Justice Parker might be acquainted with it. Parker appointed a meeting of the chief persons trusted by the House of Hanover, and Botmar was to bring his part of the deposited instruments with him. Accordingly, there was the next morning a meeting at the Duke of Devonshire's, and, upon examination, all were of opinion, the whole was wrong, and that it was of the utmost consequence it should be redressed as soon as possible. Parker undertook to direct the proper forms; and a Messenger was dispatched to Hanover, who returned with great expedition with instruments according to law; the first of which was to appoint Kreinberg Resident, and, after the inrolment of his Credentials, he had new instruments to be deposited by him, pursuant to the act. Kreinberg went immediately to Chancellor Harcourt, and, delivering his new Credentials, desired they might be inrolled, which the Chancellor said should be done in a few days. But, the thing being delayed, Kreinberg went to the Chancellor, and 1713. and told him, if his credentials were not inrolled by the next post, he must acquaint the Princess Sophia with it. This was refused; but, however, he was bid to come again in a day or two, at which time the Chancellor delivered to Kreinberg, not his Credentials, but a copy only, or a common piece of paper.

When this paper was shewn to Chief Justice Parker, as delivered by the Chancellor to Kreinberg, for his credentials inrolled, he was greatly surpris'd and carried the paper with him to Westminster-Hall (where he was then going) to shew it to the Chancellor, and speak to him about it. Parker producing the paper to the Chancellor told him, it had been delivered to the Hanover Resident as his Credentials inrolled, without saying who had done it. The Chancellor, as if he knew nothing of the matter, said with great warmth, 'This is very wrong, but this is a young fellow just come into his office, his father being lately dead; but let me have the paper, and I will take care to set this matter to rights for Mr. Kreinberg, if he will come to me in a day or two.' Kreinberg did not fail going, and at last got his Credentials again properly inrolled about the 27th of March 1714. Shortly after the instrument appointing the persons to be added to the Lords Regents on the Queen's decease were deposited in proper form, which had not been done before in eight years, for so long the act had subsisted, being passed in 1706.

Ireland.

Ireland, since the Lord Wharton had resigned the Government of it, was become Jacobite almost without reserve, and the boldness of the Papists, countenanced by Chancellor Phipps, alarmed the Protestants and put them upon their guard against the attempts of their enemies, who, about this time, industriously fomented the disputes occasioned by the election of a Lord-Mayor for the City of Dublin. The Aldermen having chosen Mr. Pleasants, it was strenuously opposed by the then Lord-Mayor, and the decision of the affair being left to the Privy Council (where the Lords-Justices, of whom Sir Constantine Phipps was one, had the direction) they came on the 4th of September to these resolutions: '1. That the Lord-Mayor of the City of Dublin, for the time being, has the right of nominating three Aldermen to be put in election for Lord-Mayor of Dublin; and that the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen are obliged to elect one of the three to be succeeding Lord-Mayor, unless just objections be made against them. 2. That the proceeding of seventeen Aldermen in the election of Alderman Pleasants for Lord-Mayor, and James King for Sheriff, in the absence of Sir Samuel Cooke, Lord-Mayor, was a breach of the new rules; and that such elections were null and void.' Six days after the Lord-Mayor summoned the Aldermen to meet, and proceed to a new choice; and, in pursuance of the resolution of the Council, he named Sir William Fownes and Aldermen Constantine and Mason, the same who were in nomination before. But twenty Aldermen insisted on a previous question concerning the first in nomination, and offered some objections to him; upon which the Lord-Mayor having dissolved the court, nothing was determined.

In this ferment the Duke of Shrewsbury found the City of Dublin, when he arrived there on the 27th of October, to take upon him the government of Ireland; and perceiving the Pretender's friends had received no small encouragement from Chancellor Phipps, he took all proper occasions to make good the expectations of the well affected to the Revolution and the Protestant Succession; but more particularly on King William's Birth Day, when he declared, He was still the same he was in the year 1688, and publicly drank to the pious and glorious memory of King William.

A new Parliament being called, the struggle in Ireland between the two parties was as great as in England. The warmest contention was in the City of Dublin, where Sir William Fownes and Mr. Tucker were set up by the Tories, and Mr. Recorder Forster and Mr. Burton by the Whigs. The poll began on the 6th of November; and the Sheriffs, perceiving the Electors were going into a riot, sent for some of the guards to prevent it: Upon which a tumult arose, and the guards, being assaulted by the populace, fired some shot among them, killed one man, and wounded some others. Both parties immediately made their complaints to the Lord Lieutenant, who, the next day, appointed a committee to make a strict inquiry into the disorder, and directed the Sheriffs to take the poll at two different places, to prevent the meeting and clashing of the two contending parties; and upon information, that the Papists and Jacobites were the chief promoters of the riot, he caused several Popish Chapels in Dublin to be shut up; which was very grateful to all Protestants. On the 17th of November the Sheriffs closed the poll; and Forster and Burton were declared duly elected by a great majority.

The Parliament of Ireland being met on the 25th of November, the Lord-Lieutenant made a speech to both Houses, importing, 'That her Majesty, having procured a safe and honourable peace, had nothing now to wish, but that her subjects might enjoy the benefits and advantages of it. That her Majesty had nothing more at heart, than the preservation of the rights and liberties of her people, and the settling them upon a lasting foundation, by securing the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover.' He earnestly recommended to the Commons, 'That, as the Protestants in that Kingdom were united in one common interest, they might all agree in the same means of promoting it, by laying aside all warmth or resentment; which would appear by the unanimity of their proceedings.'

Notwithstanding this caution, there was the next day a great contest in the House of Commons about the choice of a Speaker; Sir Richard Levinz being put up by the Tory party, and Alan Broderick by the Whigs; but, upon a division, Broderick was chosen by a majority of four voices.

The addresses of compliment to the Queen and the Lord-Lieutenant having been presented, the Commons proceeded in providing, by good laws, for the security of the Protestant Religion, against the designs of the Papists. They ordered a bill to be brought in to attain the Pretender, and all persons that adhered to him, of high-treason, with the promise of a reward to any person that should take the Pretender alive or dead. They appointed a Committee to inquire into the proceedings against Edward Lloyd, 1713. Lloyd, for publishing a book called, The Memoirs of the Chevalier de St. George (1), and against Dudley Moore, and others, relating to a pretended riot at the Play-House, occasioned by that Gentleman's speaking the Prologue to Tamerlane, in praise of King William. They confirmed the election of Forster and Burton, and unanimously resolved upon an address to the Queen, for the removal of Sir Constantine Phipps from the Chancellorship (2).

On the other hand, the Bishops of Ireland, resolving not to leave the Chancellor to the resentment of the Commons, used their utmost endeavours to get a contrary address voted in the House of Lords, where it was resolved; that Chancellor Phipps had, in his several stations, acquitted himself with honour and integrity. And, a Committee being ordered to draw up the address, it was presented to the Lord-Lieutenant to be transmitted to England (3).

On the 21st of December, the Commons, taking into consideration the State of the Nation, came to several resolutions against the proceedings of those who had lately been the Managers of the affairs of that Kingdom (4).

Mr. Moleworth, (afterwards Viscount Moleworth) famous for his Preface to the State of Denmark, being a Privy-Counsellor in Ireland as well as Member of Parliament, was at the Castle of Dublin, with some other Members, on the day the Commons presented their address against the Chancellor: The two Houses of Convocation coming thither, to present a contrary address, Mr. Moleworth said in the hearing of some Gentlemen about him, They, that have turned the World upside down, are come bither also? Upon this the Lower House of Convocation sent a complaint to the Upper, representing, 'That they looked upon the words uttered by Mr. Moleworth to be an intolerable profanation of the Holy Scriptures; and that his speaking to them at that time, and in that place, was with design to cast an odium and aspersion on their Graces and their Lordships, and the whole Clergy, and to represent them as a turbulent and seditious body. That they thought themselves in duty obliged to lay the matter before the Upper House; not only for the reasons above mentioned, but, because they conceived it to be a high affront to her Majesty, and great disrespect to her representative, the Lord-Lieutenant: And they humbly prayed their Lordships to vindicate the whole Clergy from this wicked calumny.' The Bishops immediately laid this complaint before the House of Lords; who desired a Conference with the Commons, and left with them a copy of the paper delivered by the Bishops. The Commons laid no great stress on that complaint; but, the matter having been represented in England in the most odious colours, Mr. Moleworth was removed from the Privy-Council.

It is observable that Chancellor Phipps had many Champions for him in Great-Britain; every Tory thinking himself obliged to vindicate him, upon the account of his zealous adhering to the Church's cause in Dr. Sacheverell's Tryal, and giving out, that the resolutions of the Commons against him were not of Irish growth, but the result of the joint counsels of the Whigs of both Kingdoms. On the other hand, the Whig party loudly justified the proceedings of the Irish House of Commons against that Minister,

(1) This book was written in defence of the legitimacy of the Pretender, and of his title to the Crown. Lloyd had published advertisements of his intentions to reprint that book, exhorting all good people to subscribe for it. For this he had been indicted, and the bill found in Michaëlas-Term, 1712. Notwithstanding which, he went about at large till July 1713; and Chancellor Phipps wrote a letter to the Duke of Ormond in favour of Lloyd, recommending him as an object of the Queen's mercy, and as a person who had no evil intention in printing and publishing that book; upon which Lloyd obtained a noli prosequi. See Conduct of the Purse in Ireland, p. 35.

(2) The Commons, December 18, unanimously resolved, 1. That the Memoirs of the Chevalier de St. George was a seditious and treasonable libel. 2. That the remiss prosecution of Lloyd was an encouragement to the Popish, and other friends of the Pretender. 3. That Sir Constantine Phipps, in representing Lloyd as an object of mercy, in order to obtain a noli prosequi, acted contrary to the Protestant interest. 4. That an address be presented to the Queen, to remove Sir Constantine Phipps from the place of Lord High-Chancellor, for the peace and safety of her Protestant subjects.

(3) At the same time, Mr. Richard Nuttall, a Lawyer, was censured by the Lords, for saying, 'The Lord Chancellor of Ireland is a Canary-bird and a Villain, and has set the Kingdom together by the ears, and ought to be hanged.'

(4) As these resolutions will explain the conduct of the Duke of Ormond, and those employed under him, and other Lord-Lieutenants and Justices, it may not be improper to infer them:

1. That for some years last past there had been a design formed and carried on, to subvert the Constitution, and alter the Government of the City of Dublin.

2. That, to carry on that design, a corrupt and illegal attempt was made in 1711, to corrupt Alderman Ralph Gore, then Lord-Mayor, by offering him a bribe of five hundred pounds, to name thirty-two persons, marked in a list then delivered to him by Martin Tucker, Esq; Sub-Collector of the port of Dublin, to be Common-Council-Men for the said City. 3. That it appears, on the examination of Martin Tucker, Esq; that he was sent to offer the said sum of five hundred pounds to Alderman Ralph Gore, while Sir Constantine Phipps, Knight, Lord High-Chancellor of Ireland, and Lieutenant-General Ingoldsby, were Lords-Justices. 4. That the City of Dublin had, of late, been, and still continued, in great disorder and confusion, by reason of the frequent disapprobations of persons elected Lord-Mayors and Sheriffs of the said City, all of them of known affection to her Majesty's Person and Government, and to the Constitution in Church and State. 5. That Sir Constantine Phipps had been the chief cause and promoter of such frequent disapprobations, and thereby the occasion of the said disorder and confusion. 6. That, since the making the new rules 1672, until Sir Constantine Phipps arrived in that Kingdom, no person elected Lord-Mayor of the City of Dublin, had been disapproved, except in the Government of the Earl of Tyrconnel. 7. That the Council-board had not at this time, nor had not since the time (given them by the act of explanation) expired, any power to make rules or orders for regulating the election of Magistrates in any Corporation in that Kingdom. 8. That the right of election of Lord-Mayor of Dublin is in the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of the said City; and that the Aldermen are in no sort restrained, in the choice of the succeeding Lord-Mayor, to one of any three persons nominated or proposed, to be put in election by the Lord-Mayor.

Minister, who, to say no worse, had been the occasion of unhappy distinctions among the Protestants of that Kingdom (1). These divisions gave to great encouragement to the Pretender's friends, that men were almost publicly enlisted into his service; of which the Commons took notice in their votes of the 22d of December. And the Grand Jury of the County of Dublin having made a presentment of that traitorous practice, and laid it before the Lord-Lieutenant, a Proclamation was issued out for apprehending Lieutenant Butler in Lord Galway's Regiment, who had enlisted William and Michael Letry to serve the Pretender, and told them, he had enlisted fourteen men more for the same purpose.

This Parliament not being relished by the Ministry in England, the Duke of Shrewsbury received orders to prorogue them; but, before he did it, he sent for the Speaker of the House of Commons out of the country, and told him, the Queen was willing to give them an opportunity to do themselves justice; but, if they did not proceed with unanimity at their next meeting, he had orders to dissolve them. As the Parliament was by no means disposed to acquiesce in all the Ministers measures (which was the meaning of proceeding with unanimity) they sat no more in this reign. The Duke himself did not much like his situation, and, having constant intelligence of the ill state of the Queen's health from Dr. Shadwell, one of her

(1) We have a large account of his behaviour there, in a pamphlet printed at London in 1714, in 8vo. intitled, The Conduct of the Purse in Ireland: In a letter to a Member of the late Oxford Convocation, occasioned by their having conferred the degree of Doctor upon Sir Constantine Phipps. The Author observes, p. 10, 'That he will not take upon him so far to judge Sir Constantine, as to say, he was an enemy to the Protestant Interest and Protestant Succession. I will, says he, suppose, that he might not have had any intention of prejudicing either the one or the other. But whether it hath happened through mistake, or through passion, and too warm a pursuit of his own particular quarrels and resentments, or of the resentments of others; whether he hath been misguided by the misrepresentations of men and things, or the true interest of the country, where he resided, or of the true temper and genius of that People; whatsoever his intentions really were, I think I may very confidently affirm this, that, had a professed enemy to the Protestant interest of that Kingdom been placed in that Government, when he was, such person could not with any discretion or safety have pursued measures more likely to divide, weaken, and subvert the Protestant interest of that Kingdom, than this Doctor hath pursued from the time of his landing there.' The Author remarks, p. 19, that before Sir Constantine's arrival in Ireland, the inhabitants knew little of the distinction of Whig and Tory, of High-Church and Low-Church: These divisions had not affected them in any great degree; the chief distinction amongst them was that of Papist and Protestant. But soon after his arrival the distinctions of Whig and Tory were propagated with great industry, and those, who were of the first class, fell under his displeasure, and were displaced from their employments, and, as far as was in the power of him, or his wife, or their dependents, by their solicitations or influence to effect, they were removed from, or cramped in all manner of business or trade, by which they got their livelihood: And he descended so low, when in the Government, as in person to solicit Gentlemen to change their Taylors, and their other Tradesmen, upon these accounts. Informers, or, as they call them, Lions, were encouraged to put themselves into the companies of Gentlemen, and to report to the Government what was said there. Several Gentlemen of West-Meath, for having only drank the health of the Duke of Marlborough, and the late Lord Gadolphin, were accused by a Fryar, one of the new Converts, of having formed a plot against the Government, and thereupon were sent for in custody of Messengers. Other Gentlemen were informed against for words of little or no signification. In a word, an end was put to almost all conversation, and to the intercourse of all good offices, charity, and love amongst Protestants. And tho' the discoveries were of very little significance; yet the trouble given to Gentlemen by these informations was so considerable, that the whole seemed as it were designed to convince Protestant Gentlemen, that the Government had no mind to let them meet together at all. The rooms of the Gentlemen displaced (excepting the place of Attorney and Solicitor-General) were filled up for the most part with persons of little or no fortunes, and such as were most remarkable for a temper violent against the Dissenters, and moderate towards the Papists. Such, and the new Converts, were chiefly the objects of his favour, and were brought into all Stations, Magistracies, and Employments. But the Corporations being in the hands of men, who were thankful for the Revolution, in order to reform them, the chief Governors and the Privy-Council, having an authority of approving or disapproving the elections of Magistrates of most Corporations in that Kingdom, (which authority was vested in them by Act of Parliament, only with intent to exclude Papists and persons Papishly inclined;) as it was not to be imagined, but in every Corporation the Doctor might find some one or two men willing to prostitute themselves to his will and pleasure; so, having found such, he prevailed with a majority of the Privy-Council to concur with him in disapproving the election of every other than such person; hereby straining the power of approbation into that of a nomination. By this means several Corporations conceiving they had a power of electing their own Magistrates, and not willing to put their privileges into the hands of such, as they thought they could not trust, who were generally such as your Doctor had a mind for, they were obliged to infinite elections, returns, and attendances upon the Privy-Council; and, all being disapproved, without any manner of reason given, some Corporations continued without Magistrates for several months; some for above a year; and, during such time, in the utmost confusion and disorder, especially in Dublin. There creditors had no way to recover their small debts: There were no Sheriffs to execute writs upon any account; no criminals could be tried or executed; no Mayor to correct the abuses of the bread, and other markets: No justice could be had; and when his agents had raised a tumult against the Aldermen and others (who conceived themselves bound by oath to maintain the privileges of that Corporation, one of which was the freedom of electing their own Magistrates) by representing them as factious persons, who flew in the face of the Government; in these disorders there was no Magistrate to keep the public peace; and when Protestants were knocking one another on the head, and the Papists were cheerfully yielding their hand to that work; a young Protestant Officer, who had charitably interposed with some soldiers to prevent bloodshed, was confined, and threatened to be cashiered for his pains, by a very good friend of your Doctor's, if not at his request. Thus hath the Doctor divided and set the Protestants of Ireland together by the ears; he hath heightened their animosities to a degree that hath never before been known in that Country; inasmuch that, had the least attempt been made upon that Kingdom, they must in all probability have fallen an easy prey to their mortal enemies the Papists.

1713. Physicians (1), he thought it too dangerous for him to be absent from Court in so critical a juncture, as her decease was like to be. So he desired and obtained leave to return to England. Chancellor Phipps and Archbishop Lindsey, with the Archbishop of Tuam, were appointed Justices of Ireland (2).

Account of the book called, Hereditary Right.
In England all disguise was now thrown off by the Jacobites, and the Pretender's right to the Crown was publicly maintained in a large volume, called, The HEREDITARY RIGHT of the Crown of England asserted: The History of the Succession since the Conquest cleared, and the true English Constitution vindicated from the misrepresentations of Dr. Higden's view and defence, &c. The author, after having shewn in the introduction, that allegiance is not due to all powers in possession (3), endeavours to prove, 'That the people's submission to such Kings, as were not heirs to the Crown by immediate descent, is no argument, that possession gives right to allegiance.' And, to elude the force of Dr. Higden's arguments against Hereditary Right, grounded on the several deviations from the lineal descent in the Succession of the Crown since the Conquest, he maintains, that the Kings of England had antiently a power of disposing of the Crown by Testament: That the consent, resignation, and cession of the rightful heir were certainly sufficient to make Kings de facto rightful: And that therefore submission might be paid them on one of these accounts.' This being a point very material to the Author's design, he endeavours to evince it by the example of William the Conqueror, whom he asserts to have been a lawful King in both these regards, and justifies Edward the Confessor's nomination of him for his Successor (4). Then he labours to prove, that William Rufus and Henry the First were also lawful Kings. This done, he comes to King Stephen, whom he calls the first Usurper, and pretends, that, in his Reign, the most turbulent of any, there were no footsteps of Dr. Higden's principle, of allegiance being due to Kings de facto. On this occasion the Author mentions particularly the Earl of Gloucester, who owned himself bound in conscience to the right of the Empress Maud; the King of Scotland, who suffered much in defence of her right; and the behaviour of the Clergy, who made a distinction between King Stephen and a King de jure; shews what influence the Pope's pretended power of setting up Kings had in those days; and asserts, That our Historians date Stephen's Reign from his agreement with Henry; which concurs with the Author's main design, which is to establish a Testamentary and Cessionary right, in order to account for the allegiance which, at divers

(1) He used to write to the Duke and Duchesse of Shrewsbury under the name of J. Smith.

(2) The Duke of Shrewsbury had reasons, both of private and public concern, to wish himself in England. He had not been long in Dublin, before he found, that he was little more than the pageant of the Government of Ireland, of which the main springs were, in the Lord-Chancellor's hands: For, upon the decease of Dr. Narrifus Morley, Archbishop of Armagh, the Duke declined to have advanced to that Primacy his Kinsman, Dr. Talbot, Bishop of Oxford: But, upon the recommendation of Sir Constantine Phipps, Dr. Lindsey, Bishop of Raphoe, was immediately preferred, as a person ready to go all lengths, to favour the scheme in hand. From this, and other instances, the Duke began to surmise, either that the Lord-Treasurer's professed friendship slackened, or that his interest was upon the decline.

(3) In the Introduction the Author pretends, 'That the first time, the duty of paying allegiance to powers in possession began to be taught in this Kingdom, was, during the usurpations, which succeeded the death of King Charles the First. That in all former Revolutions the Princes, who got possession of the Crown, claimed it by some right, and never insisted on possession as right. But, the Rump Parliament, and Cromwell, and the following Usurpers, having no tolerable pretence to any claim of right, their friends were reduced to a necessity of pleading possession, as a right to obedience; and several books were then published by Papists, Fanatics, and Deists, to enforce and prove it. But that this principle was then generally rejected by all the Members of the Church of England, and by many Presbyterians, who maintained, that allegiance was due to the rightful King, who was not in possession. That, after the Restoration, the acts and judicial proceedings of the Governments preceding were all null and void, except such as were authorized by a new law. And it was declared by an act of Parliament, that all the said powers before in possession were rebellious, wicked, traitorous, abominable usurpations, detested by this present Parliament.' That here the Constitution was again settled on its antient foundation, not in possession, which all the Usurpers had, but upon the undoubted right of the lawful Heir, who had been out of possession, and of his Heirs and lawful Successors: And that, agreeably to this Constitution in that Reign, it was the constant doctrine of Lawyers and Divines, that allegiance was not due to all powers in possession. That the Revolution, which happened after, was begun, carried on, ended, and justified on these grounds, that allegiance was not due to all Kings in possession: That King James was lawfully deprived; and that King William and Queen Mary were lawfully put in possession. But these positions did not suit with the principles of many Lawyers and Divines, who had constantly maintained, that the deposition of a lawful King was absolutely unlawful, by the law of God, and the laws of this Kingdom. Therefore, to justify the transference of their allegiance, the former opinion, that seemed buried at the Restoration, was revived; viz. That allegiance was due to all powers in possession; and many eminent Members of the Church of England received it, as consistent with the doctrine of Non-resistance. That divers treatises were then published by Divines and Lawyers to defend it; particularly, the unreasonableness of a new separation and the case of allegiance due to sovereign power. That the instances of History and Parliament records, used in the first, were inquired into by an exact and faithful Historian, and unanswerably refuted: And the Arguments of the last, from Scripture and Reason, the doctrine of the Church, and the laws of the Kingdom, were refuted likewise by several Writers. That no reply of moment being made, that controversy seemed to be buried again, till Dr. Higden thought fit to examine the dispute again, and was convinced, that allegiance was due to Kings in fact, by laws divine and human. But that, as the Doctor's opinion makes the most unjust possession (as was Oliver's) rightful, and destroys the Hereditary Right, so long established by the Constitution, the Author has followed him through all his labyrinths, refuted his arguments, and rectified his errors.

(4) What the Author insinuates on this occasion deserves particular notice: 'If it be said that Edward the Confessor was an unjust Possessor, his Nephew, by his elder Brother, being then living, to whom he ought to have resigned the Crown: I answer, that, when Historians are silent, it does not become private men vers times, the Clergy, Nobility, and People, have paid to unlawful Possessors of the Throne. In the same views he passes on to Henry the Second, whom he maintains to have been a rightful King, because it is most probable, that his Mother, the Empress Maud, had resigned her right to him. Here he answers Dr. Higden's argument from a passage in our Homilies; discovers a mistake committed by the Compilers of them; defends Bishop Merks against Dr. Higden's reflections upon his pretended submission to Henry IV; argues against the Doctor, who says, there were no Nonjurors under Kings de facto; and pretends, that ought to be presumed, till the contrary is proved; and produces instances of several, that ought to be reputed such. He also takes notice, that in those days the inferior Clergy were not obliged to take oaths of allegiance; and suggests, that, had the Clergy of England enjoyed this privilege, at the time of the late Revolution, near four hundred of them had quietly continued in possession of their Livings, of which they were for no other reason deprived, but because they were Nonjurors, &c. The Author asserts, that a King de facto is not legally qualified to give a Commission to Judges; nor are proceedings in his Courts of Judicature of any authority. He cannot create a Nobleman, or make a Bishop. All his presentations to Benefices are voidable. All lands bestowed upon him are refundable, at the pleasure of the rightful Successor.

This book was not only advertised in the Octob. 17. London Gazette, with particular allowance (as was then reported) of Mr. Secretary Bromley, but dispersed and recommended with great industry; and many copies of it were given gratis, by some men in power, to several Officers of the army. It was said likewise to have been presented to the Queen herself by Mr. Robert Nelson. As it was obvious to every reader, that the design of this performance was to prepare the way for the Restoration of the Pretender, the well-affected to the House of Hanover could not but be alarmed at it; especially, as the book came abroad with marks of distinction and public countenance; not to mention the quotations in it, out of some manuscripts in the Library of the Lord-Treasurer. However, the Ministry thought it necessary to animadvert upon it; and Mr. Richard Smith, the Bookeller, having, by a warrant from the Lord Bolingbroke, been brought to his Office, and there examined, he declared, that Mr. Hilliab Bedford, a Nonjuror Clergyman, had delivered the copy to the Printer. This being owned by Bedford, they were both bound over to appear before the Court of Queen's-Bench. But, though a prosecution was afterwards, for form-sake, begun and carried on against Bedford, yet it was the general opinion, that he had but a small share in that performance, which was judged to be the result of the joint labours of several Nonjurors (1). This book was soon refuted in several answers, of which one was supposed to be written by Mr. Willis, then Fellow of All-Souls College in Oxford, and now Lord-Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, intitled, The present Constitution and the Pretendant Succession vindicated.

About this time it was publicly declared, that the Queen had granted a pardon under the Great-Seal to Daniel de Foe, against whom an information of high treason had been lodged, for writing three pamphlets, which seemed to favour the Pretender's interests (2).

By this time the elections for Parliament-men were over; and, in North-Britain, the Nobility had chosen such Representatives, as were most of them ready to concur in all the Queen's measures; namely, the Duke of Atbol, the Earls of Mar, Eglinton, Kinnoul, Loudoun, Findlater and Seafield, Selkirk, Northesk, Dundonald, Broadalbin, Dunmore, Orkney, Roseberry, Portmore, and Killyb, and the Lord Balmerinach: And, in order to attach yet more the Earl of Dunmore to the Court, he was, not long after, declared Colonel of the Scots regiment of foot-guards, in the room of the Marquis of Lothian. About the same time, the regiment of dragoons, lately commanded by Sir Richard Temple, was given to Major-to be forward in passing judgments on the actions of Princes. The Authors, who have transmitted to us an account of Edward's reign, say nothing upon this subject; either that the Descendants of Edward Ironside laid claim to the Crown; or that King Edward discovered any inclination to do them justice, at least till the eleventh year of his reign: But it may, possibly, be unreasonable from hence to infer, that all that time he was a wrongful Possessor, because cases may be supposed of Princes, who, for want of power and opportunity of doing right to the lawful Heir, are forced to endure the burden of a Crown, which they would readily and gladly ease themselves of, upon a proper occasion: As when the rightful Heir is abroad, in a distant Kingdom, and perhaps at the disposal of a foreign Prince, on whose will and pleasure, his return to his Country chiefly depends. When the Possessor of a Throne has this to plead for himself (which may be true of King Edward, for any thing that can be alleged to the contrary) I may appeal to the severest interpreters of the actions of Princes, whether the exercise of royal power, in such circumstances, can be charged with Usurpation; or, as some chuse rather to express themselves, whether such a person is only a King de facto: For it is not the bare seizing, and sitting a Throne, but the will of the Possessor, that must denominate him an Usurper. He that invades another's right, with an intention to detain it from him, and a resolution never to restore it to the true Proprietor, is certainly guilty of the highest injustice; but, if he accepts of a Crown, only that he may secure it to the right Owner, and the better disappoint the designs of his enemies, most certainly he obliges him by a very extraordinary act of friendship.

(1) In the Introduction to one of the answers, called Treason Unmask'd, the Author says, 'This book contains a great variety of historical facts, positions and arguments, couched in an elegant, flowing style; but then there are in it so many glaring contradictions and inconsistencies, that it is hardly credible, the whole piece should be the work of any one man. For here any tolerably attentive reader may find History clashing with History; Law destroying Law; and Divinity refuting Divinity, in cases exactly parallel: A fault I will not charge upon any single person, till I am convinced that a too favourable opinion of Gentlemen, and men of letters, led me into a mistake.' But it is now known that the real author of the book was one Mr. Harbin a Nonjuror Clergyman, who died the last year 1744.

1713. Major-General Evans; and the regiment of horie of the Marquis of Harwich (son of the Duke of Schomberg) lately deceased, to Major-General Syburg. Some time before, Mr. Richard Steele, being chosen for the Borough of Stockbridge, thought fit to resign his place of one of the Commissioners of the Stamp-Office. About the same time the Lord Willoughby of Brooke was made Dean of St. George's Chapel, in the Castle of Windsor, but Dr. Smalridge, being named to succeed the Lord Privy-Seal, as Bishop of Bristol, declined that offer.

Jari at Court. Annals.

On the 18th of October, the Parliament was, by proclamation, further prorogued, from the 12th of November to the 10th of December, which was occasioned by the Queen's illness, and the contests among the Ministers. It was then strongly reported, that the Lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Secretary Bromley, and Sir William Wyndham (who, on the 1st of November, was made a Privy-Counsellor) having gained the ascendant, the Lord-Treasurer entertained thoughts of retirement. And, indeed, the Author of the paper, called the Examiner, thought fit, about the middle of November, to prepare the minds of the people for an approaching change in the Ministry (1). But what appeared more surprizing, was the ludicrous stile in which the same Author, who was the mouth of those in power, spoke of the Queen's indisposition, and of the Succession in case of a demise (2).

The Crisis published by Mr. Steele.

Whilst things were in this dangerous situation,

Mr. Steele published his Crisis, or a discourse representing, from the most authentic records, the just causes of the late happy Revolution, and the several Settlements of the Crowns of England and Scotland on her Majesty; and, on her demise without issue, upon the most illustrious Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess-Dowager of Hannover, and the Heirs of her body being Protestants; by previous acts of both Parliaments of the late Kingdoms of England and Scotland; and confirmed by the Parliament of Great-Britain: With some remarks on the danger of a Popish Successor. The design of this piece was first suggested to Mr. Steele, by Mr. Moor of the Inner-Temple; and the work itself passed through the hands of Mr. Addison, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Hoadley. And it was so well received by the public, that many were confirmed by it in their affection to the Protestant Succession.

Some time before, the Earl of Peterborough set out on his embassy to the King of Sicily; and, as he took Paris in his way, it was given out, that he was charged to intercede with the French King in favour of the Catalans, who, formerly, upon his promises of the Queen's firm protection, had declared for King Charles the Third; and who, though abandoned, seemed now resolved to defend their liberties to the last extremity.

All this while the Queen continued in a very dangerous state of health at Windsor; of which the Queen's illness.

Pretender's possessing the Crown of Great-Britain. And the third called, An answer to the question that no body thinks of, viz. What if the Queen should die? The preamble to the patent of pardon set forth, that Daniel de Foë had by his humble petition represented to her Majesty, 'That he, with a sincere design to propagate the interest of the House of Hanover, and to animate the people against the designs of the Pretender, whom he always looked upon as an enemy to her Majesty's sacred Person and Government, did publish the said pamphlets; in all which books, although the titles seemed to look as if written in favour of the Pretender, and several expressions, as in all ironical writings it must be, might be wrested against the true design of the whole, and turned to a meaning quite different from the intention of the Author; yet he had humbly assured her Majesty in the solemnest manner, that his true and only design, in all the said books, was, by an ironical discourse of recommending the Pretender, in the strongest and most forcible manner to expose his designs, and the ruinous consequences of his succeeding therein; which will appear by the books themselves, where the following expressions are very plain, viz. that the Pretender is recommended as a person proper to amass the English Liberties into his own Sovereignty; supply them with the privileges of wearing Wooden Shoes; easing them of the trouble of chusing Parliaments, and the Nobility and Gentry of the hazard and expence of winter journeys, by governing them in that more righteous method of his absolute will, and enforcing the laws by a glorious Standing Army; paying all the Nation's debts at once by stopping the Funds, and shutting up the Exchequer; easing and quieting their differences in religion, by bringing them to the Union of Popery, or leaving them at liberty to have no religion at all.' Daniel de Foë's Appeal to honour and justice, p. 33.

(1) In the Examiner of November the 16th, the Author suggests, 'That in a Constitution, which hangs together by so many minute parts, and which depends upon such variety of wheels and motions, where power and freedom are in a perpetual flux and reflux, we must of necessity be liable to turns and contingencies.—That this uncertainty is redoubled, wherever strife and contention are let loose in a Nation, where factions rage and worry one another; and even the Government itself is treated as a party—Thus, under these circumstances, a Ministry is obliged to act in another capacity than that which properly belongs to them. They must sometimes act like military as well as civil Officers; draw forth their forces, and appear at the head of squadrons and battalions, whenever faction takes the field, and declares open war against them. There wants but very little of bringing things, as they now stand, to this deplorable crisis.—That the possession of power under these difficulties, is almost as great an uncertainty, as the fortune of war, and stands exposed to as many turns and cross accidents.—And that these considerations amount to a full proof, that the best of Patriots are more exposed to mortality, as Ministers of State, than as men, &c.

(2) The Examiner of January the 8th, 1713-14, contains what follows:

'According to the best advices sent us by the Whigs, and their Oracles, the demise of the Crown happened upon Thursday the 24th of December, being Christmas-Eve, at four of the clock in the morning, in the year 1713. All ages, ranks, sexes, and orders of men, at first hearing of the ill news, were affected with the deepest sorrow; and a general panic ran through the whole Kingdom. For a long time, we were distracted and inconfolable; in the utmost horror and confusion, upon the loss of our most excellent Queen, who then became immortal: But these black clouds were soon dispersed, our fears and jealousies vanished, and we revived from a deplorable state of grief and misery, at the first joyful tidings of the happy accession of her most sacred Majesty Queen Anne the Second (whom God long preserve) to the Throne of her ancestors: The nature of our monarchy being such, that, immediately after the death of the person in possession, the Crown, by Right of Inheritance, descends to the next heir, without any previous formalities and conditions, or admitting so much as the least vacancy, or Interregnum, &c.

(1) The

1713. truth was thus, as represented by Dr. Shadwell, in his letters to the Duke and Dukes of Sbrensbury: * On Wednesday the 23d of December, her Majesty was very uneasy all night with the Gout in her foot. The next morning it went intirely off, and she said she was well. But, about one o'clock that day, she complained of a pain in her thigh, and was seized with a violent shivering, which lasted above two hours. Extreme heat followed, with intense thirst, great anxiety, restlessness, and inquietude. The pulse was full, hard, and quick; which Dr. Shadwell finding, the next day, he very much pressed bleeding, urging, it would probably carry off a good part of the Fever, and bring a fit of the Gout; but it was not agreed to; and these symptoms continued till Saturday Morning, when her Majesty fell asleep, waked refreshed, and on Sunday morning there was a perfect intermission of the symptoms; but the pulse, in Dr. Shadwell's opinion was not quiet. The next night about twelve, she was attacked with an exacerbation of the Fever, which lasted all the Monday till midnight. Most of the Queen's Physicians judging her distemper to be an Ague, proposed and pressed the giving her the Jesuits-Bark; but, though this was warmly opposed by Dr. Shadwell, yet the Physician, who watched that night, gave it, saying, he found the pulse calm. No exacerbation appeared after this: But nevertheless Dr. Shadwell still declared, he did not like the pulse: That there was no perfect intermission of the Fever; but that the pulse was at work, to separate the morbid matter into the Gout, or some worse shape. The pains of the thigh increasing, till three or four doses of the bark were given, Dr. Shadwell laid a stress upon having that part examined; but the other Physicians called it a fit of the Gout. Dr. Shadwell answered, it could not properly be called so in the muscles; and being of opinion, that this was an inflammatory Fever from the translation of the Gout, and not a common Ague, or intermitting Fever; and finding, that, after thirty-nine hours continuance, there was a perfect remission, but no intermission, he made a prognostic, that, unless the feverish matter were separated and thrown off into a smart fit of the Gout, a worse symptom might happen; as its falling into the thigh, and fixing into an erysipelous tumour. This opinion was justified by a severe fit of the Gout, that came upon her Majesty a few days after, and gave some hopes of her intire recovery.

While the Queen was in this uncertain state of health, the minds of the several parties were variously agitated. The friends of the Pretender believed, that all things were preparing for his Restoration; and, on the other hand, the alarm of the well-affected to the Hanover Succession was not a little increased upon the news, that a squadron of fourteen men of war was fitting out in the ports of France; and that they were to take on board twelve or fourteen thousand land-men. The public funds fell gradually from the beginning till the end of January; when such a panic seized on a sudden the minded men, that there was a great run upon the Bank for some Days. The Directors lent four of their Members, to the Lord-Treasurer, to represent the dangers, which threatened the public credit, and to desire his advice and assistance. The Treasurer received this application very favourably; endeavoured to dispel their fears; and promised to use his utmost endeavours to support the Bank in this exigency. The doubts, which were still entertained about the Queen's health, being one of the chief occasions of the public alarm, she, by the advice of her Ministers, wrote the following letter to Sir Samuel Stanier, Lord-Mayor of London:

ANNE, R.

"Right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Although an aguish indisposition succeeded by a fit of the Gout has detained us at this place, longer than we designed; yet since it has pleased Almighty God to restore us to such a degree of health, that we hope to be able soon to return to our usual residence, we continue determined to open our Parliament on Tuesday the 16th of this instant February, according to the notice given by Proclamation. Thus much we have judged proper to communicate to you, and by you to the Court of Aldermen, and to our loving Subjects of our good City of London, to the intent that you may all, in your several stations, contribute to discountenance and put a stop to those malicious rumours, spread by evil-minded persons, to the prejudice of credit, and to the eminent hazard of the public peace and tranquillity. And so we bid you farewell."

Given at our Castle at Windsor, the first day of February 1713, in the twelfth year of our reign.

By her Majesty's command,

BOLINGBROKE.

This letter, and the news, which, at the same time, came from Holland, That the troops, which had been reported to be assembled in the Bolognese, were mere chimeras, and that the Pretender continued in Lorrain, dispelled the fears of the generality, and soon put a stop to the run upon the Bank (1). While the Nation was in this ferment, and under various apprehensions, there was published a remarkable pamphlet, intitled, The art of restoring; or the piety and probity of General Monk, in bringing about the last Restoration, evinced from his own authentic letters: With a just account of Sir Roger, who runs the parallel as far as he can: In a letter to a Minister of State at the Court of Vienna. This piece was levelled against the Treasurer, and contributed the more to render him obnoxious to the friends of the Protestant Succession, when it was known to be the performance of Mr. Toland, a person formerly intrusted and employed by that Minister. To remove these suspicions, the Treasurer thought fit to have the reputed Author of the late treatise, asserting hereditary rights, brought to his trial; and Bedford being found

(1) The Directors, however, were obliged to call in, twice, twenty per cent. upon the subscription for circulating Exchequer bills.

1713. found guilty of publishing that book, he was sentenced, 'To pay a fine of a thousand marks; to be committed to the Queen's-Bench prison, till he paid the same; to remain in custody there for the term of three years; to find four sufficient sureties, who, with him, were to be bound in a recognizance of five thousand pounds for his good behaviour during life. He was also to be brought into all the Courts of Westminster-Hall, with a paper on his head denoting his offence. But, after sentence was passed, an order was produced from the Government, counter-signed by a Secretary of State, directing the Judges of the Queen's-Bench to supersede the ignominious part of the punishment, by reason of the sacred function of the criminal; which proceeding, as Mr. Leechmere observed in a speech, 'could bear no other construction, than as a license and protection to men in holy orders, to propagate that destructive position with impunity; and the character of the person, which ought in justice to have aggravated his guilt, and heightened his punishment, became his indemnity against the reproach of it, even by the authority of the Government itself, against which that treatise was levelled. This indulgence appeared the more glaring, considering what severities were, at the same time, exercised against those persons, who had courage enough to assert the interest of their Country, and of the Protestant Succession.'

During these transactions at home, the treaty of Peace between Great-Britain and Spain had been signed on the 13th of July, 1713, N. S. but the treaty of Commerce was not concluded till the 28th of November, O. S. In the mean time the Emperor chose rather to make a bold stand against the whole power of France, than to accept the conditions imposed upon him by that Crown. But the loss of Landau and Friburg, after two memorable sieges, inclined him to hearken to overtures of peace, made him on the part of France, by the Electors of Cologne and Palatine.

Conferences at Radstadt not communicated to the Queen's Ministers.

The conferences held at Radstadt towards a treaty between Prince Eugene of Savoy and the Marshall de Villars were managed with such secrecy, as gave no small uneasiness to the two maritime powers, and was generally looked upon as a slight upon Great-Britain. The Earl of Strafford, who still continued at the Hague, was ordered to confer upon it with the Deputies of the States, to whom he made a long harangue. The substance of what he said will be plainly seen, in the answer returned by the States a few days after to the Earl of Strafford: 'They thanked him for the assurances of friendship he gave them on the part of her Majesty of Great-Britain, and offered to concert with her the measures proper to be taken for the security of the Protestant Religion, especially in the Empire, and for procuring the abolition of the clause of the fourth article of the peace of Ryswick. As to the apprehension of a new war in Italy, the States hoped, that, by the peace of Radstadt, the Emperor and the King of France had provided for the tranquillity of that Country; and that they had likewise regulated the affairs relating to the Duke of Savoy, and to Sicily; for this reason, and because the conditions of that peace were not yet known to them, they could not, at present, enter into deliberation with the Earl of Strafford upon those matters: That as to the treaty with Spain, the States had the regards they ought to her Majesty's recommendations, for the interests of the Princess Ursini; but that they had given such good reasons, why they could not agree in a guarantee, that the King of France, and even the King of Spain, had acquiesced in them. That, for this reason, the States promised themselves, from the Queen's goodness and equity, that she would not insist upon a thing, which even the King of Spain himself had let drop. That, as to the affairs of the Spanish Netherlands, the States would always be ready to confer with the Earl of Strafford on the points relating to the interests of those Countries. As to the town of Offend in particular, they declared, that they would withdraw their troops from thence, and deliver it into the hands of Walloon troops, as soon as Dunkirk should be demolished; provided, at the same time they were put into possession of the Castle of Ghent, as by the treaty of Barrier they ought: But that the States were absolutely of opinion, it would be proper to communicate these things to the Emperor, and to act in concert with him, it not being to be doubted, that the Spanish Netherlands were yielded to him by the peace of Radstadt. That they were extremely glad of the declarations her Majesty had caused to be made to them, of her willingness to withdraw her troops from the Castle of Ghent; as also from Bruges and Newport; and to assist the States in recovering from Brabant the million, which by the treaty of Barrier they ought to have from that province: But as to the conditions, which were added to that declaration, the States expected from her equity and affection, that it would not be her intention, that the effect of these things should be made dependent on some conditions, which were not expressed in the treaty of Barrier, and that, on the contrary, she would be pleased to look upon that treaty as a measure and a rule, as the States did on their part; and that they would not join the execution of it to conditions, which are new and foreign to that treaty. That they had a common interest with the Queen in securing the freedom of commerce in the Baltick: That they were not yet in a condition to take a positive resolution thereupon; but, when they were, they would confer about it with the Earl of Strafford.'

The Earl was very busy in negotiating with the Ministers of the Protestant Princes of Germany, or Deputations from the Protestants, to assist at the Congress at Baden in Switzerland, for concluding a peace between the Emperor and France, pursuant to the resolution taken at Radstadt. But it was generally suspected, that this proceeding of the English Ministry was rather to perplex the Emperor, than to favour the Protestants; and therefore, when the Earl of Strafford declared to the Ministers of the Protestant Electors and Princes of the Empire, 'That the Queen, his Mistress, had received the letter, which the Protestant body had written to her from Augsburg, touching the clause of the fourth article of the treaty of Ryswick: That her Majesty would speedily return a favourable answer to it; and that she resolved to send a Minister to the Congress at Baden, whither she desired the States-General and the Protestant States of the Empire to send their's.' The States answered, 'That, the Empire having referred it to his imperial Majesty to conclude the peace, it was believed, the Electors and Princes would not send any Ministers thither; and, for that reason, they did not think it proper to send any on their part. It seems, the States had been given to understand, that the Emperor would not admit any Minister from the Queen of Great-Britain, (though she had appointed Mr. Charles Whitworth for that purpose) nor from them, that there might be no distinction.

On the other hand, the Emperor, to shew his resentment of the Negotiation at Utrecht, not only refused to conclude his treaty with France, without the intervention of the maritime powers; but, as a further mortification to Great-Britain, Baron Heems declared to the States-Deputies, 'That his Imperial Majesty was disposed to treat with the States, concerning a barrier in the Netherlands: That the treaty might be prepared and brought to some maturity at the Hague; but that the Emperor would be glad to have it concluded at Vienna, whither the States were desired to send a Minister: And that Offend might not be alienated from the Netherlands.' The States-Deputies having acquainted the Earl of Strafford with this declaration, he expressed his great surprize at it, and told them, 'He was obliged to inform them, that the States were guaranties of the Succession in the Protestant Line, as well as the Queen was guarantee of the Barrier in the Spanish Netherlands; and that the Protestant Succession should stand good, and have effect, as it should come in order; but that she would never suffer any laws to be prescribed or imposed upon her on that account: That the Queen, as well as the States, was interested in the affair of the barrier; and therefore no step ought to be taken in it, without acting in concert with her: That he had orders to declare, in the name of the Queen, that the treating and concluding on the barrier at Vienna seemed to be proposed, with intention only to exclude her from the Negotiations about it: That, in such a case, she would forthwith renounce all engagements with the Republic; for that she absolutely insisted upon sending a Minister likewise thither, for the reasons before-mentioned: That she had sent to the King of France for an explanation, touching the exchanging some places in the Spanish Netherlands, according to the treaty of Rastadt, and had received for answer, that the King of France would not concern himself therein: That, as to what Baron Heems had mentioned in relation to Offend, he (the Earl of Strafford) declared, he was content with it; but earnestly desired, that the States would not send to Vienna, nor do any thing in this Negotiation, but in concert with her Majesty: Adding, once more, that, pursuant to his orders, he must declare, that she would look upon such a proceeding as a formed design to dissolve all engagements now subsisting between Her and the States.' Had the Dutch been as warm as the British Ministers, and taken them at their word, the consequences must have been fatal to both: But the matter was accommodated afterwards. The Earl of Strafford endeavoured to draw to the Hague the Negotiation of peace in the North; and engaged the Court of France by Monsieur de Chateaufort, their Ambassador at the Hague, to offer their mediation for that purpose to the Northern Allies. But, the King of Prussia having caused the King of Poland to be founded, whether he was inclined to enter into the engagement Baron Sparre and the Count de Rottenburg had proposed at the Hague, on the part of France, his Polish Majesty signified, that he could never have any such thoughts, for it could never be his interest to separate himself from his Allies.

By this time the Earl of Strafford, and indeed Promis- all the Ministers at the Hague were more attentive to the transactions in Great-Britain, than to any thing, that passed on the Continent. The Queen, upon her recovery, being informed of the death of Dr. Sharp, Archbishop of Dorset, named Sir William Dawes to that metropolitan See, which had been strongly solicited by Bishop Atterbury. At the same time, Dr. Smalridge was made Bishop of Bristol, and Lord Almoner to the Queen; and Dr. Gastrell, Preacher at Lincoln's-Inn, Bishop of Chester, in the room of Sir William Dawes. The second troop of horse grenadier guards, vacant by the death of the Earl of Crawford, was given to the young Earl Marischal, a Scots Peer of known zeal for the Jacobite cause.

On the 6th of February, being the anniversary of the Queen's Birth-day, it was celebrated with great solemnity; and the Whigs, particularly the Hanover Club, took this occasion to signalize their zeal and affection to the Protestant Succession, by causing the effigies of the Devil, the Pope, and the Pretender, to be carried in Procession from Charing-Cross to the Royal Exchange, and so back to Charing-Cross, where they were burnt. Three drummers of the foot-guards attending the procession, and having, contrary to the rights of the City, beat their drums there, were seized, and committed to Newgate by warrant of the Lord-Mayor. Some endeavoured to represent this procession as a formed plot against the Government; but, the Ministry not thinking proper to take notice of the affair, the drummers were discharged.

Whatever professions of affection to the Protestant Succession were made by some of the Ministers, it was obvious, that every step, others took in favour of France, was also in favour of the Pretender. The Treasurer, during the Queen's illness, endeavoured to persuade her to send the Duke of Kent to Hanover, with a public character. But the Duke declined the employment, unless he was empowered to offer more real securities than fair words and promises. However, Mr. Harley, Cousin to the Treasurer, went from the Hague to the Court of Hanover, about the middle of February, accompanied by Secretary Bromley's son, Mr. Cresset, and Mr. Winnington.

The Queen, on the 16th of February, removed from Windſor to Hampton-Court, and next day came to St. James's. The day before, the new Parliament met, and the Lord Scudamore proposed Sir Thomas Hanmer for Speaker, and was seconded by three or four other Members, particularly by Mr. Steele, who observed, 'That, at the close of the last Parliament, her Majesty was graciously pleased to declare from the Throne, that the late rejected bill of Commerce between Great-Britain and France should be offered to this House. That this declaration was certainly made, that every Gentleman, who should have the honour to be returned to Parliament, might make himself master of that important question. That it is a demonstration, that ^{1713-14.} that was a most pernicious bill; and therefore no man could have a greater merit to this House, than his by whose weight and authority that pernicious bill was thrown out. That he rose up to do Sir Thomas Hanmer honour, and distinguish himself by giving that Gentleman his vote for that his inestimable service to his Country. At Mr. Steele's mentioning the bill of Commerce, the clamour against him began; at calling it pernicious, it increased; and at the words, doing him honour, it grew insupportably loud: By which he saw the temper of the house with regard to himself. But Sir Thomas Hanmer was chosen without any opposition, and the House adjourned to the 2d of March.

During the adjournment, the South-Sea Company held a General Court, in which the Directors communicated to them several papers they had prepared in concert with the Lord-Treasurer, relating to the Affiento Contract. Several Members were extremely surprized at the proposals; for, whereas they expected that the Queen had procured the whole Affiento Contract for the Company, they now found, that one half of the clear profits were reserved for the Queen, and the King of Spain, besides seven and a half per cent. granted to an unknown person. Besides these exceptions, Mr. Milner, a Portugal Merchant, declared his opinion, 'That the Company might very well spare the trying the experiment of a trade, by which other Nations were known to have been losers; especially upon such terms, as were offered to the Company; the rather, because the trade would be precarious, and at the mercy of the late reconciled enemies.' He was supported by other merchants, so that Arthur Moore, who spoke in behalf of this trade, could not make many proselytes to his opinion. The result of this assembly was an order for the printing of the papers laid before them, in order to their being further considered in another general Court. This second meeting was very numerous; and after the reading of the papers, several speeches were made for and against the accepting the Affiento Contract, of which Mr. Moore and Mr. Ward endeavoured to shew the great advantages. But Mr. Craggs, Mr. Newman, Mr. Fisher, and some other Gentlemen of great skill and experience in commercial affairs, maintained the contrary opinion, with such force of argument, that it was thought, if the question had then been put for accepting, or not accepting, it would have been carried for the latter by a great majority. But it being moved and agreed, to decide the question by ballot, and the Members to have one vote for every five hundred pounds capital stock; what by the influence of the Directors, who were to be the managers of the trade, and who (as in all other societies of this nature) were almost sure to be gainers, whatever became of the rest; what by the contrivance of Stock-Jobbers, whose business was to keep the public funds in perpetual fluctuation, and, in order to that, to engage Companies in dubious adventures; what by the just apprehensions, the generality of the Members were under that the rejecting of this trade would be interpreted as an affront to the Lord-Treasurer, who might resent it to such a degree, as to grow less solicitous for the concerns of the Company, who wanted his protection for the annual provision of the interest of the capital stock, till the year 1716: Upon these, and some other considerations it was carried by a great majority, 'That the General Court agreed with the resolution proposed by the Court of Directors, relating to the Affiento Contract.'

^{1713-14.} but agreed to at last.

About the same time, were brought over from Holland the ratifications exchanged of the treaty of Commerce between Great-Britain and Spain, and the Peace was proclaimed on the 1st of March. The chief articles were: France and Spain were never to be united: The Protestant Succession acknowledged, and never to be opposed on any pretence: Navigation and Commerce, as in the treaty of 1667: No license to be given to the French or other Nations to introduce Negroes, or any merchandises, into the Spanish Dominions in America, except what might be agreed by the treaty of Commerce, and the privileges granted in the Affiento de Negros; except also what should be granted by the Catholic King, after the Affiento de Negros should be determined: The American Dominions were not to be alienated from the Crown of Spain, to the French or other Nations: Gibraltar and the Island of Minorca were given up for ever to England: No Moors to come there, but on account of traffick: All the Spanish Inhabitants to enjoy their Estates and Religion; or to sell their estates and retire: The South-Sea Company to have the privileges, inclusive of others, to introduce Negroes into several parts of America for thirty years, beginning from 1713, in the same manner as enjoyed by the French: The Catalans to have a full pardon, with the possession of all their privileges, estates, and honours, and likewise the same privileges with the Inhabitants of both Castiles: Sicily was yielded to the Duke of Savoy, but to return to Spain, in case of no heirs. By two separate articles, the Queen promised to persist in the measures, by which she had taken care, that no other part of the Spanish Monarchy should be torn from it: And obliged herself to procure the Princess Ursini to be put into possession of Limburg, or some other country in the Netherlands, which should produce thirty thousand crowns a year, pursuant to a grant from King Philip, September 28, 1711.

The day after the publication of this peace, the Queen went in a chair to the House of Lords (the Parliament having been opened by Commission) and made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I Have much satisfaction in being able, at the opening of this Parliament, to tell you, that the ratifications of the treaties of Peace and of Commerce with Spain are changed, by which my subjects will have greater opportunities than ever to improve and extend their trade. Many advantages, formerly enjoyed by connivance, and procured by such methods, as made a distinction between one British Merchant and another, are now settled by treaty, and an equal rule is established.

" It has pleased God to bless my endeavours to obtain an honourable and advantageous peace for my own people, and for the greatest part of my Allies. Nothing, which I can do, shall be wanting to render it universal; and I persuade myself, that, with your hearty concurrence, my interposition may at last prove "Europe.

"In the mean while, I congratulate with my "own subjects, that they are delivered from a
"confuming land-war, and entered on a peace,
"the good effects whereof nothing but intestine
"divisions can obstruct.

"It was the glory of the wisest and greatest "of my Predecessors to hold the balance of "Europe, and to keep it equal, by casting in "their weight as necessity required. By this "conduct they enriched the Kingdom, and "rendered themselves dreadful to their enemies, "and useful to their friends. I have proceeded "on the same principle, and I doubt not but "my Successors will follow these examples.

"Our situation points out to us our true in"terest; for this Country can flourish only by "trade, and will be most formidable by the "right application of our naval force.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have ordered such accounts to be prepared "and laid before you, as will shew you, at the "conclusion of the war, the true state of your "condition, whereby you will be better able "to judge what aids are necessary: And I only "ask of you Supplies for the current service of "the year, and for the discharge of such debts,
"as you shall find, on examination, to be just
"and reasonable.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The joy, which has been generally expres"sed on my recovery from my late indisposi-
"tion, and on my coming to this City, I esteem
"as a return to that tender affection which I "have always had for my people.

"I wish that effectual care had been taken,
"as I have often desired, to suppress those se-
"ditionary papers, and factious rumours, by which "designing men have been able to sink credit,
"and the innocent have suffered.

"There are some, who are arrived to that "height of malice, as to insinuate, that the "Protestant Succession in the House of Han-
"over is in danger under my Government.

"Those, who go about thus to distract the "minds of men with imaginary dangers, can "only mean to disturb the present tranquillity,
"and bring real mischief upon us.

"After all I have done to secure our religion "and your liberties, and to transmit both safe to "posterity, I cannot mention these proceedings
"without some degree of warmth; and I must "hope you will all agree with me, that at"tempts to weaken my authority, or to render "the possession of the Crown uneasy to me, can "never be proper means to strengthen the Pro"testant Succession.

"I have done, and shall continue to do my "best for the good of all my subjects. Let it "be your endeavour, as it shall be mine, to "unite our differences, not by relaxing from the "strictest adherence to our Constitution in "Church and State, but by observing the laws "yourself, and enforcing a due obedience to "them in others.

"A long war has not only impoverished the "public (however some particular men have "been gainers by it) but has also greatly af- 1713-14.

"fected Government itself.

"Let it be your care so to improve the pre"sent opportunity, as to lay the foundation of "recovering from those disorders.

"I had the concurrence of the last Parliament
"in making the peace. Let it be the honour "of this to assist me in obtaining such fruits
"from it, as may not only derive blessings on "the present age, but even down to the latest
"posterity."

It is observable, though the Queen said in her speech, that she was persuaded her interpositions might at last prove effectual, and compleat the Settlement of Europe, the Emperor, then in treaty with France, would not let her know any thing of what was transacted, or have the least communication with her to the last hour of her life. But, how dissonant soever the Queen's The Lords speech was in several particulars, both Lords and address Commoners fell in for the most part with it; thanks and, after she had thanked the Lords for their March 3.
affectionate address, she added, 'That they, who were nearest the Throne, would first of her subjects feel the evil consequences of any diminution of the regal authority; that it was a comfort to her she had the assurance of their support; and they might depend upon it, she would never give way to the least attempt on the just authorities of the Crown, or any of their rights and privileges.'

The Commons likewise resolved on an address The Com- without opposition, only Sir Peter King, Re- mons ad- corder of London, suggested, 'That they ought dress not to act by a spirit of Divination, and return March 5.
thanks for the treaty of Commerce with Spain, before they knew, whether the same was advantageous, or not: Which occasioned some modifications in the address with respect to that head.

The next day the Convocation (which had met with the Parliament, and chosen Dr. Stanhope, Prolocutor) complimented the Queen in a joint address on her recovery, and happy return to her royal City in health and safety: Concluding with their wishes, 'That, after a long and happy reign, she might be able to transmit the protection of this Church and State to a Protestant Successor in the illustrious House of Hanover, which her Majesty to the great satisfaction and comfort of all her faithful and good subjects, had so often declared to be at her Royal heart.'
Notwithstanding this, and the angry expressions in the Queen's speech, the fears and jealousies of the well-affected to the Hanover Succession were rather increased than removed, who, from the daily discouragements and even insults they met with, could not but conclude that Succession to be in danger.

The Earl of Wharton made a complaint in the Complaint
House of Lords against a libel, intitled, The of a libel public spirit of the Whigs set forth in their gene-
rous encouragement of the Author of the Crisis. House of Lords.
This libel (which was fathered upon Dr. Swift Pr. H. L. and Lord Bolingbroke) was written in the ludicrous and sarcastic strains of the Tale of a Tub.
After some scurrilous reflections on Mr. Steele, and occasionally on the Earl of Nottingham, with some jests on the implicit munificence of the Subscribers to the Crisis: The Author attacks the Union, reflects on the whole Scots Nation, and, without reserve, insults the Duke of Argyle,

1713-14. who of late had broken all measures with the Ministry (1). This piece was generally looked upon as very impolitic and ill-timed; since the sixteen Scots Peers, who sat in the House of Lords, and who (at least there) were the principal support of those at the Helm, were involved in the general reflections on the Scots Nation. The Earl of Wharton's complaint against this libel being warmly espoused by the majority of the Peers, the Lord-Treasurer protested he knew nothing of it; exclaimed against the malicious insinuations contained in it; and readily joined with the House, in an order for committing John Morpew, the Publisher, to the custody of the Black-Rod. Morpew upon his examination, having declared, that an unknown Porter had brought to his house the copies of the pamphlet in question, from the house of John Barber, Printer of the Gazette, and of the Votes of the House of Commons, Barber was also ordered into custody, and both he and Morpew were, severally, examined at the bar of the House of Lords. Morpew stood to his former declaration, and owned the publishing and selling of that libel; but Barber said, he knew nothing of it, and insisted not to answer any questions, the answer to which might tend to accuse himself, or to corroborate the accusation against him.* Being both withdrawn, the Earl of Wharton said, 'They had nothing to do either with the Publisher or Printer; but that it highly concerned the honour of that August Assembly, to find out the Villain, who was the Author of that false and scandalous libel, in order to do to the Scots Nation justice.' And moved, 'That, in order to that discovery, Barber might be again examined the next day, together with his Journeymen and Servants.' This was readily agreed to; but, the next day, the Earl of Mar, one of the Secretaries of State, acquainted the House, that, pursuant to the Queen's commands, he had directed John Barber to be prosecuted. The Earl of Wharton desired to know, upon what evidence they designed to proceed against him? But the Earl of Mar, replied, That he wondered, such a question should be put to a Secretary of State, who was known to be under an oath of secrecy: And this put a stop to all further enquiries about Barber's affair, in a Parliamentary way. Three days after, Barber and Morpew were, upon their petition, enlarged from the custody of the Black-Rod. However, the Lords resolved upon an address, reciting the steps they had taken in this affair; notwithstanding which, 'they had not been able to discover the Author of the libel, which they conceived to be a false, malicious and factitious libel, highly dishonourable and scandalous to her Majesty's subjects of Scotland, tending to the destruction of the Constitution, and (by making false and unjust reflections upon the Union, and the steps and motives to it) most injurious to her Majesty, who had been pleased often to declare from the Throne, that the Union of the two Kingdoms was the peculiar happiness of her reign, in making a full provision for the peace and quiet of her people, and the security of their Religion, by so firm an establishment of the Protestant Succession throughout Great-Britain. That nothing therefore might be wanting on their parts towards the discovering and punishing so great a Criminal, they humbly besought her Majesty to issue her Royal proclamation, with a reward to any person, who should discover the Author.' Accordingly, the same day, a proclamation was published, with a reward of three hundred pounds. But, nevertheless, Dr. Swift, the reputed Author, remained undiscovered to the public, though, at the same time, notwithstanding the indecency of his character

(1) The passage that gave most offence to the Lords was as follows:

'This work (the Union of the two Kingdoms) was unsuccessfully attempted by several of her Majesty's Predecessors, though I do not remember it was ever thought on by any, except King James the First, and the late King William. I have read indeed, that some small overtures were made by the former of these Princes towards an union between the two Kingdoms, but rejected with indignation and contempt by the English. And the Historian tells, that, how degenerate and corrupt soever the Court and Parliament then were they would not give ear to so infamous a proposal. I do not find, that any of the succeeding Princes before the Revolution, ever resumed the design; because it was a project, for which there could not possibly be assigned the least reason or necessity. For I defy any mortal to name one single advantage, that England could ever expect from such an Union. But, towards the end of the late King's reign, upon an apprehension of the want of issue from him, or the Princess Anne, a proposition for uniting both Kingdoms was begun, because Scotland had not settled their Crown upon the House of Hanover, but left themselves at large, in hopes to make their advantage. And it was thought highly dangerous to leave that part of the island, inhabited by a poor, fierce Northern People, at liberty to put themselves under a different King. However, the opposition to this work was so great, that it could not be overcome, until some time after her present Majesty came to the Crown, when, by the weakness or corruption of a certain Minister since dead, an Act of Parliament was obtained for the Scots, which gave them leave

to arm themselves; and so the Union became necessary, not for any actual good it could possibly do us, but to avoid a probable evil; and at the same time save an obnoxious Minister's head, who was so wife, as to take the first opportunity of procuring a general pardon by Act of Parliament, because he could not with so much decency or safety desire a particular one for himself. These facts are well enough known to the whole Kingdom. And I remember, discoursing above six years ago with the most considerable person * of the adverse party, and a great promoter of the Union, he frankly owned to me, that this necessity, brought upon us by the wrong management of the Earl of Godolphin, was the only cause of the Union.

Therefore I am ready to grant two points to the Author of the Crisis: First, that the Union became necessary, for the cause above related; because it prevented this Island from being governed by two Kings, which England would never have suffered; and it might probably have cost us a war of a year or two to reduce the Scots. Secondly, that it would be dangerous to break this Union, at least in this juncture, while there is a Pretender abroad, who might probably lay hold of such an opportunity. And this made me wonder a little at the spirit of faction last summer, amongst some People, who, having been the great promoters of the Union, and several of them the principal gainers by it, could yet proceed so far, as to propose in the House of Lords, that it should be dissolved; while at the same time those Peers, who had ever opposed it in the beginning, were then for preserving it upon the reason I have just assigned; and which the Author of the Crisis hath likewise taken notice of.

* Lord Sommers.

1713-14. character as well as of his writings, he was daily carefled by the Lord-Treafurer, as Barber the Printer was by the Lord Bolingbroke (1).

The Commons, having readily voted a Supply, proceeded on controverted elections, and coming to feveral refolutions about qualifying the Members to ferve in Parliament (2), they ordered a bill to be brought in, for fecuring the freedom of Parliaments, by limiting the number of Officers in the Houfe of Commons; which was perfected towards the end of March.

Notwithstanding all the care and induftry ufed by the Court-managers in the late elections, many professed enemies of the present Minifters were chofen. But, of thefe, none was fo obnoxious to the men in power, as Mr. Steele, who in feveral public writings had arraigned the late meafures with great boldnefs, as one, who was encouraged, and fure to be fupported, by the whole Whig party. It was therefore agreed by the Minifters (how much foever they differed in other matters) to exert their endeavours to remove him from his feat in Parliament. A petition, which was lodged againft his election, happening to be the feventeenth of that kind, and therefore not like to come on this Seffion, it was refolved to take a fhorter way, and attack him about fome of his late political writings. Mr. Hungerford, a noted Lawyer, who had been expelled the Houfe of Commons for bribery in the Reign of King William, moved, on the 11th of March, to take into confideration that part of the Queen's fpeech, which related to the fuppreffing feditious libels; and complained, in particular, of feveral fcandalous papers lately publifhed, under the name of Richard Steele, Efq;

a Member of that Houfe. He was feconded by Mr. Auditor Foley, a near relation to the Lord-Treafurer, who fuggeded, That unlefs means were found to reftrein the licentiousnefs of the prefs, and to fhelter thofe, who had the honour to be in the Adminiftration, from malicious and fcandalous libels; they, who by their abilities are beft qualified to ferve their Queen and Country, would decline public offices and employments. This was fupported by Sir William Wyndham, who added, 'That fome of Mr. Steele's writings contained infolent injurious reflections on the Queen herfelf, and were dictated by the fpirit of rebellion.' The next day, Auditor Harley (the Lord-Treafurer's brother) made a formal complaint to the Houfe againft certain paragraphs of the three printed pamphlets, which had given moft offence to the Court; THE ENGLISHMAN, of January 19; THE CRISIS; and THE LAST ENGLISHMAN, all faid to be written by Richard Steele, Efq; which pamphlets being brought up to the table, it was ordered, that Mr. Steele fhould attend in his place the next morning.

This brought a large concourfe of Members Mar. 13 and Spectators to the Houfe; and, Mr. Steele attending, feveral paragraphs, contained in the pamphlets complained of, were read: After which Mr. Foley, Mr. Harley, and fome other Members, feverely animadverted upon the rancour and feditious fpirit conspicuous in thofe writings. Mr. James Craggs, junr. ftanding up to fpeak in Mr. Steele's behalf, he was prevented by a confufed noife of feveral voices calling to order; intimating, that, according to the order of the day, Mr. Steele was to be heard himfelf in his place.

againft
Mr. Steele.

But when he tells us, The Englifhmen ought, in general, to be more particularly careful in preferving this Union, he argues like himfelf. The late Kingdom of Scotland (faith he) had as numerous a nobility as England, &c. They had indeed; and to that we owe one of the great and neceffary evils of the Union, upon the foot it now ftands. Their Nobility is indeed fo numerous, that the whole Revenues of their Country could be hardly able to maintain them according to the dignity of their titles; and, what is infinitely worfe, they are never likely to be extinct, until the laft period of all things, becaufe the greateft part of them defcend to their general. I imagine a perfon of quality, prevailed on to marry a woman much his inferior, and without a groat to her fortune, and her friends arguing fhe was as good as her husband, becaufe fhe brought him as numerous a family of relations and fervants, as fhe found in his houfe. Scotland in the taxes is obliged to contribute one penny for every forty pence laid upon England; and the representatives they fend to the Parliament are about a thirteenth. Every other Scots Peer hath all the privileges of an Englifh one, except that of fitting in Parliament; and even precedence before all of the fame title, that fhall be created for the time to come. The penfions and employments poffeffed by the natives of that Country now among us do amount to more than the whole body of their Nobility ever fpend at home; and all the money, they raife upon the public, is hardly fufficient to defray their civil and military lifts. I could point out fome with great titles, who affected to appear very vigorous for diffolving the Union, although their whole revenues before that period would have ill maintained a Welch Jynce of the Peace; and have fince gathered more money than ever any Scotsman, who had not travelled, could form an idea of.

This paffage, by reafon of the offence it might give to the Scots Peers, was, a few days after the publication of the libel, cancelled, and the reft publifhed with a new title under the protence of a fecond edition. But it was reftored by Dr. Swift, in the late edition of his political tracts.

(1) Dr. Swift, in his advertisement prefixed to this Pamphlet among his Political Tracts, fays, 'The reafon of offering fo fmall a reward was, becaufe the Queen and Miniftry had no defire to have the Author taken into cuftody.'

(2) Thefe refolutions were:

I. That, notwithstanding the oath taken by any candidate, on or after any election, his qualification may be afterwards examined into.

II. That the perfon, whose qualification is exprefly objected to, in any petition relating to his election, fhall, within fifteen days after the petition read, give, to the Clerk of the Houfe of Commons, a paper figned by himfelf, containing a rental or particular of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification: Of which any perfon concerned may have a copy.

III. That, of fuch lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereof the party hath been in poffeffion, for three years before the election, he fhall alfo infer in the fame paper, from what perfon, and by what conveyance, or act in law, he claims and derives the fame; and alfo the confideration, if any paid, and the names and places of abode of the witneffes to fuch conveyance and payment.

IV. That, if a fitting Member fhall think fit to queftion the qualification of a Petitioner, he fhall, within fifteen days after the petition read, leave notice thereof in writing with the Clerk of the Houfe of Commons; and the Petitioner fhall, in fuch cafe, within fifteen days after fuch notice, leave with the faid Clerk of the Houfe the like account in writing of his qualification, as is required from a fitting Member.

1713-14. place. Upon this Mr. Steele said, 'That, being attacked on several heads without any previous notice, he hoped the House would allow him, at least, a week's time to prepare for his defence.' Auditor Harley having excepted against so long a delay, and moved for adjourning this affair to the Monday following, Mr. Steele, to ridicule his two principal Prosecutors, Foley and Harley, who were known to be rigid Presbyterians, though they now sided with the High Church, assumed their sanctified countenance, and owned, 'in the meekness and contrition of his heart, that he was a very great sinner; and hoped, the Member, who spoke last, and who was so justly renowned for his exemplary piety and devotion, would not be accessory to the accumulating the number of his transgressions, by obliging him to break the Sabbath of the Lord, by perusing such profane writings, as might serve for his justification.' This speech, spoken in a canting tone, having put the generality of the Assembly in good humour, Mr. Steele carried his point; and the further consideration of the charge against him was deferred for a week, by which time it was expected, that Sir Richard Onslow, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Lechmere, and some other leading Members of the Whig-party, who were absent, would be come to town. This success encouraged Mr. Steele, not only to stand upon the defensive, but even to attack his Accusers. As he believed a great part of the ill will, he had brought upon himself, was owing to what he writ about Dunkirk, he thought it would make for his defence, to have what passed, relating to the collusive demolition, appear to the House before his day came on. He therefore moved, on the very Monday proposed by Mr. Harley for his trial, 'That an address be presented to the Queen, to give directions, that the several representations of her Engineers and Officers, who had the care and inspection of the demolition of Dunkirk, and all orders and instructions given thereupon, be laid before the House.' But the motion was rejected by two hundred and fourteen voices, against one hundred and nine. But the Court-party did not think fit to oppose another motion, which, with the same intent, was then made by the Lord Lumley, eldest son to the Earl of Scarborough, who being seconded by the Earl of Hertford, it was unanimously resolved, 'That an address be presented to her Majesty, that she would be pleased to order an account to be laid before the House, what steps had been made for the removing the Pretender from the Dominions of the Duke of Lorraine, pursuant to the address of both Houses of the last Parliament; and what answers had been given by the Duke of Lorraine.'

On the 18th of March, the day appointed for Mr. Steele's trial, the Court-party thought proper to clear the House of all strangers; which being done, Auditor Foley moved, that, before they proceeded any farther, Mr. Steele should declare, whether he acknowledged the writings that bore his name? Upon which Mr. Steele owned all the papers laid to his charge to be parts of his writings: That he wrote them in behalf of the House of Hanover, and owned them with the same unreservedness, with which he had abjured the Pretender. Then, a debate arising upon the method of proceeding, Mr. Foley proposed, that Mr. Steele should withdraw; but, after several speeches, it was carried, without dividing, that he should stay, in order to make his defence. Mr. Steele desired, he might be allowed to answer to what might be urged against him, paragraph by paragraph; but though he was powerfully supported by Mr. Robert Walpole, General Stanhope, the Lord Finch, eldest son to the Earl of Nottingham; and the Lord Hinchinbroke, son to the Earl of Sandwich; yet his accusers insisted, and it was carried, 'That he should proceed to make his defence generally, upon the charge given against him.' Mr. Steele proceeded accordingly, being assisted by Mr. Addison, who sat near him, to prompt him, upon occasion; and for near three hours spoke to the several heads, extracted out of the three pamphlets above mentioned (which had been given in print to all the Members) with such temper, eloquence, and unconcern, as gave entire satisfaction to all, who were not prepossessed against him.

Mr. Steele being withdrawn, most Members expected, that Mr. Foley would have summed up, and answered his defence; but he contented himself with saying, in general, 'That, without amusing the House with long speeches, it was plain that the writings, that had been complained of, were seditious and scandalous, injurious to her Majesty's Government, the Church and the Universities, and moved, that the question should be put.' This occasioned a very warm debate, which lasted till eleven at night. Mr. Robert Walpole, who spoke first in favour of Mr. Steele, made a long and elegant speech. He began with shewing, 'that this extraordinary and violent prosecution struck at the liberties of the subject in general, and of the Members of that House in particular. He then justified Mr. Steele on all the heads of the accusation raised against him; and said, he hoped the House would not sacrifice one of their Members to the resentment and rage of the Ministry, for no other crime, than his exposing their notorious mismanagements; and, like a good Patriot, warning his Countrymen against the imminent dangers, with which the Nation in general, and in particular her Majesty's sacred Person, were threatened, by the visible encouragement, that was given to the Pretender's friends. If a Papist (said Mr. Walpole) nay an Irish Papist, who for many years has been servant to the late King James, and the Pretender; one, who has borne arms against her Majesty in France and Spain; one, who is strongly suspected of having imbrued his hands in the blood of the late Duke of Medina-Celi, and Marquis of Leganez; if such a man be not only permitted to come into England, but to appear at Court, in the Presence-Chamber; if he be caressed by the Ministers; nay, I speak it with horror, if such a man be admitted to her Majesty's private audience in her closet, Will not every good subject think her Majesty's Person in danger? And is it then a crime in Mr. Steele to shew his just concern for so precious a life?'

As to that passage in Mr. Steele's Crisis, wherein he says, 'That a late treasonable book on the Succession of Hereditary Right has published the will of King Henry VIII, which seems to be intended as a pattern for the like occasion;' and a little lower, 'Let those, who act under the present settlement, and yet pretend to dispute for an absolute Hereditary Right, quiet themselves with Steele's trial in the House of Commons.

* Sir Patrick Lawless.

1713-14. with the arguments they have borrowed from Popery; Mr. Walpole said, it could not be denied, 'That the Lord-Treasurer was the patron of learned men, for whose use and improvement he had set up a fine library; and that it appeared by the book called, The Hereditary Rights of the Crown of England asserted, &c. that the Author had free access to that library, and had drawn very material passages out of some manuscripts in it. But that the Lord-Treasurer's care to supply him with materials towards that work went yet further, since his Lordship had employed a man to look among old musty papers for the Will and Testament of King Henry the Eighth, which the Author had inserted at length in the appendix to his book. That he appealed to Mr. Lowndes, a Member of the House, and Secretary to the Treasury, whether he had not paid, by the Lord-Treasurer's orders, twelve or fourteen pounds to the person, that had made that great discovery; but, that in case he should deny it, he had evidence to prove it.' Mr. Lowndes seemed not to deny the fact; and only said, that Will was not so rare a piece, since it was to be seen in a place, which he named, in Westminster-Abbey. On this occasion Mr. Walpole mentioned three points, in which he endeavoured to prove, that the peace had already been broke: The first, he said, was the demolition of Dunkirk, which ought to have been finished five months after signing the treaty; but, instead of that, the French had yet only pulled down part of the outward fortifications, without touching the foundations, which, on the one hand, rendered the English garrison useless, and exposed to any insults; and, on the other hand, would afterwards make it easy for the French to restore and rebuild those fortifications: Which was the more probable to be in their thoughts, since, instead of ruining the harbour, they were actually repairing the sluices, and working on a new canal. The second point was, the Renunciations of the Princes of the House of Bourbon, which were laid down as the foundation and basis of the peace, and as a pretence, that thereby the Crowns of France and Spain would be more divided than ever: But that, supposing (what he could not by any means grant) that those renunciations were to be depended upon, they were yet conditional, and supposed the Emperor's renunciation of the Crown of Spain: And therefore, as no care had been taken to engage his Imperial Majesty to agree to that necessary condition, so the renunciations of the Princes of the House of Bourbon became not binding and void.' The third instance, which Mr. Walpole gave of the violation of the peace, was the French King's ordinance, dated September the 18th, 1713, N. S. forbidding the Children of French Refugees, though born out of his Dominions, to come into them, without his permission, upon pain of being sent to the Gallies. This ordinance was against Natural Right and the Law of Nations, and in particular derogatory to the Rights and Liberties of the British Nation, which the Children of the Refugees, born in England, were intitled to enjoy as well as the other Natives. That he would adventure to say in their behalf, that it were to be wished, that all, who have the happiness to be born in England, were as good Englishmen as the Sons of the Refugees; and that the British Nation was the more concerned in having that ordinance repealed, in that the Refugees and their Children were the fittest to carry on a trade with France.'

Mr. Horace Walpole seconded his brother in favour of the French Refugees, 'and deplored the lamentable condition of their Ministers and the Poor amongst them, to whom the Lord-Treasurer had not paid one penny of the fifteen thousand pounds per annum, voted by Parliament, and allowed in the Civil List, towards their subsistence and relief, since he came into his office.' Adding, 'That some amongst the Refugees suffered now more in England, than they did during the persecution in France; since there were always some charitable people, who relieved them while they were in prisons and dungeons, whereas here they were left to starve.'

The Lord Finch supported, likewise, Mr. Robert Walpole, and justified Mr. Steele with relation to the tenderest part of the charge against him, his third Wish, in the close of his last Englishman: That his Electoral Highness of Hanover would be so grateful, as to signify to all the world the perfect good understanding he had with the Court of England, in as plain terms, as her Majesty was pleased to declare she had with that House on her part.' He said, 'That supposing there was in this wish some injurious insinuations, yet the same could not, without injustice, be applied to the Queen, but only to her Ministers: That no body doubted the good understanding between her Majesty and the House of Hanover; but that it was notorious, that the Ministers shewed no great regard to that illustrious House. Witnesses (to pass over other instances) the slight they put upon the Baron Bolmar's Memorial, which the Queen had perhaps never seen, had not the Dutches of Somerset shewed it her Majesty in print in the Daily Courant.' He likewise justified Mr. Steele in relation to his reflections on the Peace. We may, says he, give it all the fine epithets we please: But epithets do not change the nature of things. We may, if we please, call it here, honourable; but I am sure it is accounted scandalous in Holland, Germany, Portugal, and over all Europe, except France and Spain. We may call it advantageous; but all the trading part of the Nation find it to be otherwise. If therefore it be really advantageous, it must be so to the Ministry, that made it.' Sir William Wyndham replying, 'That the Ministry would not say, the peace was advantageous to them; the Lord Finch answered, 'Then it was plain it was advantageous to no body but our late enemies.'

The Lords Lumley and Hinchinbroke, and some other Members, spoke also in favour of Mr. Steele, and against the conduct of the Ministry. But Mr. Foley, Sir William Wyndham, the Attorney-General, and some other Courtiers, being supported by a great majority, still insisted on the question, and it was carried at last by two hundred forty-five voices against one hundred fifty-two. First, 'That a printed pamphlet, intitled, The Englishman, being the close of the paper so called, and one other Pamphlet, intitled, The Crisis, written by Richard Steele, Esq; a Member of this House, are scandalous and seditious libels, containing many expressions highly reflecting upon her Majesty, and upon the Nobility, Clergy, Gentry, and Universities of this Kingdom, maliciously insinuating, that 1713-14. the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover is in danger under her Majesty's Administration, and tending to alienate the affections of her Majesty's good subjects, and to create jealousies and divisions among them. Secondly, That Richard Steele, Esq; for his offence in writing and publishing these scandalous and seditious libels, be expelled this House.

Mr Steele expelled the House.

It is observable, that only two Scots Members spoke in this long debate, Mr Baillie, and Sir James Stuart, Judge-Advocate in North-Britain. Baillie said, 'He was little acquainted with the affairs of England, but had made it his business to know those of his own country; and, by all the observations he could make for some years past, they, who appeared the most zealous for the Pretender's interest, were the most favoured and countenanced by those in power.' This was confirmed by Sir James Stuart, who added, 'That, to his certain knowledge, three or four thousand pounds had been yearly remitted to the High-Land Clans, whose Chiefs, and the men under their command, were known to be entirely devoted to the Chevalier.' Hence it appears, this affair gave the enemies of the Ministry an occasion to take notice of several things, which, but for this prosecution, had perhaps never been mentioned in the House of Commons; and which, being spoken in the hearing of several Lords, occasioned the like reflections and stricter enquiries in the House of Peers. A few days after, the Commons adjourned till after the Easter Holidays; and in the mean time Sir James Stuart was removed from his place for what he had said.

On the 17th of March, the Lords taking into consideration the State of the Nation, the Earls of Wharton, Nottingham, and Sunderland, the Lords Couper, Hallifax, and some others, represented the danger that threatened the Protestant Succession, by reason of the Pretender's not being yet removed from Lorrain, and the ill condition the affairs of Europe were left in by the late treaties of peace, and moved, that addresses be presented to the Queen, 'First, for an account of what steps had been taken for removing the Pretender from the Dominions of the Duke of Lorrain, and what answers had been given by that Duke. Secondly, An account of the Negotiations of peace: What measures had been taken, to render the peace universal: And what obstructions her Majesty had met with. Thirdly, An account of what instances had been made for restoring to the Catalans their ancient privileges, and all letters relating thereto. Fourthly, An account of the monies granted by Parliament, since the year 1710, to carry on the war in Spain and Portugal.' These addresses were ordered to be presented to the Queen without any opposition. But, in the mean time, to give the House some amusement, the Lord-Treasurer moved for leave to bring in a bill for the further security of the Protestant Succession, by making it high-treason to bring any foreign troops into the Kingdom: Which greatly surprized many Peers. Among the rest, the Earl of Nottingham, who immediately perceived the dangerous consequence of that motion, represented, 'That such a bill might be turned against the very Guarantees of the Protestant Succession, and so weaken that happy settlement, for the security of which the bill was pretended to be designed.' The Lord

No. 76. VOL. IV.

Bolingbroke replied, 'He doubted not, but the noble Peer, who made the motion, meant only such foreign troops, as might be brought into the Kingdom by the Pretender or his Adherents.' The Lord-Treasurer having declared this to be his meaning, it was answered, 'In that case, such a bill was altogether unnecessary, since such troops were either open enemies, if Foreigners, or traitors and rebels, if Natives.' The Earl of Anglesea put an end to the debate, with saying, 'That the Lord, who made the motion, was not acquainted with the methods of proceeding in that House; for every Peer has the Privilege of bringing in what bill he thinks fit: That the Lord-Treasurer's asking leave for it, was but a compliment to the House; and therefore, when he had brought in the bill, it would be then a proper time to consider of it.' So the motion was dropped. The same day, a noble Lord reflected on the Bishop of Sarum's Preface to his Pastoral Care; but, that Prelate offering to vindicate himself, no farther notice was taken of it.

Two days after, in a farther debate on the State of the Nation, several Lords spoke again in favour of the Catalans, and insisted, 'That the House ought strictly to examine how that poor people came to be abandoned, after they had been solicited and drawn in to declare for the Emperor.' The Earl of Anglesea, seeing the Ministry thus attacked, endeavoured to ward off the blow, by saying, 'That, for his own part, he was one of the first, that appeared against the late Ministers, because he was fully convinced of their male-administration, corruption, avarice, and unbounded ambition. That he would, in like manner, be one of the first that should attack the present Ministers, if he thought them guilty of the same faults. But, as he had observed, it was merely out of spleen and envy, that some persons were for inquiring into the conduct of Patriots, who had given signal proofs of their zeal for the public good, he was of opinion, that they ought to examine into the conduct both of the late and present Ministers, that so, by comparing one with the other, they might see, which had committed less errors.' However, the Whig Lords pursued their point, and in particular took notice of the danger, both the Queen's person and the Protestant Succession were in, from the great number of outlawed Jacobites, who were permitted to come over from beyond sea; and complained of the favour shewn to the pretender's friends, in granting noli prosequi's to persons (meaning Daniel de Fox among others) who were under prosecution for writing against the Protestant Succession. They animadverted upon the debts of the Navy being much increased, though nothing had been done at sea for two or three years. The Court-party having nothing to say to these particulars, it was moved and resolved to address the Queen, that she would order the proper officers to lay before the House, 'First, An account of the debts and state of the Navy. Secondly, An account of Noli prosequi's granted since her Accession to the Throne. And, Thirdly, A list of persons outlawed, attainted, or that had borne arms in the service of her Majesty's, or the late King's enemies, who had got licences to return into Great-Britain, or other her Majesty's Dominions, since the year 1688.' After this, upon a motion for adjourning, the Whig Lords proposed to adjourn only to the Monday following.

But, the Ministry being highly concerned to put a stop to such enquiries, the Lord-Treasurer, with a shew of devotion, represented, 'That the solemnity of the festival of Easter approaching, the next week ought, according to the Primitive institution, and the constant practice of the Church of England, to be set apart for works of piety;' and therefore, moved to adjourn to the 31st of March. The Treasurer being seconded by the Lord Trevor, the Earl of Wharton said, 'God forbid he should oppose that noble Lord, who had made so pious and religious a motion; but that he appealed to that venerable Bench (pointing to the Bishops) whether humanity and charity did not require it at their hands, not to lose one moment of time, in addressing her Majesty in behalf of the distressed Catalans, who were reduced to such an extremity that the least delay in procuring them relief, might prove their ruin for ever.' Then it was resolved, without opposition, to present the address; and the Earl of Oxford's motion for adjourning to the 31st of March was carried in the affirmative. It is observable, the Commons having, the day before, made an order for clearing their House of all strangers, not excepting the Peers, it was moved in the Lords House to make the like order, without excepting the Commons: But this was opposed by the Duke of Argyle, who said, 'It was for the honour of that August Assembly to shew, that they were better bred, and had more complaisance than the Commons.'

A remarkable declaration published by the Ministry.

At this time the Ministry, in order to allay the fears, which many entertained of a design between Great-Britain and France, to bring over the Pretender; caused a remarkable declaration, made some time before by the French Ambassador at the Hague, to be published in the Post-Boy of the 18th of March, which was to this effect: 'It is not only in Holland, that false reports are spread of the King my Master's equipping a fleet, with a design to support the interests of the Chevalier de St George; but these false reports have also reached England. As it is easy to imagine for what end they have been invented, I am ordered by his Majesty, to acquaint you with the malicious design of them: They will soon vanish, being without foundation, and even the least appearance of any. It is, however, necessary, that truth should be known.'

This declaration, however, with the least discerning passed only for a political amusement: And indeed it was but a fond imagination in the British Ministers, to believe, that any verbal assurances and protestations were able to dispel the jealousies and apprehensions, occasioned by the daily removal of the firmest friends to the Protestant Succession from public employments, and advancing, in their stead, those, whom they found inclined blindly to follow the Queen's measures; which was now become the watchword, and, as it were, the standard of civil and military merit. Upon this rule, at a Cabinet-Council, it was resolved to remove the Duke of

Argyle from all his places; to order the Earl of Stair to dispose of his regiment of Scots Royal dragoons; and to turn out several other inferior Officers. Accordingly, a few days after, it was declared, that the command of the Scots troop of Life-guards, of which the Duke of Argyle was Colonel and Captain, was given to the young Earl of Dundonald, a Scots Peer (for which, however, the Queen was said to have paid the usual price of ten thousand pounds to the Duke) that the Earl of Peterborough was made Governor of the Island of Minorca, and the Earl of Orkney, Governor of Edinburgh Castle, both in the room of the Duke of Argyle; that the Earl of Portmore had bought the Earl of Stair's regiment for six thousand pounds; that Major-General Davenport was ordered to sell his post of Lieutenant of the first troop of Life-guards to Brigadier Panton; that Major-General Holmes, Major of the Cold-Stream regiment of Foot-guards, had leave to dispose of his company to Lieutenant-Colonel Gibbons, late of Colonel Kane's regiment of foot; that Lieutenant-Colonel Egerton, Brother to the Earl of Bridgewater, and Lieutenant-Colonel Sidney, Brother to the Earl of Leicester, were ordered to sell their Companies in the Foot-guards, for the sum of a thousand pounds each, to the Lieutenants-Colonels Markham and Owen; and that Lieutenant-Colonel Oughlon and Lieutenant-Colonel Paget were also ordered to dispose of their Companies. It was about the same time strongly reported, that several other Officers, who, being closeted, had demurred upon the question, that was put to them, Whether they would serve the Queen, without asking questions? Were likewise to be turned out of their posts; some of which were to be filled up by the creatures of the Lord Bolingbroke, the principal adviser and promoter of the new-modelling the army. One branch of this scheme was to break nine of the Battalions in Ireland; to lay aside seventy-two Officers, who were thought improper instruments for the designs in hand; and to raise fifteen other battalions, that should be sure to obey all commands; and one of which was said to be designed for the Lord Poor, an Irish Roman Catholic Peer, who had a long time served in France. It was also generally reported, that either the Earl of Anglesea, or Colonel Owen, who soon after went over to Dublin, carried these orders to Sir Constance Phipps. But whatever ground there was for such a report, that part of the model never took place.

The Lord Bolingbroke and his friends, who by this time had got the ascendancy over the Lord-Treasurer in the Cabinet-Council, were the more hasty in their measures, both because they began to despair of the Queen's surviving the next summer, and because they were not ignorant, that the Whigs, in concert with the Court of Hanover, took all imaginable precautions to secure the Protestant Succession. The Queen being taken ill (1), those who were most concerned in her life, pushed on their schemes, knowing how precarious

(1) Dr Shadwell, in a letter to the Duke of Shrewsbury, gives the following account of her illness:

On the 11th of March, after the Queen had sunned herself awhile at the window, she was seized with a chillness, vomiting, a pain in the leg, the pulse very disordered, and in every manner as two months before, except that the Queen did not shiver; but the cold and chillness continued twelve hours, and was then succeeded by very great heat, thirst, and all the symptoms of a high fever, which lasted till the next morning.

But though, the better to conceal the true state of her health, only Dr Arbutnot, who was devoted to their party, was for a long time admitted to see her leg ; yet those, who watched for the security of the Protestant Succession, did not want intelligence of her dangerous condition, and took all possible measures to defeat any attempt, that should be made to bring in the Pretender, at or before her death. As that case never happened, those measures are for the most part a secret ; but it may be observed, that about this time the Pretender's friends were not a little alarmed at a secret treaty, which was said to be concluded between the Elector of Brunswick and the States-General ; whereby the States, in consideration of a certain sum, engaged to furnish the Elector with a certain number of ships and land-forces (besides their engagements as Guarantees of the Succession) to support his claim to the Crown of Great-Britain. Be this as it will, certain it is, that the Court of Hanover did not rely on the fair promises, given them by the British Ministers, and which were manifestly contradicted by matters of fact. And as some of the British Ministers and Generals were, at this juncture, very intent upon new-modelling the army ; so on the other hand, the Duke of Argyle, the Generals Stanhope and Cadogan, and several other experienced Commanders, were no less active, though with more caution, in keeping steady and preparing against all events, such military men, as they knew to be well affected to the Protestant Succession. General Stanhope, in particular, had several private Conferences with the principal Officers among the French Refugees ; who being a considerable body, and all zealous for the cause, no small stress was laid on their assistance, as well as that of their Countrymen. So, if things had been brought to extremities, exclusive of the interposition of foreign forces, the well-affected to the House of Hanover would have been equal, if not superior to the Pretender's friends. This will appear more than probable, if we consider, that in either House of Parliament few were for altering the present settlement : That most of the Merchants and monied men in the City of London (which, in all Revolutions, has the greatest influence over the rest of the Kingdom) were entirely devoted to the Protestant Succession ; and it is now known, that some of the principal of them had agreed with the Generals Cadogan and Stanhope to exert their whole interest in the City, whenever any attempt should be made upon the Succession ; and that measures were early concerted by the Kit-Cat-Club, with a Major-General, who had a considerable post in the Foot-guards, to seize 1713-14. the Tower, upon the first appearance of danger, and to secure in it such persons, as were justly suspected to favour the Pretender (1). And the late Lord Onslow used to say, that himself had been sent over with an Association signed by the most eminent of the Whigs to the Duke of Marlborough, who did not think proper to give it the sanction of his name ; which was a great surprize to his old friends.

The Parliament, according to their adjournment, met on the 31st of March. The chief debates were in the House of Lords, concerning the Catalans, the Protestant Succession, removal of the Pretender out of Lorrain, and the late Treaties. The papers, which had been addressed for, being laid before the House, those relating to the Catalans were read on the 2d of April. Then the Earls of Wharton and Sunderland, the Lords Hallifax, Cowper, and others, represented, ' That, the Crown of Great-Britain having drawn in the Catalans to declare for the House of Austria, and engaged to support them, those engagements ought to have been made good.' To this the Lord Bolingbroke answered, ' That the Queen had used all her endeavours to procure to the Catalans the enjoyment of their ancient liberties and privileges ; but that, after all, the engagements she was entered into, subsisted no longer than while King Charles was in Spain ; but that Prince being advanced to the Imperial dignity, and having himself abandoned the Catalans, she could do no more than interpose her good offices in their behalf, which she had not been wanting to do.' To this it was replied, ' That God Almighty had put more effectual means into her Majesty's hands.' After some other speeches, the Lord Cowper moved for an address to the Queen, importing, ' That, her endeavours for preserving to the Catalans the full enjoyment of their ancient liberties, having proved ineffectual, their Lordships made it their humble request, that she would continue her interposition in the most pressing manner in their behalf.' None of the Peers opposed this motion ; only the Lord-Chancellor, in order to justify all that had been done by the Ministry, said, ' This address would be more grateful to her Majesty, if the word ineffectual was left out ; and if they should only thankfully acknowledge her Majesty's endeavours in favour of the Catalans,' which was agreed to. But, notwithstanding this compliment, the address being the next day presented to the Queen, she thanked, indeed, the Lords, for the satisfaction they expressed in the endeavours she had used for securing to the Catalans their just liberties ; but then she added, that, at the time she concluded her peace with Spain, she resolved to continue her interposition upon every proper occasion for obtaining those liberties, and to prevent, if possible, the misfortunes, to which that people morning. Some of her Physicians were for administering the snake root ; but Dr Shadwell opposed it, by reason of the inflammatory fever, and Erysipelas ; preferred for temperate cordial medicines, to discharge the blood ; and cupping, as well as other evacuations, to prevent too great a load of humours falling upon the leg. This he insisted on the next day, though the fever was off ; apprehending the consequence of that limb being too much loaded. And though, on Sunday the 14th, the Queen eat a chicken with very good appetite ; though all the other Physicians thought matters so well, as not to need any prescription ; yet that very good appearance did not ease Dr Shadwell of his fears, for what might happen to the leg, if the Erysipelas should turn to an imposthume : Which it did, according to his prognostic, not long after ; and proved at last the immediate cause of the Queen's death.

This answer occasioned some reflections: And indeed, it quickly appeared, that Sir James Wylhart, who, about this time, was sent with a strong Squadron of men of war, was rather instructed to assist King Philip in the reduction of Barcelona, than in relieving the distressed Catalans.

Debate on the State of the Nation.
Pr. H. L.

On April the 5th, the Lords taking into consideration the State of the Nation, several speeches were made in relation to the dangers to which all Europe in general was left exposed by the late treaties of peace, and which, in particular, threatened the Protestant Succession. To this purpose the Whig Lords mentioned the countenance and favour which were publicly shewn by those in power to the friends of the Pretender; and his continuing in Lorrain (1). The Earl of Sunderland added, 'That, notwithstanding the earnest application made last Session by both Houses to her Majesty, to use her utmost endeavours to get him removed from thence, yet he was assured by Baron Fostner, the Duke of Lorrain's Minister, some weeks before his departure, that, to his certain knowledge, no instances had yet been made to his Master for that purpose.'

The Lord Bolingbroke said, 'He wondered Baron Fostner should make such a declaration, since he himself had made those instances to the Baron in the Queen's name.' But the Lord Halifax confirmed what the Earl of Sunderland had advanced, saying, 'Baron Fostner had told him as much but four days before; so that the Lord Bolingbroke must be mistaken, at least, in point of chronology.' The Earl of Wharton having urged the dangers, which threatened the Nation, and the Protestant Succession from the male-administration of affairs, a question was proposed, 'Whether the Protestant Succession was in danger under the present Administration?' The Court Lords, who had a mind to screen the Ministry under the Queen's name, insisted, that the last words of the question should be, under her Majesty's Administration? The Whig Lords alleged, 'That the Queen ought not to be mentioned in a ques-

sion, that did not at all concern her Majesty: 1714. For, by our Constitution, the Sovereign can do no wrong; and, if any thing be done amiss, the Ministers alone are accountable for it.' But it was urged, 'That the Queen having, in her speech from the throne, taken notice of the insinuations, that the Protestant Succession was in danger under her Government; the question ought to be taken in her Majesty's expressions about the same subject.' This being agreed to, the question was warmly debated from two in the afternoon, till nine o'clock in the evening, when the Protestant Succession was voted out of danger by a majority of twelve voices only, seventy-six against sixty-four. The most remarkable circumstance of this debate was, that the Archbishop of York and the Earl of Anglesea spoke and voted with the Whig Lords, which added great strength to that side; the Archbishop drawing after him the whole Bench of Bishops, three Courtiers only excepted; and the other being followed by the Earls of Abingdon and Jersey, the Lords Ashburnham and Carteret, and some other temporal Peers, who, like the Lord Anglesea, had, upon most occasions, voted with the Court Lords; so that the victory, now gained, was owing either to the Scots Peers, or to the late Creation. And it was the general opinion, that this seeming advantage was in reality a kind of defeat. The Earl of Anglesea's speech upon this occasion was much taken notice of: He said, among other things, 'That, when he came into the House, he thought indeed the Protestant Succession to be still in danger on the part of France, whose interest it was to restore the Pretender: But that, after he had heard what so many noble Members of that August Assembly, persons of undoubted honour and probity, had alleged against the Ministers, and no answer offered to confute it, either by the Ministers themselves, or their friends, he could not but believe the Succession to be in danger under such an Administration.' He afterwards endeavoured to clear himself, as to the share he had in some late transactions: 'I own (said he) I gave my assent

(1) Some time before the Parliament met, the following letter, said to be written by the Duke of Lorrain, was handed about first in manuscript and afterwards in print:—

Madam,

'We could not be more surprized at the addresses of the British Parliament last summer, than with the late remonstrances of your Majesty's Minister at Utrecht, in relation to the removal of the Chevalier de St George from the Dominions of Lorrain. Before we would absolutely comply with the request of the most Christian King in that affair, the profound respect we have for your quiet, made us apprehensive of giving the least uneasiness to your Majesty. But when we were assured, on the contrary, that this expedient would be highly agreeable to all sides, as the only means to remove one of the chief obstacles to the general peace of Europe, so much wanted and desired: Proud of so great an honour, we could no longer refrain from opening our arms, to receive a Prince, the most accomplished, the most virtuous, and most amiable of human race, who only wants to be seen to be admired, and known to be almost adored: Whose magnanimity, in his sufferings, renders him worthy his high birth; besides his other great and commendable qualities, which confess the royal blood that flows in his veins.

We therefore hope your Majesty, and the British Nation, will not take in ill part, that we cannot comply with a demand so inconsistent with our own Honour, and the laws of Hospitality; that, after our protection once given, we should voluntarily abandon, to the rage of his enemies, an innocent, distressed Prince, who knows no crime, but being born the last heir male to that illustrious family, which, for several ages, has given so many great Monarchs to the world (amongst the rest, your Majesty) of whose heroic virtues he is a happy imitator; and whose conspicuous and great actions have reflected as much lustre, as you have received from your noble and truly royal progenitors. That God Almighty would take your Majesty into his holy protection, is the ardent wish of,

M A D A M,

Your Majesty's, &c.

This letter, though, with different views, was perfected with equal industry by both parties, and, with other concurring circumstances, greatly increased the fears and jealousies of the well-affected to the Protestant Succession.

714. sent to the cessation of arms, for which I take shame to myself, and ask God, my Country, and my Conscience pardon. But, however, this fault I did not commit, till that noble Lord (turning towards the Lord-Treasurer) had assured the Council, that the peace would be glorious and advantageous both to her Majesty and her Allies. Adding, that, as the honour of his Sovereign, and the good of his Country, were the rule of his actions, so he had no respect of persons; and if he found himself imposed upon, he durst pursue an evil Minister, from the Queen's Closet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the Scaffold. The Lord-Treasurer, against whom this was levelled, said, 'That the peace was as glorious and advantageous, as could be expected, considering the necessity of affairs, and the contradiction the Queen's Ministers had met with, both at home and abroad.' Several Lords replied, That no Ministers ever had it in their power to make so honourable and advantageous a peace, as the Queen's Ministers had: And the Duke of Argyle in particular added, 'That he had lately crossed the Kingdom of France, both in going to, and returning from Minorca. That it was indeed one of the finest Countries in the Universe, but that there were marks of a general desolation in all the places, through which he passed. That he had rid forty miles together without meeting a man fit to carry arms: That the rest of the people were in the utmost misery and want; and therefore he did not apprehend what necessity there was to conclude a peace so precipitately with a Prince, whose Dominions were so exhausted of men, money, and provisions. As to the question now under debate, he said, he firmly believed the Succession in the Electoral House of Hanover to be in danger from the present Ministers, whom he durst charge with Male-Administration, both within those walls, and without: That he knew, and offered to prove, that the Lord-Treasurer had yearly remitted four-thousand pounds to the High-land Clans of Scotland, who were known to be entirely devoted to the Pretender, in order to keep them under discipline, and ready for any attempt: That, on the other hand, the new-modelling of the army, by disbanding some regiments out of their turn, and by removing from their employments a vast number of Officers, merely upon account of their known affection to the House of Hanover, were clear indications of the designs in hand: That it was a disgrace to the Nation, to see men, who had never looked an enemy in the face, advanced to the posts of several brave Officers, who, after they had often exposed their lives for their Country, were now starving in prison for debt, for want of their pay.' The Lord-Treasurer, laying his hand upon his breast, said, 'He had, on so many occasions, given such signal proofs of his affection to the Protestant Succession, that he was sure no Member of that August Assembly did call it in question. That he owned, he had remitted, for two or three years past, three thousand eight hundred pounds to the High-land Clans; but that he hoped the House would give him an opportunity to clear his conduct as to that point. And, as for the reformed Officers, he had given orders, they should forthwith be paid.' The Lord Alburnham, who had lately been advanced to the command of a troop of Life-guards, thinking himself reflected on by some expressions, which had dropped from the Duke of Argyle, took that occasion to say, 'That the Queen had no better, nor a more loyal subject than himself; but that, at the same time, he was ready to spill every drop of his blood, and spend all his fortune, for the security of the Protestant Succession.'

Though, after some other speeches, the Protestant Succession was voted out of danger, as the Court-party desired, yet the Lord Halifax, in order to put their professions of affection to the Protestant Successor to the test, moved, about the removal of the Pretender out of Lorrain. 'That an address be presented to the Queen, that she would renew her instances for the speedy removing the Pretender out of Lorrain; and that she would, in conjunction with the States-General, enter into the Guaranty of the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover; and also with such other Princes, as she should think proper.' He was seconded by the Earl of Wharton, who moved likewise, that, in the address, 'Her Majesty might be desired to issue out a Proclamation, promising a reward to any person, who should apprehend the Pretender, dead or alive.' This motion was supported by the Duke of Bolton, who also moved, 'That the reward might be suitable to the importance of that service.' Nothing was said in opposition to these motions; but, it being late, some Members cried, Adjourn, adjourn. But, the other side calling for the question, it was unanimously resolved, that the address should be presented. Before this debate came on, the Lord Norib and Grey moved, that all the strangers, who were in the House, should withdraw; upon which the Earl of Wharton desired, that they might be permitted to stay; and he was seconded by the Duke of Argyle. But, the Lord, who made the motion, insisting upon it, all strangers were obliged to withdraw, except Baron Schultz, Envoy from Hanover, whose standing behind the Throne among the Peers Sons was connived at. It is very probable, he did not fail giving a full account of this day's transactions to his Court; and that the Earl of Anglesea was noted down in the list of the persons, whom by the act of settlement, the Protestant Successor was empowered to appoint to have a share in the Regency, in case of a demise. But it was observed, that the same evening the Earl supped with the Lord Bolingbroke, and, two days after, appeared at the Treasurer's Levee; from whence it was conjectured, they had found means to regain him by the promise of the Government of Ireland.

When the address against the Pretender was reported by the Committee appointed to draw it, the Lord Norib and Grey made a long speech, 'wherein he endeavoured to shew the barbarity of setting a reward upon any body's head; which, he said, was an encouraging of murder and assassination; and how repugnant such a practice was to Christianity, the law of Nature, and the laws of all civilized Nations.' To which purpose he quoted some passages out of Grotius, Puffendorf, and other Civilians. He represented in particular, 'how inconsistent such a proceeding was with the honour and dignity of so August an Assembly in a Nation and Government, famed for lenity and clemency;' and in conclusion said, 'No man either had more respect and affection for the illustrious House of Hanover, or would do more to serve them, than himself.'

1714. himself: But that they must excuse him, if he would not venture damnation for them.' He was supported by the Lord Trevor, who said, 'What that noble Peer had spoke, was sufficient to shew how inconsistent such a proceeding was with Christianity, and the civil law; and therefore he would confine himself to our own laws; and, if he knew or understood any thing of these, he was confident, they were no less opposite to such proceedings than the civil law. He knew, he did not speak there as a Lawyer or Judge, but as a Peer. But he was so fully satisfied of our law discountenancing all such proceedings, that, if ever any such case should come before him as a Judge, he would think himself bound in justice, honour, and conscience to condemn such an action as murder; and therefore he hoped, the supreme Court of Judicature in England, and the most august Tribunal in the Universe, would not make a precedent for encouraging assassination.' Concluding, that it was sufficient, and therefore he moved, 'First, that the reward should be for apprehending and bringing the Pretender to justice, in case he should land, or attempt to land, either in Great-Britain or Ireland. Secondly, That her Majesty issue her Royal proclamation, whenever, in her great wisdom, she should judge it necessary.' The Lords Cowper and Hallifax said, 'that such a proceeding, as repugnant as it might be to the precepts of Christianity, was yet warranted by the practice of the old Romans, of the most civilized Nations in Europe, and of our Nation. For, without recurring to remoter instances, we had the example of King James the Second, who set a price on the head of his own Nephew, the Duke of Monmouth.' But these two Lords were but weakly supported by their own party; and, the Earl of Anglesea, and Lords Ashburnham, Carteret, and Orrery, who three days before, had left the Court-party, having approved the Lord Trevor's motion, and most of the Bishops, who were against such an address, being absent from the House, these mitigations were, upon a division, carried by a majority of ten voices.

Votes against persons outlawed, Popish, and others.

The same day, upon a motion made by the Lord Hallifax, the Lords resolved to present another address to the Queen, 'That she would issue out a proclamation against all Jesuits, Popish Priests, and Bishops; as also against all such, as bore arms against the late King William and Queen Mary, or her present Majesty.' Upon this occasion, some severe reflections were made against those persons, who, being outlawed for adhering to the late King James and the Pretender, had the assurance, and were encouraged, not only to come over, but even to appear here with a public character. The Earl of Anglesea said, on this occasion, 'That, for his own part, he was against widening our domestic divisions, by keeping up odious distinctions; and therefore, if they, who were born her Majesty's subjects, and had been in arms against their Country, were sensible of their fault, and inclined to return to their bounden allegiance, they ought, in his opinion, to open the door for them to come in.' But the House had other thoughts of the matter, and the next day resolved, '1. That no person, not included in the articles of Limerick, and who had borne arms in France or Spain, should be capable of any employment civil or military. 2. That no person, who is a natural born subject of her Majesty, should be capable of sustaining the character of public Minister from any foreign Potentate.' These resolutions were made with a view to Sir Patrick Lawless, who, having been the Pretender's Envoy at the Court of Madrid, had come over with a credential letter from King Philip. But, upon the noise, which his being here made in both Houses of Parliament, he thought fit to go to Holland.

As a reflection had been made against the Treasurer, for remitting yearly about four thousand pounds to the Clans of Scotland, as if that sum were designed to keep in heart and discipline the Pretender's friends, the Lord Townshend moved for taking that affair into consideration. The Duke of Argyle represented, 'That, the Scots Highlanders being, for the most part, either rank Papists, or declared Jacobites, the giving them pensions was, in effect, keeping up, Popish Seminaries, and fomenting Rebellion.' In answer to this, the Treasurer alleged, 'That in this particular he had but followed the example of the late King William, who, after he had reduced the Highlanders, thought fit to allow yearly pensions to the heads of the Clans, in order to keep them quiet; and, if the present Ministry could be charged with any mismanagement on that article, it was only for retrenching part of that Highland money.' Nothing being alleged against this apology, the Lord North and Grey made a motion for returning the Treasurer the thanks of the House for his good services. But the Lord Bolingbroke, to put it off, said, 'He was persuaded the Treasurer was contented with the testimony of his own conscience, and desired no farther satisfaction, than to have his conduct approved by that August Assembly.' Which was accordingly done. Upon this unsuccessful attempt upon the Treasurer, the Lord North and Grey said, with an air of triumph, 'That, having, by this time, removed all fears and jealousies about Popery and the Pretender, he hoped the enemies of the Ministry would now speedily produce all the objections they had against their conduct.' And moved, that a day might be appointed for taking into consideration the State of the Nation, with regard to the treaties of Peace and Commerce. He was seconded by the Earl of Clarendon; and then the House adjourned to the 13th of April; but, the day before, the Lord Chancellor attended only by the Whig Lords, presented to the Queen their address against the Pretender (1), to which she returned the following answer:

My

(1) The address was as follows:

'We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, having a just and tender concern for your Majesty, and our Country, and being encouraged by that zeal your Majesty has so often expressed from the Throne, for the Protestant Succession in the illustrious

House of Hanover, do now presume to renew our most humble application to your Majesty, upon a subject so agreeable to you, as this which is nearest your own Royal heart; and do humbly beseech your Majesty, that, whenever your Majesty, in your great wisdom, shall judge it necessary, you will be graciously pleased to issue your Royal proclamation, promising a reward

My Lords,

The Queen's answer to the address against the Pretender.

'It would be a real strengthening to the Succession in the House of Hanover, as well as a support to my Government, that an end were put to those groundless fears and jealousies, which have been so industriously promoted.

'I do not, at this time, see any occasion for such a proclamation. Whenever I judge it to be necessary, I shall give my orders for having one issued.

'As to the other particulars of this address, I will give proper directions therein.'

Demand of King James's Queen delivered in Chancery.

This answer revived the hopes of the Pretender's friends, who, before the warm speeches against him in both Houses, were so elated and secure of protection, that, towards the end of March, an agent of King James's Queen offered to file a bill in Chancery, wherein he demanded, in her name, the sum of six-hundred fifty-thousand pounds, due to her by the Crown of England, for the dowry of fifty-thousand pounds per annum since the death of King James the Second. But, the agent having in the bill given her the title of Queen-mother, the Officer refused to file it; upon which the agent changed the title, and presented it in the name of the most illustrious Princess Maria, Relict of James the Second, King of England. Though no notice was taken of this formal demand, yet, pursuant to a private agreement made in France by the Lord Bolingbroke, about fifty-thousand pounds were remitted thither for her use.

Consultation of the Whig Lords.

The very day, the address against the Pretender was presented, an incident happened, which, as soon as known, threw the Ministers into the utmost confusion. On the 10th of April, most of the Whig Lords held a consultation at the Lord Hallifax's, to which Baron Schutz, Envoy from the Elector of Hanover, was admitted.

A writ demanded for the Duke of Cambridge.

It was resolved, pursuant either to the orders, Schutz had received from his Court, or to the discretionary power, which was lodged with some of these Lords, that the Envoy should take the first opportunity to demand a writ for the Electoral Prince to sit in the House of Peers, as Duke of Cambridge. Accordingly, on the 12th of April, Baron Schutz made a visit to the Lord Chancellor, and, among other civilities, acknowledged the affection, he had shewn, on several occasions, to the most serene Electoral House of Hanover. The Lord-Chancellor told him, he was extremely sensible of the honour he did him by his visit and compliment; and desired him to assure the Elector, of his entire devotion to his service; hoping his Electoral Highness gave no credit to the false reports, that were industriously spread abroad, in order to give him jealousies of her Majesty's Ministers.'

The Baron answered, he would not fail discharging so agreeable a commission; but he had a favour to ask of him, in the name of the Electoral Prince, that his Lordship would be pleased to make out a writ for his sitting in the House of Peers, as Duke of Cambridge. The Lord-Chancellor, surprized at this unexpected demand, told the Baron, 'It was not usual to make out writs for Peers, who were out of the Kingdom. However, he would forthwith apply to her Majesty for directions in this case.' The Baron answered, 'He did not doubt, his Lordship knew, and would perform the duty of his office. But, as to the objection of the Duke of Cambridge's being out of the Kingdom, he would assure him, his Electoral Highness had resolved to come over very speedily, and perhaps might be landed before the writ was made out.' Upon this, the Baron taking his leave, the Chancellor desired him to remember, 'He did not refuse his demand, but only thought it proper to acquaint the Queen with it, which he would do immediately.' To this the Baron said, 'He likewise desired his Lordship to remember, that he applied himself to him for the Duke of Cambridge's writ.' The Chancellor having the same evening acquainted the Queen, and her chief Masters, with these passages, a Council was immediately called; and, having sat from nine o'clock till after eleven, it was resolved, That the Lord Chancellor should make out a writ for the Duke of Cambridge. This transaction, which, the next morning, was first whispered about in the Court of Requests, cast a sudden damp on the spirits of the open and secret friends of the Pretender. It was then a question, whether Baron Schutz had made that demand by express directions from his Master, or only by the advice of some Whig Lords. But it is certain, the Queen took so ill the Baron's applying himself to the Chancellor, before he acquainted her with his orders, that she sent the Master of the Ceremonies to forbid him the Court. Two days after, a messenger was dispatched to Mr Thomas Harley, at the Court of Hanover, with instructions relating to the new scene opened by Baron Schutz; who, about a week after, thought fit to return to Hanover, having left with Resident Kreyenberg a letter to Mr Bromley, telling him, 'That, having had the misfortune to incur her Majesty's displeasure, and being thereby rendered incapable of serving his Master any longer in this Court, he thought it his duty to return home.' Kreyenberg delivered this letter to Mr Secretary Bromley, who told him, 'That either he, or any other Minister, whom the Elector of Hanover would please to send over, would be well received by her Majesty.' This affair occasioned various conjectures: And, as Schutz's declaration of the Duke of Cambridge's intention suddenly to come over alarmed the Pretender's adherents, so it raised the spirits of the well-

to any person, who shall apprehend and bring the Pretender to justice, in case he shall land, or attempt to land, either in Great-Britain, or Ireland, suitable to the importance of that service, for the safety of your Majesty's person, and the security of the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover.

We also desire leave to express our very great concern, That your Majesty's instances, for removing the Pretender out of Lorrain, have not yet had their effect; and do humbly intreat your Majesty, that you will be graciously pleased to insist upon, and renew your instances for the speedy removing the Pretender out of Lorrain; and likewise, that your Majesty will be graciously pleased, in conjunction with the States-General, to desire the Emperor to enter into the guaranty of the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, and also all such other Princes, as your Majesty shall think proper.

1714. well-affected to the House of Hanover. What was the sense of the Courtiers about the Duke of Cambridge's coming over, and the present juncture of affairs, may be gathered from some remarkable passages in a pamphlet published about this time with the title of Hannibal not at our gates; or an inquiry into the grounds of our present fears of Popery and the Pretender; of which one of the principal Writers of the Examiner was suspected to be the Author. In this pamphlet, it was, among other things, ironically insinuated, That a certain Gentleman was gone to Hanover to bamboozel. And indeed it was the general opinion that Mr Harley, who arrived at Hanover on the very day Baron Schultz demanded the writ, was sent only to amuse that Court with professions of the Treasurer's and all his friends devotion to the Electoral family; and (it is said) as a proof of that devotion, with the very original of a letter, the Queen had writ with her own hand to the Pretender. But, as the subject of Mr Harley's last Embassy is still a secret, no stress can be laid on the various conjectures, it occasioned. It may only be observed, he met with a cold reception at Hanover, and, making no long stay there, came back to London on the 25th of May. It may likewise be remarked, that, upon the first surprize of Baron Schultz demanding the writ for the Duke of Cambridge, the Lord Paget, who was named Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Hanover, he declined that employment in so critical a juncture; and the Earl of Clarendon was afterwards appointed.

Resolution for a second address about the Pre-
tender.
Pr. H. L.

The Lord Chancellor having, on the 13th of April, reported to the House of Peers the Queen's answer to the address against the Pretender, some expressions in it did not please the Whig Lords, who moved for another address to return her Majesty thanks for her answer; and containing the grounds and reasons of their former address. The Court-Lords, foreseeing that, if such an address was carried, the prevailing party might advance to more vigorous resolutions, strenuously insisted not to enter into ungrateful particulars, but to confine themselves to expressions in the Queen's answer. An order for such an address being offered, the Duke of Leeds moved, that at the close of it, where mention was made of the fears and jealousies universally spread, the words [and industriously] might be added: Which, after a debate of four hours, wherein the Bishop of Salisbury made a long speech, was carried only by the majority of two proxies, the votes in the House being equal, sixty-one on each side. This victory of the Courtiers was by their antagonists treated as little better than a defeat. And it is certain, that the Whig Lords had that day carried their point, had it not been for the accidental loss of four votes: The Duke of Rutland, being then at Newmarket with a proxy in his pocket; the Duke of Grafton, being sent for home to his Duchess then in labour with her first child; and the Earl of Gainsborough, being taken so ill that very morning, that he could not sign his proxy. It was also remarkable, that, of sixteen Bishops then in the House, two only, Rochester and Durham, voted with the Court: That the new Bishops of London and Bristol, who were thought blindly devoted to the Ministry, joined with the Whigs; as did also the Earl of Argyll; which was undoubtedly owing to Baron

Schultz's demanding a writ for the Duke of Cambridge, which visibly gave life and weight to the Whig-party. However, the resolution being laid before the Queen, she only answered, 'She thanked them for their address; and that she took very kindly the assurances they gave.'

On the 14th of April, a motion was made for taking into consideration the treaties of Peace and Commerce; and some speeches were made on both sides, after which the debate was adjourned to the 16th. That day the Whig Lords being apprehensive, that, if any debate arose about the Spanish treaty, the other party would propose an address to the Queen, approving of that treaty, which they thought absurd, they therefore agreed to say nothing against the treaty, that might draw them into a debate. The Lord North and Grey stood up first, and said, If any Lord had any objections against the Spanish treaty, he was ready to answer them; and so, in a challenging manner, went on for some time. After he had done, there was silence for a quarter of an hour; and then the Earl of Clarendon said, 'My Lords, since no objection can be raised against the Spanish treaty, we should address her Majesty to return her our most humble thanks, for having, by a safe, honourable, and advantageous peace with Spain, delivered these Nations from a long, consuming land war; and to desire her, notwithstanding any obstructions, that may be thrown in her way, to proceed to the Settlement of Europe, according to the principles laid down in her most gracious speech.' To this the Lord Cowper answered, 'My Lords, this is the most barefaced attempt, that ever was made by this or any other Ministry, to secure themselves, by endeavouring to get the sanction of this House for themselves. My Lords, I have no objections against these treaties. Are the Ministers themselves jealous, that their actions stand in need of the sanction of this House? Else why this endeavour at an address, to make their act the act of the House? The Lord, that spoke first, acting like a soldier, would, by skirmishing, have drawn on a general engagement; but the troops are too well disciplined to fall into an ambush of his laying. But I cannot remove my finger from the original of our misfortunes, the cessation of arms. We were then told, that, if a blow had been struck, it would have ruined the peace. Would to God it had ruined this peace.' To support this, the Lord Hallifax said, 'What was last mentioned, my Lords, makes me rise into the highest resentment of the vile usage given my Lord Duke of Ormond; a Lord, for whom I have the most profound respect. My Lord Ormond went over into Flanders with a true English heart, which, my Lords, is the best in the world, with a desire to do his Country all the service his great ability capacitated him to do. Therefore, it must be inconceivable, the horrible anguish it must give his noble and generous heart to receive such shocking orders, restraining the noble ardour of the soldiers, flushed with formed victories, and hopes of still greater.' The Earl of Nottingham said, 'My Lords, I never knew the like address to this ever offered at but once, in the case of the Duke of Suffolk, who, in Henry the Seventh's days, had made a treaty, for which he thought it convenient to get the sanction of this House by an address, and got seven Lords made at one time

I say no more of the man, because he came to an untimely end.* The Bishop of Salisbury likewise said, 'My Lords, I do not understand what law or reason can be given, to empower one Ally to disengage himself from his other Allies, unless in a proper manner and time he acquaints them, he has done his ultimus conatus†; and that to proceed further would be a certa perniciēs‡. That we had not come to our ultimus conatus is plain, since in the year of the cessation of arms, and the year following, wherein nothing was done, we made as great efforts as the former, when we did so many glorious things; and to proceed further, in all human probability, it would have been certa perniciēs to our then enemy the French.' The Bishop of London, who had been one of the Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, answered, 'My Lords, at the cessation of arms, our case was the very safe in point, which the Bishop of Sarum puts, for we had then come to our ultimus conatus, and, for aught we know, to proceed further would have been certa perniciēs.' The Earl of Wharton replied, 'I did design to have said a great deal to-day, but I find it anticipated by the Lords, who have spoken before me. Only I must say what I learn by sitting here, that the carrying this vote is the ultimus conatus of the Ministry; and, if they do not carry it, it will be to them certa perniciēs. Good, my Lords, gratify my curiosity, to let me see what certa perniciēs will be.' Some other Whig Lords maintained, that there was no absolute necessity of making a peace, the Nation having given almost as much money for these three years past, as during any three years of the war; and, as for the pretended advantages, gained by the treaty with Spain, it was plain they were no more than what had been stipulated before by the treaty of the year 1667. They also complained of the method, in which the Negotiation of peace had been carried on, and of our giving up the interests of the Emperor, the King of Portugal, and of the Catalans. But after a warm debate, that lasted till nine o'clock in the evening, it was resolved by a Majority of eighty-two votes against sixty-nine, to present an address, to acknowledge her Majesty's goodness to her people, in delivering them by a safe, honourable, and advantageous peace with France and Spain, from the burthen of a consuming land war, unequally carried on, and become, at last, impracticable; and to intreat her Majesty to pursue such measures, as she should judge necessary for completing the settlement of Europe on the principles laid down in her Majesty's speech. An address to that purpose was the next day agreed to, and sent down to the Commons for their concurrence.

In the mean time, to prepare the Commons Report of to give their approbation to the conduct of the Ministry, in concluding their treaties with France and Spain, several papers were laid before the House: Particularly, a report, with observations from the Commissioners of public accounts, setting forth the abuses and mismanagements in cloathing the army, in disposing the off-reckonings of regiments, and in other instances. Then, to give a view how heavy the war was become to England, and how insupportable the continuance of it would have proved, there was added, a state of the expence of the late war for twelve years, which, with the supply of 2,776,228 l. granted this Session, amounted to above sixty-eight millions and a half. But the most remarkable paper of all was an account of the state of the several treaties of peace, between the Queen and her Allies, and France and Spain, with the obstructions she had met with, in her endeavours to make the same universal and compleat; Pr. H. C. and of what was done relating to the Catalans.

This account (supposed to be drawn up by the Lord Bolingbroke, in order to remove the objections against the late treaties, particularly the giving up the interests of the King of Portugal and of the Catalans) was so varnished over with glosses and popular pretences, that many Members, who were willing to believe what was said, and had no opportunity or inclination to be better informed, were persuaded of the truth of it, and induced to side with the Ministry in all the debates about the Succession and Treaties (1).

On

(1) The substance of this account was as follows: The Author began with artfully suggesting, 'That her Majesty looked upon the peace between Spain and Portugal to be as good as concluded: That, in the mean while, her Majesty had taken the most effectual care of the Interests of the King of Portugal, having given to that Prince, on the 18th of August 1713, of her own motion, a new guaranty, whereby the Queen obliged herself to secure the restitution, even by force of arms, if that should become necessary, of any thing, which might be taken from Portugal, before the conclusion of the peace; to procure to that Crown the Colony of the Sacramento, or, in lieu thereof, such an equivalent, as the King of Portugal himself should be contented to accept: To obtain satisfaction to the Portuguese, for what they claim to be due to them on account of their Assiento, or contract with the Crown of Spain; and to set on foot, after the peace, an amicable Negotiation, for accommodating the differences, which had arisen, concerning several estates situated in Portugal, and claimed by subjects of Portugal, residing in Spain; and concerning those Spanish ships, which were, about the beginning of the war, seized by the Portuguese. That on these principles the Earl of Strafford made a solemn declaration to Numb. LXXVII. Vol. IV.

the Ministers of Spain in February last, when he exchanged with them the instruments of ratification of the treaties between her Majesty and the Catholic King. That the peace, which the Queen then ratified, did not dispense with the obligations, which she lay under to the King of Portugal, as well by her guaranty lately granted, as by her defensive Alliance made in 1703. As to the Catalans, it was alledged, 'That the landing of the Earl of Peterborough in Catalonia, and her Majesty's entering into that part of the war, were in consequence of the solicitations of the Catalans, and other Spaniards, affected to the House of Austria; and that all the engagements, which she gave to these people, went no farther than the obtaining from King Charles the Third a confirmation of their rights and privileges: And although her Majesty offered, at that time, to give a guaranty for the same, and to enter into a treaty with that people; yet it did not appear, that such a guaranty was ever given, or that such a treaty was ever made. That notwithstanding the treatment the Queen had received from the Emperor, and the just provocation she had to leave him to struggle with the consequences of his own measures; yet, at the end of the year 1713, her Majesty set a Negotiation on foot for the evacuation of Catalonia,

The Pro-

Succession noted out of danger by the Commons.
Pr. H. C.

On the 15th of April, a motion was made in a Committee of the whole House, by Sir Edward Knatchbull, and the question put, 'Whether the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover be in danger under her Majesty's Government?' Mr Secretary Bromley endeavoured to prove, it was not, by representing what the Queen had done for securing that Succession, and removing the Pretender from Lorrain. He was answered by Mr Walpole, who, with great spirit, shewed the Protestant Succession to be in danger, not from her Majesty, but from the dubious conduct of some persons in high stations; and therefore insisted, that the Queen might not be mentioned in the question. Mr Campion, having spoken in vindication of the Ministry, was answered by the Earl of Hertford. The Lord Hinchinbroke expressed likewise his fears of the Protestant Succession being in danger, from the encouragement, that was given to the Pretender's friends, and particularly, in North-Britain, which he had an opportunity to observe, when he was there with the regiment, in which he had a troop. After some other speeches, the Court-party, being apprehensive, the question would go against them, endeavoured to drop it, by moving, that Mr Freeman, Chairman of the Committee, should leave the Chair. Upon this, Sir Thomas Hanmer, the Speaker, made a memorable speech, importing, 'That he was sorry to see, that endeavours were used to wave that question, and stop their mouths; but he was of opinion, this was the proper, and perhaps the only time for Patriots to speak. That a great deal of pains were taken to screen some persons; and, in order to that, to make them overlook the dangers, that threatened the Queen, the Nation, and the Protestant Succession. That, for his own part, he had all the honour and respect imaginable for her Majesty's Ministers; but that he owed still more to his Country than to any Minister. That, in this debate, so much had been said to prove the Succession to be in danger, and so little to make out the contrary, that he could not but believe the first.' He concluded with taking notice of 'Sir Patrick Lawless being suffered to come over, and admitted to an audience of her Majesty.' This speech had a great influence on the unbiassed and unprejudiced Members; but nevertheless, after a long and warm debate, it was resolved, by a majority of two hundred and fifty six voices against two hundred and eight, 'First, That it was the opinion of this Committee, that the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover was in no danger under her Majesty's Government. Secondly, That the House be moved, for an address to return the thanks of the House to her Majesty, for the instances she had used for the removal of the Pretender from the Dominions of the Duke of Lorrain; and to beseech her to renew her instances for his speedy removal from thence.' When these resolutions were reported the next day to the House, there arose a debate, in which Mr Walpole, Mr Lechmere, and General Stanhope, made very strong speeches. Mr Walpole, among other things, applauded the public spirit, which the Speaker had shewn the Day before; but added, He despaired of seeing truth and justice

Catalonia, and the neutrality of Italy. That her Majesty's aim, by the first part of this treaty, was, to secure the return of the Emperor, and of the Imperial troops; and, since she could no longer support the Catalans by her arms, to provide for them by the Terms of peace. That her Majesty's aim, in the second part, was to leave as little room as possible for France, or Spain, to attack his Imperial Majesty, when the treaties between her Majesty and the States-General should be concluded with the most Christian King. That the Queen considered, that these Treaties, and the Barrier of the States, would secure the ten Provinces of the Netherlands from any Invasion; and, by this Convention for a Neutrality in Italy, the Emperor's territories in that Country were likewise covered; so that by the care, which her Majesty took, since he was determined to run the risk of continuing single in the war, he would lie open in no frontier but that of the Rhine, where, by the same means, he would be able considerably to increase his strength, as well with draughts out of Italy, as with the Germans, and other forces, which were to be transported from Spain. That it was no sooner than the end of January, 1712-13, that, by the good offices of her Majesty's Ministers at Utrecht, the Imperial and French Plenipotentiaries were brought to meet upon this Negotiation; and, in the mean time, her Majesty endeavoured to induce the Catholic King to facilitate this matter as much as possible, and particularly on the head of the privileges of the Catalans, in which the Ministers of France concurred with the greatest earnestness. But that it soon appeared, that his Catholic Majesty, who saw the advantage which the conduct of the Imperial Court gave him, would hardly be prevailed upon to grant any thing more than a general Act of Oblivion, and a restitution of honours and estates. That on the 14th of March, N. S. 1713, the convention for the neutrality of Italy, and the evacuation of Catalonia was executed, and the article concerning the privileges of the Catalans left undetermined; a right being reserved to her Majesty to insist, whenever the Emperor should treat of peace, that those privileges should be preferred to them; and the most Christian King declaring, that he would concur with the Queen to the same end. That, in May, 1713, the treaty of peace between her Majesty and the Catholic King was signed provisionally here, and in July definitively at Utrecht; whereby there was not only an absolute amnesty, with a full possession of all their estates and honours, but also the privileges of the Castilians granted to the Catalans; which article was, at least in this respect, considerable, that the people of Catalonia are thereby entitled to hold any employments in the West-Indies, or to trade directly thither, in as full and ample a manner, as the people of Castile, from which they were formerly as much excluded as any foreign nation whatever. That the preservation of their ancient privileges was neither granted nor directly refused by this article; so that the Queen, either when the peace should come to be treated between their Imperial and Catholic Majesties, or on another favourable occasion, which might offer itself, was at liberty to renew her application upon this head. That in the mean time it was certain, that the refusal of the people of this principality, as well as the Island of Majorca, to submit to the Catholic King, when, in pursuance of the treaty of neutrality, these Countries were evacuated by the Emperor's forces, and their obdurate resistance, since that time, must, have rendered the obtaining of their privileges still more difficult than it was. In short, that, if the ancient privileges of these people, in their full extent, were not obtained, it must be attributed to those, who rendered it impracticable to treat effectually for them, before the withdrawing of the Queen's forces out of Catalonia; and, if their condition was become since more desperate, those only were to answer for it, who had encouraged them not to submit a second time to their Prince, with the hopes of relief, which they, who gave such hopes, must have known themselves in no condition of making good.' As to the treaty with France, after a long detail of the Negotiation, upon the overtures made by that crown in April 1711, it was alledged, 'That by

1714. justice prevail, since, notwithstanding the weight of a person of his known integrity, merit, and eloquence, the majority of votes had carried it against reason and argument.³ General Stanhope endeavoured to prove the Protestant Succession to be in danger by this single but forcible induction, 'That as it was universally acknowledged, it had been the French King's intention, so it was still his interest, and he had it now, more than ever, in his power to restore the Pretender.' However, it was carried without a division, that the Protestant Succession was out of danger, and that an address of thanks should be presented to the Queen. To which address she answered, that she would renew her instances for the removal of the Pretender out of Lorrain.

The Lords having sent (as hath been said) a message to the Commons for their concurrence, in an address of thanks for the treaties of peace

the Conferences held with Monsieur Buys here, by the accounts, which came from abroad, and by the representations, which some of the Allies made to her Majesty, it appeared undeniably evident, not only that the war was become, on the present foot, absolutely impracticable, but also that no alteration could be attempted, either in the method of carrying it on, or in the views, towards which it was directed, without dissolving at once the Confederacy; and that the dispute was in fact, not whether a peace, by which Spain and the Indies would be left to Philip, should be made, but who should have the making of it? That the real annual expence of this Kingdom amounted to more than seven millions; whereas we were not in a condition effectually to raise near six millions in the course of a year; from hence it follows, that, if this proportion had been continued, about nine millions would have been the true charge of a second war, and about eleven millions that of a third. But this was the state of our affairs, whilst the House of Austria contributed nothing but one regiment to the war of Spain, little to that of Italy, had but few forces, and those entirely unactive, on the Rhine; and sent none into the Netherlands, except such, as those harassed Provinces were obliged to maintain, and were thereby rendered unable to furnish troops, or make the necessary provisions for the operations of the army; both which they might otherwise have done, and both which they did in an eminent degree, whilst they were under the Government of the present King of Spain. That the States-General bore a considerable burthen; but, as they had, from the year 1708, sent no supplies of any kind, either to Portugal, or to Catalonia, and had drawn themselves almost entirely out of the Spanish war; as they furnished, in no proportion, their quota for the sea-service; as they had reduced their joint contributions with the Queen, in all payments, to one third of the whole; and as they were very backward in answering even this share of expence; so the load of Great-Britain came, upon their account, as well as upon the Emperor's, to be vastly increased. As to the rest of the Allies, all the troops, which they furnished, were maintained by the Queen and the States, except a few, and those almost wholly employed in covering their own frontiers. That, in this situation of affairs, her Majesty declared to the Imperialists, and to the Dutch, that if they would not allow France to have given sufficient grounds for opening the Conferences; if they were desirous to carry on the war, and determined to accept of no terms of peace, inferior to those, which had been formerly demanded and refused; she was, on her part, ready to concur with them. But that, in justice to herself and to them, she thought herself bound to let them know, that she could no longer bear so disproportionate a burthen: That it was evident, that the common effort must be still greater than it was; or and commerce with France and Spain, the message was taken into consideration on the 22d of April, and a warm debate arose. The most material objections were raised by Mr Ward, an eminent Merchant, to the treaties of commerce, in which many essential points, particularly the duties on several sorts of goods and merchandize, were left loose and undetermined, and therefore liable to arbitrary explanations. Mr Auditor Foley having answered him, he was replied to by Mr Horace Walpole, who was supported by Sir Peter King. Mr Aylmer, who had, some time before, left the Court-party, and was therefore removed from his place of one of the Lords of the Admiralty, spoke, on this occasion, with great vehemence against the Ministers, for having made so precarious a peace. They were answered by Mr Campion; and the leading men among the Whigs plainly perceiving, from the noise and laughter of their Antagonists, that there would remain no prospect of arriving at the ends, which they proposed; and that for these reasons it would be incumbent upon them, if the war continued, to increase their expences, whilst the Queen reduced hers. That the Ministers of the States-General were very candid and open upon this head: Monsieur Buys asserted, that his Masters had done their utmost already; and could be obliged to no more: Many of the others had, on several occasions, declared their Country unable to support the charge they were at another summer; and the Pensionary himself, in a deputation of the States, appointed to attend the Earl of Strafford, in October 1711, declared, that it was impossible to think of continuing the war another year. That what from the Emperor, and what from the Princes of the North, we should be in the utmost danger, should we attempt to do it; and finally, that there were traitors to their Country, who were against the peace. That many instances might be produced to shew, that there was at least as little reason to expect from the House of Austria, as from the States-General, a greater effort than they had hitherto made. That the Imperial Ministers confessed, that their Master expected the Queen should furnish all the money; and that the utmost he could do, would be to send troops at her expence; in the same breath avowing the Emperor's intention to break the Negotiation of peace, and to continue the war, till Spain was conquered; the entire Monarchy whereof he expected. That upon the death of the late Emperor Joseph, in the beginning of the year 1711, the eyes, not only of the Princes of the Empire, but of all the Confederates, and of her Majesty, in the first place, were immediately fixed on his brother. And this event occasioned a great alteration in the councils of Europe, and gave a new turn to the sentiments of many Princes. That there was reason to believe, that the Ministers of Vienna themselves began to cool in the project of recovering Spain and the Indies. They seemed to intend nothing more, than to get the present Emperor into Germany, and to secure the possession of Italy to themselves. That, in Holland, a partition of the Spanish Monarchy seemed almost the general scheme; and the conduct of that Republic, as well as the confession of its Ministers, shewed, that the project of driving Philip out of Spain was looked upon there to be a pure chimera. That her Majesty had been acquainted, that some of the Princes of the Empire thought it a point, which deserved the most serious reflection, whether they should suffer the Imperial and Spanish Crowns to be united on the same head; and whether it might not be proper, in the capitulation of the Empire, to insist on the separating of them. That other Members of the grand Alliance, and those the only two, with whom her Majesty had entered into any formal engagement, for recovering the entire Spanish Monarchy, represented upon the same occasion 1714. tagonists, that they were sure of a majority, gave up the contest, and did not think fit to insist on a division, which would but expose their weakness. So it was resolved to agree with the Lords in the following address, which was presented, the 24th of April, by both Houses to the Queen :

Most gracious Sovereign,

WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to express the just sense, which we have of your Majesty's goodness to your people, in delivering them, by a safe, honourable, and advantageous peace with France and Spain, from the heavy burthen of a consuming land war, unequally carried on, and become at last impracticable. And we do most earnestly intreat your Majesty, that you will be pleased, with the same steadiness, notwithstanding all the obstructions, which have been, or may be, thrown in your way, to pursue such measures, as you shall judge necessary for completing the Settlement of Europe, on the principles, laid down by your Majesty in your most gracious speech from the Throne.

To which the Queen returned this answer :

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The State of public affairs in Europe, as well as the necessities of my own Kingdom, obliged me to enter into a Negotiation of peace ; and, notwithstanding all obstructions and difficulties, I have, by the blessing of God, brought it to a happy conclusion.

I esteem this address as the united voice of my affectionate and loyal subjects ; and I return you all the heartiest thanks, which can be occasion against placing this crown on the Emperor's head. And it was urged by one of the most considerable Princes in the Alliance, that the principle, upon which he engaged in the war, was now altered ; and that, instead of fighting to procure the Spanish Monarchy to the House of Austria, his interest, and even his safety, required, that he should fight to prevent it. That the case therefore stood thus ; The present Emperor, even after his brother's death, and his own election, would content himself with nothing less, than the whole Spanish Monarchy, and insisted, that the war should be prosecuted in this view. Of the other Allies, some looked on this prospect as chimerical, others as dangerous : From whence it follows, that to keep the grand Alliance united in this principle was impracticable ; and it must be allowed, that to have many different interests, and to have formed a system entirely new, in the midst of the war, was an experiment too hazardous to be attempted. That in this situation of affairs no time was to be lost. The Queen knew very well, that attempts to open a treaty with France separately from her were made by those, who clamoured the loudest against her measures ; and the present Emperor had thought fit, on board one of her Majesty's ships, and by her own Ministers, to send her a message of the same nature. She therefore insisted with the Imperialists, and with the Dutch, that she would be at some certainty, and that they should comply with her in the measures either of war or peace. The war being become impracticable, as was shewn before, the Author of the Account relates what obstructions there were to the carrying on a treaty of peace. That the principal, and only avowed dispute between her Majesty and the States at this time, concerned the method of carrying a Negotiation forward. That, the States pretended, that a fair opportunity would be given to the Ministers of France to divide the Confederates, if they were suffered to meet together in a general Congress, before the essential articles of peace were settled by specific preliminaries. That the use, which had been made of this method on a former occasion, to evade the concluding of any peace, when, according to the confession of the Dutch Ministers themselves, the difference, on which the Allies and France broke off, did not deserve the life of a single soldier, gave no great encouragement to pursue the same again : Besides which, as the Queen would not take upon her to settle the interests of others, neither would she suffer others to determine those of her own Kingdoms : And, if all the Confederates were to assemble, in order to adjust a preliminary treaty, the objection made by the States returned upon them. That, in December 1711, the States concurred with her Majesty in fixing the place and time of the treaty : And, if nothing had happened to revive the spirits of those, who were bent against the peace, it is highly probable, by the little time which it cost to conclude most of the treaties, after the Conferences that had been interrupted, were resumed at Utrecht, and the Allies proceeded in earnest to negotiate, that the treaties of all the Confederates with France might have been finished, before the season of opening the campaign in 1712 : But that, before Monsieur Buys returned into Holland, or the Conferences could begin, the efforts were renewed with the greatest vigour, to break off the Negotiations ; the cry against a peace, by which Spain and the Indies should be left to any branch of the House of Bourbon, became louder than ever ; and letters and memorials were not only delivered, but printed ; and appeals made against her Majesty's proceedings to all Europe, and even to her own subjects. That, on these encouragements, the good dispositions towards peace received a check ; and some of those, who had owned themselves against the prosecution of the war, to recover the whole Spanish Monarchy to the House of Austria, joined now, under this very pretence, to break the Measures of peace. That the treatment which her Majesty met with at this time, will appear in the clearest light from this circumstance : The Minister of the States General proposed to her Majesty's servants, that, considering the difficulties, which the Queen lay under, how impossible it was to recover by war, or by treaty, the Spanish Monarchy from King Philip, she should now at least apprehend it to be for her Majesty to carry on any Negotiation, by which this Monarchy should be left to Philip, he was ready (to extricate her Majesty from this dilemma, and to screen her Ministers in carrying on the work, which they had begun) in the name of his Masters, to present a memorial, by which the point of obtaining Spain and the Indies should be given up ; provided he might be assured, that the Dutch should have an equal share with her Majesty's subjects in the Assiento, which contract, he supposed, it was stipulated should be made with Great-Britain. That from the causes, and by the steps abovementioned, was the disunion among the Allies arrived to the highest pitch, at the opening of the Conferences in January 1711-12, when the strictest union amongst them was more than ever necessary, and when the whole fruit of those successes, wherewith God had blessed their cause, in the course of the war, depended on it. That they sent their several Plenipotentiaries to Utrecht ; but it was very apparent, that most of them acted on that Maxim, which one of them professed, that giving into the measures of peace was the surest way to continue the war. They flattered themselves, that the Imperial Ministers, in conjunction with those of Britain, having, two years before, baffled the designs of Holland to make peace, it would be, at least, as easy for the

1714. ' be given by a Sovereign, who desires nothing more, than to see her people safe and flourishing (1).'

Thus the Ministers obtained a Parliamentary sanction to their late measures, and by that means thought themselves secure from any future enquiries.

A letter from Lesley in favour of the Pretender. In the mean time, notwithstanding the proceedings and addresses of both Houses against the Pretender, his friends, depending on a superior power, still endeavoured to promote his interest with great industry. To this purpose, a letter written by Mr Lesley, a famous Nonjuring Clergyman, from Barleduc in Lorrain, the Pretender's Residence, to a Member of Parliament in London, was openly handed about, containing a particular account of the state of affairs, and what observations Mr Lesley had made since his coming thither (2).

The Queen writes to the Princess Sophia about the Duke of Cambridge's coming over. See Examiner, of Apr. 23. 1714. About the same time, both parties being in suspense, upon the hopes or fears of the coming over of the Duke of Cambridge, the Authors of the Examiner plainly enough discovered the perplexity some of the Ministers were in at that juncture *. On the other hand, Mr Toland published the reasons and necessity of the Duke of Cambridge's coming and residing in Great Britain; the last of which reasons was, ' That the Prince's coming over would bring to the test some great persons, who were reported to act on perfidious and dangerous principles to the Hanover family.' But neither the Queen nor her Ministers were willing to put things upon that issue; for, upon a report, that the Princess Sophia intended to desire the Queen's approbation for the Duke of Cambridge's coming into England, her Majesty, with the advice of her Cabinet-Council, wrote to that Princess the following letter:

Madam, Sister, Aunt,

' Since the right of Succession to my Kingdoms has been declared to belong to you and your Family, there have always been disaffected persons, who, by particular views of their own interest, have entered into measures to fix a Prince of your blood in my Dominions, even whilst I am yet living. I never thought, till now, that this project would have gone so far, as to have made the least impression on your mind. But, as I have lately perceived by public rumours, which are industriously spread, that your Electoral Highness is come into this sentiment, it is of importance, with respect to the Succession of your Family, that I should tell you, such a proceeding will infallibly draw along with it some consequences, that will be dangerous to that Succession itself, which is not secure any other ways, than as the Prince, who actually wears the Crown, maintains her authority and prerogative. There are here (such is our misfortune) a great many people, that are seditiously disposed. So I leave you to judge what tumults they may be able to raise, if they should have a pretext to begin a commotion. I persuade myself, therefore, you will never consent, that the least thing should be done, that may disturb the repose of me or my subjects.

Open yourself to me with the same freedom I do to you, and propose whatever you think may contribute to the security of the Succession, I will come into it with zeal, provided that it do not derogate from my dignity, which I am resolved to maintain. I am, with a great deal of affection, &c.'

St James's, May 19, 1714.

Superfcribed,

To my Sister and Aunt, Electress Dowager of Brunswick and Lunenburg.

The Queen, at the same time, wrote a letter to the Duke of Cambridge to this effect:

Cousin,

' An accident, which has happened in my Lord Paget's family, having hindered him from setting forward so soon as he thought to have done,

Ministers of the Empire, in conjunction with those of the States-General, to render fruitless, at this time, all her Majesty's endeavours to the same end. And that, after this, it would not appear surprizing, if the utmost dexterity was exerted to delay the entering on business at Utrecht, and to wait for the events of the campaign. Concluding, that, from this state of the several treaties between her Majesty, her Allies, and France and Spain, the reasonableness of all the steps her Majesty had taken, and those designs, which had been pursued at first, to wrest the Negotiation out of her hands, and since to unravel all that had been done, and to throw us into confusion, would sufficiently appear.'

This account made a great impression upon the generality of the Members; yet the weight of it will be easily taken off, by comparing it with the original papers relating to those transactions, which were afterwards inserted in the Report of the Committee of Secrecy.

(1) Though the Queen esteemed this address, as the united voice of her loyal subjects, yet the Lords in their first address to King George I. said, It is by no means to be imputed to the Nation in general: And the Commons, in less than a year afterwards, said: ' We are sensibly touched not only with the disappointment, but with the reproach brought upon the Nation by the unjustifiable conclusion of a war, which was carried on at so vast an expence, and was attended with such unparalleled successes: But, as that dishonour cannot in justice be imputed to the whole Nation, so we firmly hope, and believe, that, through your Majesty's great wisdom, and the faithful endeavours of your Commons, the reputation of these your Kingdoms will, in due time, be vindicated and restored.'

(2) This letter is dated, April 23, 1714, and begins with a description of the Pretender's person and character; his graceful mien, magnanimity of spirit, devotion free from bigotry, application to business, ready apprehension, sound judgment, and affability; so that none conversed with him, but what were charmed with his good sense and sweetness of temper. Then, coming to the main design of this letter, Mr Lesley said, That the Chevalier expressed no resentment at the cruel proceedings of the Parliament, to leave him no place to flee unto. But that other men were astonished, and said, ' For what is all this rage? What has he done? Was it a crime in him to be born? If his birth was suspicious, it was a good reason indeed to bar his accession to the Throne, but none to persecute him, or set a price on his head, as was proposed in Parliament, by a rich and powerful party, to encourage the assassination of him. He added, ' That, since so much depended on his Birth, why was it not inquired into? That the Prince of Orange promised it in his first declaration, and referred it to be examined in Parliament: But, this not having been

1714. done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with respect to the design you have of coming into my Kingdoms. As the opening of this matter ought to have been first to me; so I expected you would not have given ear to it, without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendship I have for you, and the Electoral House, to which you belong; and the true desire I have, that it may succeed to my Kingdoms: And this requires of me, that I should tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquillity of my Dominions, and the right of Succession in your line, and consequently more disagreeable to me, than such a proceeding at this juncture.

I am,

With a great deal of friendship,

Your very affectionate Cousin,

St James's, May 19, 1714.

ANNE R.

The Lord-Treasurer, who began now to be sensible of the ascendant Lord Bolingbroke had over him at Court, thought it his best way to secure a retreat behind the Protestant Succession, which the other was undermining with more precipitation than before. For, the Queen having never recovered her fit at Christmas, it was thought proper to hasten the measures that were taken to defeat the Protestant Succession. The Treasurer, who was no stranger to these proceedings though he was not concerned in them, wrote also a letter to the Elector of Brunswick:

May it please your Royal Highness,

‘ Though I expect Mr Harley every moment in return from your Court, and thereby shall have another opportunity of doing myself the honour to present your Royal Highness with my most humble duty, and the assurance of my utmost service; yet I cannot slip this occasion of the Queen’s Messenger attending your Royal Highness with her Majesty’s letter, to lay myself at your feet. I have no enemy, that knows me, who is not just enough to allow me, to be inviolably devoted to your Succession, nothing coming in competition with that, because I know I please the Queen, when I am zealous for the service of your Serene House. I hope, therefore, I shall find credit with your Royal Highness, when I humbly lay my sincere opinion before you. The Queen is most heartily for your Succession. If there be any thing, which may render it more secure, which is consistent with her Majesty’s safety, it will be accomplished. It is not the eager desires of some, nor what flows from the advice of others, whose discontents perhaps animate their zeal, can balance the security you have in the Queen’s friendship, and the dutiful affection of all her faithful subjects; for, as I am sure your Royal Highness’s great wisdom would not chuse to rule by a party, so you will not let their narrow measures be the standard of your Government. I doubt not, but the accident, that happened about the writ, may be improved, to increase the most perfect friendship between the Queen and your most Serene Family. I will study to do every thing to demonstrate the profound veneration and respect, wherewith I am, &c.

OXFORD.

There was another letter from the Queen to the Elector of Brunswick, but written in a style so unbecoming the one and the other, that the persons, to whom these letters were transmitted, did not think fit to give copies of it; but, upon a report industriously spread by the Pretender’s agents, that the Duke of Cambridge might have come over, if the Elector his father would have let him, but, that the Elector did not think the Crown of Great-Britain worth accepting, the copies of the other three letters were dispersed in print. This gave so great offence to the Ministers, that the publisher and the person who sent him the letters were seized by Lord Bolingbroke’s warrant, and bound over to appear at the Queen’s-Bench.

The Princess Sophia, now in the 84th year of Death of the Princess Sophia, was much affected by these letters, and on the 28th of May, the day after the receipt, being seized as she was walking in the gardens May 28; at done either by Parliament, Court of Judicature, or any other authority whatever, it afforded an infallible demonstration of the truth of his Birth; since, by the laws of God and Man, every child, that is owned by both parents, is to be received as such, unless evident proof be made to the contrary. That it was very obvious, why former Parliaments, and in a former reign, would not enter into the examination of his Birth, because they knew the truth of it, and that no proof could be made against it. But the false rumours and suppositions, which were industriously spread abroad concerning it, to make way for the Prince of Orange more easily to ascend the Throne (having served their turn) were laid aside, like scaffolding, when a House is built. That he hoped it was reserved for this Parliament, to make a full examination, and to set the Nation at rest upon this material point; if not, the Birth of this Prince was infallibly confirmed. That there was no danger herein to his Sister, who now reigned; for none could doubt but he would be very well pleased to make such a compromise with her, that she might hold the Crown during her life, provided his Succession after her were settled; and give all the security for this, that could be desired, even to put his person into her hands, if she thought fit. And that would unite both their interests, and render her reign more secure and comfortable to her, than it was or could otherwise be. That, if we were afraid of a Popish Successor, why did we make the next Successor a Papist? For it was they did it, who banished him, when an infant, into a Popish Country, and passed an act of attainder against him, if he should return to be instructed in our religion; and had sent to all the Protestant Courts in Europe not to admit him, or to drive him thence, if he should come, and had excluded him from the Crown without any reserve for him, though he should become a Protestant; and at the same time declared openly, they would not believe him, if he should profess it: Which things were so irrational, that they had no tolerable foundation to stand upon. That the British Nation had no reason to be afraid of the Chevalier’s introducing Popery and Slavery, since he had neither foreign Force nor Alliances; and, if he were upon the Throne, he must be perfectly in the hands of his people. That, as to religion, he had promised to hear, in due time and place, what could be said on that subject; which was all that could be expected. But that, whatever should be the issue of his hearing, as

at Herenbausen with a fit of the apoplexy, died in the arms of the Electoral Princefs (the late Queen Caroline) and the Countefs of Pickenburg, who were talking with her, before any other perfon could come to her affiftance. This Princefs was fourth and youngft daughter of Frederick, King of Bohemia, and Elizabeth of England, only daughter of King James the Firft; and was born at the Hague, the 3d of October, 1630: So ſhe was eighty-three years, eight months, and five days old at her death. In the year 1658, ſhe was married to Erneſt Auguſtus, Duke of Brunſwick and Lunenburg, (fourth and youngft ſon to George Duke of Lunenbourg-Zell) who, in 1662, ſucceeded Count Francis of Wirtemberg, in the Biſhopric of Osnabrug: In 1680, on the death of his eldeſt brother, John Frederic Duke of Hanover, Erneſt Auguſtus ſucceeded him alſo in that dignity; and, in the year 1692, he received the inveſtiture of the Electoral dignity of Brunſwick Lunenburg. This Prince died on the 23d of January 1698, having had, by the Princefs Sophia, fix ſons, George Lewis, Frederic Auguſtus, Maximilian William, Charles Philip, Chriſtian, and Erneſt Auguſtus, and one daughter, Sophia Dorothy, who, in the year 1684, became the ſecond wife of Frederic the Third, King of Pruffia. The Princefs Sophia had a very strong healthy conſtitution, and was endowed with great abilities natural and acquired. She was perfect miſtreſs of the Low-Dutch, German, Engliſh, French, and Italian languages, and had a genius equally turned for converſation or buſineſs, which rendered her not only the ornament and delight of her Court, but qualified her to manage and ſupport the higheſt intereſts. The greatneſs of her Soul bore proportion to her birth, and the ſtation, which ſhe filled; but with all was tempered with ſo much ſweetneſs and affability, that the duty of thoſe below her became their pleaſure. No one ever gave liberties with a better choice, or could act without reſerve to greater advantage. She behaved in both parts to admiration, as a daughter of England, and as a mother of Germany. Her wit was ſprightly, curious, and ſurprizing; her judgment ſolid and penetrating, founded upon the nobleſt maxims from reading and ſtudy, explained by obſervation and experience. Nothing could exceed the beauties and advantages of her converſation, but her letters; both were eaſy, entertaining, and uſeful. She had a fund of happineſs within herſelf, which gave a reliſh to her retirements: But her care in Government and æconomy ſhewed the juſt ſenſe ſhe had of being born for the good of others. Her piety was exemplary without affectation; her ſentiments of religion juſt and noble, neither perplexed with doubts, nor enſlaved by ſuperſtition. The neighbourhood of the Jefuits ſerved only to confirm her in the opinion ſhe had of the impoſtures and corruptions of their Church and Order. But, though bred up in the Reformed Religion, according to the Calvinian diſcipline, yet ſhe ever had a great eſteem for the Liturgy and Conſtitution of the Church of England. She hated every thing, that was ſour, malicious, or ill-natured to ſuch a degree, that none could be more ſedulous to oppoſe, or more active to ſuppreſs, every little quarrel and party, that grew up, where ſhe had any influence.

Baron Batmar arrived at London on the 25th of June, with the character of Envoy Extraordinary from the Eleſtor of Hanover, and, in a private audience of the Queen, notified the death of the Princefs Sophia; upon which an order was made in Council for mourning, and for praying for the Eleſtor of Brunſwick, in the Liturgy of the Church of England.

In the conſultation held by the Miniſtry, after the demand of the Duke of Cambridge's writ, wherein it was debated, Whether the Queen ſhould invite over that Duke? The Lord-Treaſurer, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Privy-Seal, and another Privy-Counſellor, were for it; but the Lord Bolingbroke having oppoſed it, and carried the negative, reſolved to puſh his point, and to uſe all poſſible means to defeat the Proteſtant Succeſſion. With that view he is ſaid to have broke all meaſures with the Treafurer, and united himſelf more cloſely with the High-Church party. As the farther diſcouragement and even ruin of the Diſſenters was thought neceſſary for accompliſhing this ſcheme, it was begun with the famous Schiſm-bill. A motion for it, on the 12th of May, by Sir William Wyndham, was introduced, by reading the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th ſections of the act of Uniformity, to his own private judgment, the Church of England might be no leſs ſecure; for it was always his fixed perſuaſion, that the ſecurity of the Crown and Church of England was, next under God, in their mutual ſupport of each other. And becauſe the greateſt hurt any King of England can do to the Church of England is putting bad Biſhops upon her; this being a corrupting the fountain; therefore, to avoid all jealousies, he was willing, during his reign, ſo far to wave his prerogative in the nomination of Biſhops, Deans, and other Eccleſiaſtical preferments in the gift of the Crown, that five Biſhops ſhould be appointed, of which the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for the time being, always to be one; who, upon any vacancy, might name three perſons to him, of whom he would chooſe one. And the Church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, ſhould be ſecured in the ſole poſſeſſion, not only of all the Churches, but of the Universities, and even Schools. And, as a further mark of his favour, he remitted, during his time, the tenths and firſt-fruits payable by the Biſhops and Clergy to the Crown. That he had informed himſelf of paſt miſcarriages, and knew well the difference between the office of a King and a Miſſionary. That therefore he would concern himſelf with no man's religion, but was reſolved to defend that, which was legally eſtabliſhed, and whoſe principles are true to Monarchy, and ſafe for Government. That, for the ſatisfaction of the Church of England, and his own Reſtoration, he thought himſelf obliged to do every thing, that was conſiſtent with confidence and honour. That, as an inſtance of his good intentions, he had ſent for Mr Leſley to officiate to the Proteſtants in his family; had cauſed a room to be fitted up in his own houſe for a Chapel for them; and had taken out of their congregation his preſent Secretary of State and chief Miniſter. And, in order to prejudice the people againſt the Proteſtant Succeſſion, Mr Leſley ſubjoined, 'That the avowed doctrine of the illuſtrious Houſe of Hanover was Conſubſtantiation; which was as erroneous, and as contrary to the doctrine of the Church of England, as Tranſubſtantiation; and yet no provision has been made, that, when they ſhould come into Great-Britain, they ſhould be of the Communion of the Church of England.'

(1) Sir

1714. mity, passed after the Restoration, by which, above two thousand Ministers were turned out of their Livings. The motion being approved, a bill was made to be brought in, to prevent the growth of Schism, and for the further security of the Church of England as by law established (1). On the other hand, in order to strengthen the Jacobite party in Scotland, a motion was made for a bill, to invest the Scots Bishops revenues and rents in the Queen, to be applied to the support of the Episcopal Clergy. To render this bill ineffectual, it was proposed by the Whigs, that these revenues should be applied to such only of the Episcopal Clergy, as should pray for the Queen and the Princess Sophia in express words. As the Court-party could not well oppose this addition, and as the refusing of the Episcopal revenues (which had been forfeited at the Revolution, and given to the Ministers of the Kirk of Scotland) would have been attended with great difficulties, the bill was suffered to drop. It was, however, resolved to finish the Schism-bill. When this bill was introduced and read the third time in order to be passed, there arose a long and warm debate. Mr Hampden, Mr Robert Walpole, General Stanhope, Mr Lechmere, Sir Joseph Jekyll, and Sir Peter King, exerted their eloquence in opposing it, representing in general, 'That it looked more like a decree of Julian the Apostate, than a law enacted by a Protestant Parliament, since it tended to raise as great a persecution against our Protestant brethren, as either the primitive Christians ever suffered from the Heathen Emperors, or the Protestants from Popery and the Inquisition.' Mr Stanhope shewed, in particular, the ill consequences of this law, as it would of course occasion foreign education; which, on the one hand, would drain the Kingdom of great sums of money; and, which was still worse, fills the tender minds of young men with prejudices against their own Country. He illustrated and strengthened his argument by the example of the English Popish Seminaries abroad, which, he said, were so pernicious to Great-Britain, that, instead of making new laws to encourage foreign education, he could wish those already in force against Papists were mitigated; and that they should be allowed a certain number of schools. The chief advocates for the bill were Mr Secretary Bromley, Sir William Wyndham, Mr Hungerford, and Mr Collier. Mr Bromley maintained, 'The Dissenters were equally dangerous both to Church and State. However, if the Members, who spoke in their behalf, would have this bill drop, he would readily consent to it, provided another bill were brought in, to incapacitate them either to sit in that House, or to vote in elections of members of Parliament.' Mr Walpole answered this speech with great force; after which Mr Hungerford recapitulated, and, in his usual ludicrous way, faintly laboured to confute what had been offered by the Whig Members.

Mr Collier, who brought up the rear, did still worse. This man, formerly an Attorney, had, by a wife, got the Directorship of the Play-house in Drury-Lane; and afterwards, by his intruding assurance, the acquaintance and intimacy of the Lord Bolingbroke. At whole earnest request, Mr Collier, though scarce worth thirty pounds a year, was, by the Duke of Beaufort's interest, brought into the House of Commons, where he took this solemn occasion to signalize his zeal for the cause he was to serve. With this intention he seconded Mr Hungerford, and, in order to expose the Dissenters, he desired leave to read to the House a collection of absurdities and impious expressions, which he pretended to have taken from their Writings. After reading part of this impertinent legend, he fell on a passage extracted from the non-sensical rhapsodies of the late Mr Hickeringill, Minister at Colchester, wherein Mr Collier said, he averred, That our blessed Saviour was a Son of a W —. At these shocking expressions, Mr Bromley interrupted him, saying, Such impious words ought not to be repeated in that Assembly. On the other hand, some other Members observed, That Mr Hickeringill was not a Dissenting Teacher, but a Minister of the Church of England: And that he was known to be crack-brain'd; and therefore his extravagancies and blasphemies proved nothing against any set of men, much less against the Dissenters. Mr Lechmere spoke against the bill with great vehemence; and, among other things, took notice, 'That the indulgence granted to Protestant Dissenters, since the Revolution, had been so far from hurting the Church, that it had rather enlarged it's pale; and it was notorious, that some persons [meaning the Treasurer, the Chancellor, and the Lord Bolingbroke] who had been bred among Schismatics, were, or, at least, pretended to be the strongest supports of the Established Church.' Several other speeches were made for and against the bill; which was carried by a majority of two hundred and thirty-seven voices against one hundred and twenty-six; and Sir William Wyndham, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who brought it into the House, and promoted it with all his power, was ordered to carry it to the Lords.

The public were divided in their opinions whether the Lord-Treasurer was for or against this bill. It is said * that the Schism-bill was castrated by him, and that he took out the most malicious and persecuting part, which had been formed by Aterbury, Bolingbroke, and Wyndham. However this be, the Lord Harley, his son, Mr Thomas Harley his cousin (lately returned from Hanover) and all his friends, except his brother the Auditor, voted for the bill.

Debate about the Schism-bill, which passed.
Pr. H. C.

(1) Sir William Wyndham, Mr Cholmondeley, Sir John Stanhouse, Sir Arthur Kay, Mr Campion, Mr Gore, Mr Aldworth, Mr Secretary Bromley, Lord Downe, Mr Finch, Mr Windsor, Sir William Whitlocke, and Dr Paise were ordered to prepare and bring in the bill. Whilst this was doing, it was resolved to address the Queen for a copy of the instructions given to the Earl of Strafford, with relation to the declarations made by him on the part of her Majesty, to the Ministers of the several Allies who had any troops in her Majesty's pay before the cessation of arms. This address was voted with intention to prepare the way for refusing to pay the arrears of 65,022 l. 8 s. 8 d. due to the Elector of Hanover's troops, which had been lately demanded by the Electoral Highness's Minister.

* Hist. of the White Staff.

1714. When the bill was read the first time in the House of Peers, the Lord Bolingbroke said, 'It was a bill of the last importance, since it concerned the security of the Church of England, the best and firmest support of the Monarchy; both which all good men, and, in particular, that August Assembly, who derive their lustre from, and are nearest the Throne, ought to have most at heart: And therefore he moved, that it should be read a second time.' The Lord Cowper said, 'No man was more ready than himself to do every thing, that should appear necessary to attain the seeming intention of this bill, the preventing the growth of Schism, and the further securing the Church of England. But the enacting part would be so far from answering the title of it, that, in his opinion, it would have a quite contrary effect, and prove equally pernicious to Church and State.' He spoke on these two heads near half an hour, and, among other things, represented, 'That instead of preventing Schism, and enlarging the pale of the Church, this bill tended to introduce ignorance, and its inseparable attendants, superstition and irreligion.' To this purpose, he took notice, 'That, in many country-towns, readings, writing, and grammar-schools were chiefly supported by the Dissenters; not only for the instruction and benefit of their own children, but likewise of those of poor Churchmen; so that the suppressing of those schools would, in some places, suppress the reading the Holy Scriptures.' On the other hand, he observed, 'That this bill struck at the ancient rights and prerogative of the House of Peers; which, by the constitution, is the supreme Court of Judicature, and the Dernier resort in all Causes; whereas, by this bill, the Justices of the Peace were empowered finally to hear and determine the offences against the same. My Lords, added he, I would rather enlarge, than abridge the power of Justices of the Peace, were it but to encourage Gentlemen to take upon them an office so troublesome, and at the same time so unprofitable, unless it be perhaps in the County of Middlesex. But, my Lords, I shall never consent to give up the birth-right and ancient privileges of this August Assembly, of which I have the honour to be a Member.'

The Earl of Wharton, in his ironical way, said, 'He was agreeably surprized to see, that some men of pleasure were, on a sudden, become so religious, as to set up for patrons of the Church. But he could not but wonder, that persons, who had been educated in Dissenting Academies, whom he could point at, and whose Tutors he could name, should appear the most forward in suppressing them. That this was but an indifferent return for the benefit the public had received from those schools, which had bred those great men, who had made so glorious a peace, and treaties, that executed themselves; who had obtained so great advantages for our commerce, and who had paid the public debts, without any further charge to the Nation. So that he could see no reason there was to suppress those Academies, unless it were an apprehension, that they might still produce greater genius's, that should drown the merits and abilities of those great men. My Lords, continued he, to be serious, it is no less melancholy than surprizing, that, at a time, when the Court of France prosecutes the design they have long since laid to extirpate our Holy Religion; when, not only secret practices are used to impose a Popish Pretender on these Realms, but men publicly insisted for his service; it is melancholy and surprizing, I say, that, at this very time, a bill should be brought in, which cannot but tend to divide Protestants; and consequently to weaken their interest, and hasten their ruin. But then the wonder will cease, if we consider what madmen were the contrivers and promoters of this bill.' He excepted, in particular, against the word Schism, with which the frontispiece of the bill was set off, and said, 'It was somewhat strange, they should call Schism in England what is the Established Religion in Scotland; and therefore, if the Lords, who represented the Nobility of that part of Great-Britain, were for this bill, he hoped, that, in order to be even with us, and consistent with themselves, they would move for the bringing in another bill, to prevent the growth of Schism in their own Country.' He said also, on another occasion (for he spoke more than once) 'That both in this bill, and in the speeches of those, who declared for it, several laws were recited and alledged; but that there was a law, that had not yet been mentioned. I expected, added he, that venerable bench [turning to the Bishops] would have put us in mind of it; but, since they are pleased to be silent in this debate, I will myself tell them, that it is the law of the gospel, To do unto others as we would be done unto'.

The Earls of Abingdon and Anglesea spoke afterwards for the bill; and Anglesea said, among other things, 'That the Dissenters were equally dangerous both to Church and State: That they were irreconcilable enemies to the Established Church, which they had sufficiently manifested in the late King James the Second's Reign, when, in order to obtain a Toleration, they joined themselves with the Papists; and that they had rendered themselves unworthy of the indulgence the Church of England granted them at the Revolution, by endeavouring to engross the education of youth; for which purpose they had set up Schools and Academies in most cities and towns in the Kingdom, to the great detriment of the Universities, and danger of the Established Church.'

The Lord Hallifax spoke on the other side, and urged, 'That the very bringing in of this bill was injurious to the Queen; and he could not believe, her Majesty would ever give her Royal assent to such a law, after the solemn declaration she had made from the Throne, that she would inviolably maintain the Toleration, which this bill visibly struck at. That her Majesty made it the glory of her Reign to follow the steps of Queen Elizabeth, who had not only entertained and protected the Reformed Walloons, who took sanctuary in her Dominions from the Spanish Inquisition, but had likewise allowed them the public exercise of their Religion, and caused a clause in their favour to be inserted in the act of Uniformity. That, by that means, that wise and glorious Queen had vastly increased the wealth of the Realm, the Walloons having settled here the woollen manufactures, which are the best branch of the National trade. That the protection and encouragement the late King William and Queen Mary, and her present Majesty, had given to the French Refugees, had proved no less advantageous to Great-Britain:

And therefore it would be a piece of barbarity to make an act, which should debar many French Protestants of means of subsisting, either by keeping public Schools, or teaching in private Families; especially considering their late hard usage, the Government not having, for above three years past, paid them any part of the fifteen thousand pounds per ann. allowed by Parliament in the Civil List, towards the maintenance of their Ministers and Poor.* He concluded with taking notice of the fatal consequences of persecuting the Dissenters in King Charles the First's Reign, which kindled a furious and unnatural civil war, and ended in the total overthrow of Church and State, and in the King's Parricide.*

The Lord Townshend spoke on the same side, and, among other arguments, represented the ill effects of persecution in general. He said, 'He had lived a long time in Holland, and had observed, that the wealth and strength of that great and powerful Commonwealth lay in the number of its inhabitants: And at the same time he was persuaded, that, if the States should cause the schools of any one sect, tolerated in the United Provinces, to be shut up, they would soon be as thin of people as Sweden or Spain, whereas they now swarm with inhabitants.'

The Lord North and Grey, who spoke for the bill, maintained the general assertion of his party, That the Church was in danger from the growth of Schismatics. The Earl of Nottingham said, 'He owned he had formerly been of opinion, that the occasional conformity of Dissenters was dangerous to the Established Church; and therefore he ever promoted the bill to prevent it. But that, the Church having now that security, he believed her safe and out of danger; and therefore he thought himself in conscience obliged to oppose so barbarous a law as this, which tended to deprive parents of their natural right of educating their own children. He added, He had observed both from history and his own experience, that all the Persecutions, that had been raised in England against Schismatics, originally proceeded from, and tended to favouring Popery.* He particularly excepted against that part of the bill, which enacts, That any person, who should keep any public or private school, or instruct any youth as Tutor, should have a licence of the respective Archbishop or Bishop of the place, &c. 'My Lords, said he, I have many children; and I know not whether God Almighty will vouchsafe to let me live, to give them the education I could wish they had. Therefore, my Lords, I own, I tremble, when I think, that a certain Divine, who is hardly suspected of being a Christian [meaning Dr Swift] is in a fair way of being a Bishop; and may one day give licences to those, who shall be intrusted with the instruction of youth.* Some other Lords made speeches for and against the bill. But the Lord-Treasurer contented himself with saying, 'That he had not yet considered of it; but, when he had, he would vote according as it should appear to him, to be either for the good or detriment of his Country. And therefore he was for reading the bill a second time;' which was agreed to without dividing, and put off to the 7th of June.

After this, the Presbyterians petitioned that they might be heard by their Counsel against the bill; but their petition was rejected by a majority of seventy-two voices against sixty-six. It was observed, on this occasion, Earl Powlet, the Lord Foley, the Lord Mansel, and some other friends of the Lord-Treasurer, voted with the Whig Lords, for allowing the petition; and the Lord-Treasurer himself was out of the House, that he might not be obliged to declare on either side; which strengthened their opinion, who thought the bill levelled against him, with a view, that, if he voted for it, he would lose the Dissenters and the Whigs entirely; if he voted against it, he would lose the Queen.

On the day appointed, the Lords read the Schism-bill a second time, and after a short debate agreed, that a clause should be inserted in the bill in favour of the French Protestant Churches. Two days after, in a Committee of the whole House, of which the Archbishop of York was Chairman, the bill was examined paragraph by paragraph, from one in the afternoon till eight in the evening. The Bishop of London having suggested, 'That the Dissenters had made this bill necessary, by their endeavours to propagate their Schism, and to draw the children of Churchmen to their Schools and Academies;' the Lord Halifax answered, 'That what they did was with the knowledge and consent of the parents, who, in many places, had not sufficient means to educate their own children.* For which reason he moved, 'That, since this bill was occasioned, as was suggested, by the Dissenters endeavouring to engross the education of the youth of both persuasions, they might be allowed schools to instruct their own children.* This motion, being formed into a question, was debated for near three hours. The Lords Cowper and Halifax, the Earl of Sunderland, and some other Peers, made several speeches for the affirmative. But the Lord Bolingbroke, the Earl of Abingdon, and the Lord Chancellor, insisted on the negative, which was at last carried by sixty-two votes against forty-eight. After this it was moved, that Dissenters might, at least, be suffered to have School-mistresses to teach their children to read, which, after a debate of about half an hour, was carried without dividing; as was also a clause, 'That this act should not extend to any person, who should instruct youth in reading, writing, arithmetic, or any part of mathematical learning, that relates to navigation, or any mechanical art only.* Then was examined that part of the bill, whereby the conviction of offenders against this act was left to the Justices of the peace; and, after a warm debate, it was carried by a majority of fifty-nine votes against fifty-four, that the conviction should be in the ordinary course of Justice, upon an information, presentment, or indictment, in any of her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster, or at the Assizes, or before Justices of Oyer and Terminer. The Court-party finding, by this last division, that they lost considerable ground, and fearing, other amendments would be made, which would render the bill altogether useless, moved, that the Chairman leave the Chair, in order to adjourn. But though the contrary party at first opposed it, yet, after some debate, upon the penalties to be inflicted on the offenders, both parties being equally tired, the House adjourned to the next day.

Accordingly,

1714. Accordingly, on the 10th of June, the Lords resumed the debate about the penalties, and fixed the same to three months imprisonment; after which it was moved and agreed, That persons aggrieved might appeal from Ecclesiastical censures, as in cases of ordinary jurisdiction. A clause was afterwards proposed and carried to exempt from the penalties of this act any Tutor, who shall be employed by any Nobleman or Noblewoman, to teach in their families, provided such Tutor do, in every respect, qualify himself according to this act, except only in that of taking a licence from the Bishop. The Earl of Anglesea moved, that a clause might be inserted, to extend this act to Ireland: Which after some debate, was carried in the affirmative by the majority of one voice only. When the bill with these amendments was reported to the House by the Archbishop of York, severe speeches were made against the clause to extend this bill to Ireland; particularly by the Duke of Shrewsbury, Lord-Lieutenant of that Kingdom, who was just returned from thence. But, the question being put, it was carried by fifty-seven voices against fifty-one, that the clause should stand. The next day, the bill was read the third time; and, after a small debate, it was carried by seventy-seven votes against seventy-two, that it should pass (1).

When the bill thus amended was sent to the Commons, a short debate arose. Mr Lechmere and Mr Walpole represented, 'That, since the Protestant Dissenters of Ireland were made liable to the penalties of this bill, it were but just either to insert a clause in it, or to bring in another bill, to make them enjoy the benefit of the Toleration act, passed in England in the last Reign.' But Sir William Wyndham and Mr Campion said, 'If leave were given to bring in such a bill, they hoped they should have leave also to bring in another, to incapacitate Dissenters from voting in elections for Parliament-men.' Upon which that matter dropped. On the other hand, General Stanhope proposed, 'That the Tutors in the families of Members of the House of Commons might be put on the same foot with those, who taught in the families of a Nobleman or Noblewoman; it being reasonable to suppose, that the Members of that House, many of whom were of noble extraction, had as great a concern as the Lords for the education of their children, and an equal right to take care of their instruction.' Several Members of both parties were of Mr Stanhope's opinion. But Mr Hungerford representing, 'That the least amendment now made in the House might occasion the loss of the bill;' the promoters of it caused the question to be put, and it was carried by a majority of one hundred and sixty-eight votes against ninety-eight, that the Commons agreed to the Lords amendments. On the 25th of June, the Schism-bill, with several others, received the Royal assent by commission. But it is observable, the very day it was to take place*, the

Queen

(1) The following Peers entered a protest against it, the Dukes of Somerset, Bolton, Grafton, Devonshire, Schomberg, and Angles; the Marquis of Dorchester; the Earls of Wharton, Sunderland, Dorset, Carlisle, Orford, Derby, Lincoln, Nottingham, Radnor, and Torrington; the Lords Viscounts Townshend and Longueville; the Lords Sommers, Halifax, Cowper, Rockingham, Haverham, Cornwallis, and Foley; and the Bishops of Ely, Bangor, St Asaph, Landaff, and Lincoln.

The protest was in these terms:

I. We cannot apprehend (as the bill recites) that great danger may ensue from the Dissenters to the Church and State:

Because, 1. By law no Dissenter is capable of any station, which can be supposed to render him dangerous.

2. And, since the several sects of Dissenters differ from each other as much as they do from the Established Church, they can never form of themselves a National Church; nor have they any temptation to set up any one sect among them; for in that case, all, that the other sects can expect, is only a Toleration, which they already enjoy by the indulgence of the State; and therefore it is their interest to support the Established Church against any other sect, that would attempt to destroy it.

II. If, nevertheless, the Dissenters were dangerous, severity is not so proper and effectual a method to reduce them to the Church, as a charitable indulgence, as is manifest by experience, there having been more Dissenters reconciled to the Church since the Act of Toleration, than in all the time since the Act of Uniformity, to the time of the said Act of Toleration; and there is scarce one considerable family in England in communion with the Dissenters. Severity may make them hypocrites, but not converts.

III. If severity could be supposed ever to be of use, yet this is not a proper time for it, while we are threatened with much greater dangers to our Church and Nation, against which the Protestant Dissenters have joined, and are still willing to join with us in our defence; and therefore we should not drive them from us, by enforcing the laws against them in a manner, which, of all others, must most sensibly grieve them, viz. the education of their children; which reduces them to a necessity either of breeding them in a way they do not approve, or of leaving them without instruction.

IV. This must be the more grievous to the Dissenters, because it was little expected from the Members of the Established Church, after so favourable an indulgence, as the Act of Toleration, and the repeated declarations and professions from the Throne and former Parliaments, against all persecution, which is the peculiar badge of the Roman Church, which avows and practises this doctrine: And yet this has not been retaliated even upon the Papists, for all the laws made against them have been the effects and just punishment of treason, and from time to time committed against the State. But it is not pretended, that this bill is designed as a punishment of any crime, which the Protestant Dissenters have been guilty of against the civil Government, or that they are disaffected to the Protestant Succession, as by law established; for in this their zeal is very conspicuous.

V. In all the instances of making laws, or of a rigid execution of the laws against Dissenters, it is very remarkable, that the design was to weaken the Church, and to drive them into one common interest with the Papists, and to join them in measures tending to the destruction of it. This was the method suggested by Popish Counsels, to prepare them for the two successive declarations in the time of King Charles II, and the following one issued out by King James II, to ruin all our civil and religious rights. And we cannot think, that the arts and contrivances of the Papists, to subvert our Church, are proper means to preserve it, especially at a time, when we are in more danger of Popery than ever, by the designs of the Pretender, supported by the mighty power of the French King, who is engaged to extirpate our religion, and by great numbers in this Kingdom, who are professedly in his interests.

VI. But,

1714. Queen departed this life; which accident broke all the measures of those, who had promoted that law, and rendered it in a manner ineffectual (1).

The Queen again indisposed.

On the 5th of May the Queen removed from St James's to her Palace at Kensington, in appearance pretty well in health; but, having the next day in the evening felt a shivering, her Physicians thought fit, that she should immediately come back to St James's, where she was, for some time, detained in her chamber by an imposthumation in one of her legs. The Duke of Shrewsbury, having (as has been said) early notice of the dangerous condition the Queen was in, was very desirous to be in England; though, on the other hand, he was unwilling to leave the Government of Ireland in their hands, whom he knew inclined to favour the Pretender's agents; who still continued inlisting men for his service (2). But, all things considered, he judged his presence more necessary at London than in Dublin, and came over about the beginning of June. Finding those about the Queen jarring and disjointed, he resolved to act a cautious part, and not side with either of the contending parties; but, as soon as a proper occasion (which he judged could not be far off) offered itself, to put himself at the head of the well-affected to the Protestant Succession, who indeed were no less strengthened by his arrival at this critical juncture than the Lord Bolingbroke's interest was weakened by the death of the Duke of Beaufort, which happened some days before.

May 24.

Towards the end of May, the Marquis de Trivulz, Ambassador from the new King of Sicily, made his public entry; but it was the 8th of June, before the Queen was in a condition to admit him to a public audience. Two days after the Queen, finding herself something better, removed from St James's to Kensington.

About this time, upon information given to the Earl of Wharton, that two Irish Officers, Hugh and William Kelly, were listing men for the Pretender in London and Westminster, he carried his evidence to Chief-Justice Parker, upon whose warrant William Kelly was seized at Gravesend, with five men inlisted, as Hugh Kelly was a few days after at Deal, with a pair from the Earl of Middleton, Secretary of State to the Pretender. This affair having made a great noise, the Ministers could not avoid taking notice of those treasonable practices; and a Proclamation was published for apprehending the Pretender, whenever he should land, or attempt to land in Great-Britain, and promising a reward of five thousand pounds for that service. The next day Mr Freeman having moved in the House of Commons for an address of thanks for the Proclamation, he was seconded by Mr Auditor Hervey, and supported by the Earl of Hertford, who added, 'That the five thousand pounds mentioned in the Queen's Proclamation was too small a recompence for so important a service;' and therefore moved for an addition to the address, 'That this House would cheerfully aid and assist her Majesty, by granting the sum of a hundred thousand pounds, as a further reward to any, who should perform so great a service to her Majesty and her Kingdoms.' This was opposed by Mr Bromley, Sir William Wyndham, and Mr Campion, who suggested, 'That the promising of a reward so far beyond what was mentioned in the Queen's Proclamation, would be a sort of reflection on her Majesty.'

But

VI. But, if the Dissenters should not be provoked, by this severity, to concur in the destruction of their Country and the Protestant Religion, yet we may justly fear they may be driven by this bill from England to the great prejudice of our manufactures; for, as we gained them by the persecution abroad, so we may lose them by the like proceedings at home.

Lastly, The miseries, we apprehend here, are greatly increased by extending the bill to Ireland, where the consequences of it may be fatal; for since the number of Papists in that Kingdom far exceeds the Protestants of all denominations together; and that the Dissenters are to be treated as enemies, or, at least, as persons dangerous to that Church and State, who have always, in all times, joined, and still would join, with the Members of that Church, against the common enemy of their religion; and since the army there is very much reduced, the Protestants, thus unnecessarily divided, seem to us to be exposed to the danger of another massacre, and the Protestant Religion in danger of being extirpated.

And we may further fear, that the Scots in Britain, whose National Church is Presbyterian, will not so heartily and zealously join with us in our defence, when they see those of the same Nation, same Blood, and same Religion, so hardly treated by us.

And this will be still more grievous to the Protestant Dissenters in Ireland, because, whilst the Popish Priests are registered, and so indulged by law, as that they exercise their Religion without molestation, the Dissenters are so far from enjoying the like toleration, that the laws by this bill are enforced against them.

(1) This act enjoins, That no person in Great-Britain, or Wales, shall keep any public or private School, or Seminary, or teach or instruct youth, as Tutor or Schoolmaster, that has not first subscribed the declaration to conform to the Church of England, and has obtained licence from the respective Diocesan, or Ordinary of the place, or, upon failure of so doing, may be committed to prison, without bail or mainprize. And that no such licence shall be granted, before the party produces a certificate, of his having received the Sacrament, according to the Communion of the Church of England, in some Parish-Church, within a year before obtaining such licence, and hath subscribed the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.

That if any person, having complied with these points, shall knowingly or willingly resort to any Conventicle, or be present in any Assembly, where the Queen is not prayed for, should be liable to the penalty of this act, and from thenceforth be incapable to keep any School, or Seminary, or instruct any youth, as Tutor or Schoolmaster. And if any person teaches any other Catechism, than what is set forth in the Common-Prayer, his licence shall be thenceforth void, and he be liable to the penalties of the act; but no person to be punished twice for the same fact. Any person convicted by this act, conforming to the Church for one year, without having been present at any Conventicle, shall be again capacitated. This act to be construed to extend to Ireland.

(2) On the 14th of May, information being brought to the Duke of Shrewsbury, that about one hundred and fifty men, listed for the Pretender's service, were at the hill of Hoath, near Dublin, waiting to go on shipboard for France, some Comtables, with a file of Musqueteers, were sent thither, who took twenty-four of them, and brought them to Dublin, where they were committed to prison, in order to be tried for high-treason. On the 26th of June, John Reilly, Alexander Bourke, and Martin Carroll, were executed for it at Stephen's Green: And, about the beginning of July, twenty-one persons more were tried and condemned for the same crime.

But, this objection being exploded, the address was unanimously carried, and, four days after, presented by the whole House to the Queen, who told them, 'That the hearty concern they shewed in it for the Protestant Succession was very agreeable to her: And that she hoped, their concurrence would have the desired effect in removing jealousies, and quieting the minds of her good subjects.'

The same day, the Earl of Nottingham moved in the House of Lords for an address of thanks for the proclamation against the Pretender, and was seconded by the Lord Halifax. The H. L. Earl of Wharton, who likewise supported the motion, holding the Queen's proclamation in his hand, most pathetically lamented her Majesty's owning, that her endeavours to remove the Pretender from Lorrain had been ineffectual. 'Unhappy Princess, said he, how much is her condition altered! Will Posterity believe, that so great a Queen, who had reduced the exorbitant power of France, given a King to Spain, and whose very Ministers have made the Emperor and the States-General to tremble, should yet want power to make so pretty, so inconsiderable a Prince as the Duke of Lorrain, comply with her just request, of removing out of his Dominions the Pretender to her Crown?' None of the Peers speaking against the Earl of Nottingham's motion, it was unanimously carried, and the address was, the next day, presented to the Queen, who told them, 'They might be assured, she should continue to do whatever she judged necessary for the securing our Religion, the liberty of her People, and for putting an end to the vain hopes of the Pretender.'

The Lord Bolingbroke, being come into the House of Peers, just after the address was voted, appeared a little surprized at that resolution, and said, 'There was a more effectual way to secure the Succession in the House of Hanover.' Some Members expressing their desire, that he would offer it to the House, he proposed a bill, to make it high-treason to list or to be enlisted into the Pretender's service. The Lord Halifax represented, 'That such a bill was altogether needless, both the Pretender, and all his Adherents, being already attainted of high-treason. However, he should be glad such a bill were brought in, because, with some alterations, it might be made a very good one.' The bill was accordingly brought in, and, in a Committee of the whole House, of which the Lord Bolingbroke was Chairman, the Lords Halifax, Townshend, Cowper, Sommers and Wharton, made it their business to shew, 'That the Pretender was inconsiderable of himself, and not to be feared, but so far forth as he was countenanced and protected by the French King, whose interest and constant design was to impose him upon these realms.' And therefore they moved, and it was agreed, That the title of the bill should be, to prevent the listing her Majesty's subjects to serve as soldiers, without her Majesty's licence; and that it should be high-treason to list, or be listed, to serve any foreign Prince, State, or Potentate, without a licence under the sign manual of her Majesty, her Heirs or Successors. The following proviso was likewise agreed to, 'That no licence should be effectual to exempt any person from the penalties of this act, who should list, or cause to be listed into the service of the French King, until after the French King should have disbanded and dismissed all the regiments, troops, or companies of soldiers, which he had in his service, consisting of the natural-born subjects of Great-Britain.' This act to continue in force for three years. With these amendments, the bill was sent to the Commons, who gave it their concurrence.

This, and other provisions against the Pretender, seemed the more necessary, because his friends were by this time grown to that height of assurance, as publickly to assert his right, and drink his health. To this purpose, above an hundred Irish Papists had a feast at the Sun-Tavern in the Strand, where the Lord Fingal was chosen Steward, and all that came were admitted by a printed ticket, in which was the image of a Pope, or Popish Saint, treading Hereby under foot.

On the second of July, the Lords took into consideration the trade to Spain and the West-Indies; and the Earl of Nottingham made it plainly appear, that by reason of the discouragements, to which that trade was subjected by the explanations of the third, fifth, and eighth articles of the treaty of commerce between Great-Britain and Spain (which explanations were made at Madrid, after signing the treaty at Utrecht) it was impossible for our Merchants to carry on that trade without certain loss. This was confirmed by the testimony of Sir William Hodges, and about thirty more eminent Merchants, who being called to the House, unanimously averred, that, unless the explanations of these three articles were rescinded, they could not carry on their commerce without losing twenty or twenty-five per Cent. It was observed, the Treasurer joined with the Lords, who insisted on the hearing of the Spanish Merchants; which was strenuously opposed by the Lord Bolingbroke. But, after a long debate, it was resolved to address the Queen, for all the papers relating to the Negotiation of the treaty of commerce with Spain; with the names of the persons, who advised her Majesty to that treaty. The Queen sent an answer, 'That, being given to understand, that the three explanatory articles of the treaty of commerce with Spain were not detrimental to the trade of her subjects, she had consented to their being ratified with the treaty.' The Queen making no mention of the persons, who had advised her to ratify those explanatory articles, (which was the chief design of the address) several Members excepted against the answer as unsatisfactory. And, among the rest, the Earl of Wharton and the Lord Halifax represented, 'That, if so little regard was shewn to the addresses and applications of that August Assembly to the Sovereign, they had no business in that House;' and moved, that a representation be made to her Majesty, to lay before her the insuperable difficulties, that attended the Spanish trade on the foot of the late treaty; which was agreed to: It was also moved, That the House should insist on her Majesty's naming the persons, who advised her to ratify the three explanatory articles. But the Courtiers warded off that blow, which was chiefly levelled at the Lord Bolingbroke, and his agent Arthur Moore. The next day the Lords proceeded to the consideration of the Spanish trade, and to the examination mination of the Commissioners of trade and plantations. The Earl of Wharton said ironically, 'He did not doubt but one of those Gentlemen could make it appear, that the treaty of commerce with Spain was very advantageous.' Which was meant of Arthur Moore, who had the chief management of that affair, and who contradicted himself in his answers to several questions, asked him by the Lord Cowper about the three explanatory articles. This was aggravated by the confession of the other Commissioners, particularly of Mr Robert Monkton, who declared, Mr Moore only read cursorily to them the articles, without giving them time to examine the same. Besides which, Mr Popple, their Secretary, deposed, that Mr Moore had shewn him a letter in French from Monsieur Orry, directed to Don Arturo Moro, importing in substance, 'That he must not expect the two thousand Louis d'Ors per Annum, that had been promised him, unless he got the three explanatory articles ratified.' Though the Lords came to no resolution about that affair, at a General Court of the South-Sea Company, upon a full hearing of a complaint of Captain Johnson, it was resolved, 'That Arthur Moore, while a Director of this Company, was privy to, and encouraged a design of carrying on a clandestine trade, to the prejudice of this Corporation, contrary to his oath, and in breach of the trust reposed in him; and that, for such his breach of trust, he be declared incapable of being a Director of, or having any other employment in this Company.' This censure made a great noise, and was highly resented by the Lord Bolingbroke.

On the 8th of July the Lords examined Mr Lovvater, Secretary to the Treasury, and Mr Taylor, first Clerk, concerning the Assiento Contract. They confessed, that they were only Nominal Assignees for the quarter part of the Assiento Contract reserved for the Queen, and that some persons, to them unknown (but who were strongly suspected to be the Lord Bolingbroke, the Lady Masham, and Mr Arthur Moore) were to have the benefit of it. The Lord Cowper having represented, 'That the uncertainty and suspense, in which the South-Sea Company had a long time been kept, whether her Majesty would retain to herself, or give to the Company, the quarter part of the Assiento Contract, reserved to her, had been the principal obstruction to the Company's carrying on that trade.' The Earl of Wharton moved for an address to the Queen, to give to the South-Sea Company, not only that quarter part of the Assiento Contract, but also the seven and a half per Cent. granted to Mannasseh Gilligan, and any other profits arising from that contract.' But, the question being put, it was carried in the Negative by fifty voices against forty-three. After this, on the Earl of Anglesea's motion, it was resolved by fifty-six votes against forty, to present an address, to return thanks for her Majesty's having so generously given, not only licences for two ships of five hundred tons each, and the Assiento Contract; but also the quarter part, which she was pleased at first to reserve to herself; and that she would be pleased, that such other advantages, which were, or might be, vested in her, might be disposed of for the use of the public.' This day's debate took up the Lords till nine o'clock in the evening; so they had no time, as some

The next day, the Queen's answer to their address was reported: 'That she always had a great consideration for the advice of the House: And, as to the particulars desired, she would dispose of them, as she should judge best for the service.' The latter part of this answer was very ill relished by the Whig Lords; and some Members took occasion to complain of the Queen's silence in relation to the persons, who advised her to ratify the three explanatory articles. But, the Lottery-Bill being ready for the Royal assent, the Queen came that very day to the House of Peers, and put an end to the Session with the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'THE progress, which has been made in the public business, and the season of the year, render it both convenient and necessary, that I should put an end to this Session.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

'I return you my hearty thanks for all your good services to Me and to your Country, and particularly for the supplies you have given me, as well to defray the expences of the current year, as towards the discharge of the National Debts. In our present circumstances it could not be expected, that a full provision should be made on both these heads. What you have granted shall be laid out with the best husbandry, and to the greatest advantage.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I hope early in the winter to meet you again, and to find you in such a temper, as is necessary for the real improvement of our commerce, and of all the other advantages of peace. My chief concern is to preserve to you, and to your posterity, our Holy Religion, and the liberty of my subjects, and to secure the present and future tranquillity of my Kingdoms. But I must tell you plainly, that these desirable ends can never be attained, unless you bring the same dispositions on your parts; unless all groundless jealousies, which create and foment divisions amongst you, be laid aside; and unless you shew the same regard for my just prerogative, and for the honour of my Government, as I have always expressed for the rights of my people.'

When the Queen had ended her speech, the Parliament was prorogued to the 10th of August, but she died before that day came.

Promptly after the rising of the Parliament, the discord among the Ministers came to an open rupture. The Treasurer, ever since he had received the Staff, had kept to himself the principal direction of domestic affairs, and the disposal of most places of profit; and, by the credit and interest of his post, and favour with the Queen, had procured advantageous alliances for his children, brought great riches into his Family,

1714. Family, and advanced all his relations (1), whilst the conduct of foreign affairs lay on the Lord Bolingbroke, who, as he was less circumspect in the prosecution of bold measures than the Treasurer, had therefore the largest share of the public odium, without any other advantage than the profits of his office, most of which he lavished away in riotous pleasures. Being a man impatient of dependance, he had frequent warm expostulations with the Treasurer, who, thinking himself secure in the Queen's favour, and in his interest with the Parliament, disregarded his complaints, by which the Secretary was still more enraged. Their private disputes would often have ended in an open quarrel, had not the Queen, assisted by the Chancellor and Lady Masham, as often reconciled them, or rather, had not their Confederacy in the late measures made them suspend their mutual hatred to consult their common safety. But, as soon as the danger was over by the Parliament's solemn approbation of the peace, it appeared there was an irreconcilable rivalry and enmity between them. Before this last struggle, the Treasurer, either finding his interest declining at Court, or despairing of the Queen's life, and apprehending the consequences of the late steps, bethought himself of a timely retreat; and, to that end, endeavoured to reconcile himself to the Whigs. He tried to gain the friendship of the Lord Cowper, who had the greatest weight amongst them; and, with that view, procured him to be chosen Umpire between his son, the Lord Harley, and the Lord Pelham, in a controversy about the inheritance of the late Duke of Newcastle. But the Lord Cowper contented himself with arbitrating the matter according to the strictest rules of equity, and with doing justice to the son, without espousing the interest of the father. On the other hand, the Treasurer expected to be strongly supported by the Duke of Shrewsbury, who had maintained himself in the esteem both of the Sovereign and of the Public, and whose late behaviour in Ireland had endeared him to the well-affected to the Hanover Succession. But the Duke, justly resenting the neglect of the Ministers, while he was at Dublin, was very much unconcerned about them, when he came to London, and rather inflamed than moderated their differences, by complaining to the Queen of some orders, that had been sent him, which he thought inconsistent with her Majesty's and the Nation's service. Notwithstanding these disappointments, the Treasurer formed a design of removing his competitor, as the best means to approve his affection to the Protestant Succession, and therefore set Mr Robert Monkton against Mr Arthur Moore (the Lord Bolingbroke's creature) who narrowly escaped a censure in the House of Peers, in which the Treasurer hoped the Secretary might have been involved. But, in this very instance, the Treasurer found he had lost considerable ground at Court, the Queen having thought fit, at the Lord Bolingbroke's desire, to put a sudden stop to that inquiry. And it appeared soon after, that, by his superior interest with Lady Masham, by the assistance of the Lord Chancellor, by his humouring the Queen's natural inclination, and boldly pursuing the measures she had entered upon, the Secretary entirely ruined his rival in her favour and confidence.

The Treasurer, in this situation of his affairs, wrote a letter to the Queen, and with it sent her an account of public affairs from August the 8th 1710, to June the 8th 1714; in which he endeavours to justify his own conduct, and expose the uneasy, turbulent, and ambitious spirit of Lord Bolingbroke. But this had not the intended effect upon the Queen.

While the Court was in this ferment, something happened, which hastened the Treasurer's disgrace. Some pretend, the Lord Bolingbroke had intelligence, and informed the Queen of the Treasurer's inviting the Duke of Marlborough to come over (for which purpose the Duke was indeed arrived at *Oxford) and of his private Conferences with several Whig Lords: Others, that he was suspected of discovering the Queen's councils to the Court of Hanover, and even of putting them upon demanding a writ for the Duke of Cambridge: Others again, that he was both against the scheme of new-modelling the army, and the project of a new offensive and defensive league between Great-Britain, France, Spain, Sweden, and Sicily: And others, still, that the Queen was extremely angry at his presuming to send orders to Ireland, without consulting with her or the Council; and that the Duke of Shrewsbury insisted on his removal, which the Duke of Marlborough had made a previous condition of his return to England. But a certain author* (who writes in his vindication) plainly asserts, that his disgrace was entirely owing to his attachment to the House of Hanover, whose Succession his enemies were resolved to prevent (2). However this be, on the 20th of July the Chancellor, (who had retired into the Country for a few days) was sent for in haste; and the next day was in close Conference with the Queen and the Lord Bolingbroke; after which it was generally reported, the Treasurer would be speedily removed. It was said at the same time, that, to soften his fall, the Queen designed to bestow on him an annual pension of five thousand pounds for life, with the title of Duke of Newcastle; and, upon his recommendation, to give the title of Earl of Clare to the Lord Pelham. But, contrary to his own, and indeed the general expectation, when he came to Court on the 27th of July, the Staff was taken from him, rather with mortifying, than thought they could not hurt him any way more with the Queen, than by representing him as inviolably attached to the Protestant Succession. 'The party (says he) took hold of this article, as if they had a great advantage given them against the White-Staff, intimating, that it was a great affront to her, and an apparent carrying on his own game at the Court of Hanover; accordingly, her Majesty was prejudiced by it, as if it had been a dishonour to her.' White-Staff, p. 34.

1714. than agreeable circumstances. It is certain, that severe reproaches passed, in the Queen's hearing, between the falling Minister and the Lord Chancellor, and the Lady Masham, whom the Treasurer had disoblged some days before, by making a demur to a grant she had obtained of fifteen hundred pounds a year, and whom he looked upon as accessory to his disgrace. He told them, 'He had been wronged and abused by lyes and misrepresentations; but he should be revenged, and leave some people as low as he found them (1).' These expostulations could not but shock the sick Queen, and give her uneasy suspicions of her being abused and deluded by one or two, if not by all three, of her principal Ministers. It is pretended, that in this agitation of thought, which opened her eyes, she resolved to resign herself wholly to the conduct of the Duke of Shrewsbury. But it can hardly be supposed, that, in her condition, she was capable of forming a resolution so inconsistent with her late measures. It is far more reasonable to imagine that the Lord Bolingbroke, having gained so great an ascendant over her, was most likely to succeed the Earl of Oxford in the management of affairs. This is certain, the very day, the Treasurer was removed, the Lord Bolingbroke entertained at dinner the Generals Stanhope, Cadogan, and Palmer, Sir William Wyndham, Mr Craggs, and some other Gentlemen; which meeting of men of such opposite principles occasioned various speculations. The most probable conjecture was, that the Lord Bolingbroke, considering he could not depend on the Queen's precarious life to accomplish his designs, and foreseeing a storm, he could not be able to weather, resolved to strike in with the Whigs, and to invite over the Duke of Marlborough; in which he had reason to expect better success than his late rival, with whom the Duke had vowed never to be reconciled. Some other particulars were at that time mentioned to corroborate these suggestions. But though the Duke of Marlborough, after having been detained about a fortnight by contrary winds, did, at this very time, embark at Ostend for England; yet the true motive of his coming at this critical juncture is not certainly known. It appeared plainly, however, soon after, that, whatever were the Lord Bolingbroke's thoughts and views at this time, the main design of the Whigs was to inflame the animosity between him and the Earl of Oxford, as the readiest way to ruin them both.

The Treasurer's removal was so sudden, and occasioned such confusion, that no scheme was either formed or agreed on, to supply his place, and to fill up such other vacancies, as must naturally attend his disgrace. A Cabinet-Council, or rather chamber-consultation, was indeed held in a hurry, the very night the Earl of Oxford was removed, and several persons were proposed to manage the Treasury, which was designed to be put in Commission. Their number was to be five, of which Sir William Wyndham, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, was to be one; but the choice of the other four perplexed both the Queen and her Counsellors. It is said, the persons named were the Lords Bolingbroke, Paquet, Lexington, Bathurst, and Masham; the Bishop of London; Mr Henry Boyle, and Mr Bridges; Sir John Pockington, Mr Campion, Mr Hill, and some others. But, whether there were fewer or more in nomination, it is certain, no resolution was taken as to the choice of any four, either in that first consultation, or in the Council held the next morning; several persons, who had been proposed, and spoken to, having declined to accept a precarious employment in such a juncture. On the 29th of July, the Cabinet-Council was to have sat on the same affair; but their meeting was deferred to the next day, by reason of the Queen's indisposition, which, she was sensible, was occasioned by the late quarrelling among her servants, having intimated to one of her Physicians, 'That she should not outlive it.'

It is certain, both the dispute, to which she was an ear-witness, and the consultation upon it, which lasted till near two o'clock in the morning, occasioned such a violent agitation of the Queen's spirits, as could not but hinder, according to Dr Shadwell's opinion, the usual discharge of the imposthumation in her leg, so that the gouty humour, translating itself upon the brain, was the immediate occasion of her death. On Thursday morning², the Queen finding herself indisposed with a dozing heaviness, and a shooting pain in her head, the Physicians judged proper, she should be cupped, which she liked better than bleeding, and which, in the same symptoms, had often given her ease. The Queen was now something relieved by it; went to bed at the usual hour; rested pretty well till three o'clock on Friday morning, when she July 30. waked, and finding something heavy on her stomach, and reaching to vomit, she brought up some matter, and then composed herself to sleep. Towards seven o'clock she waked again; and, finding herself pretty well, rose from bed, and got her head combed. This done, towards eight, she went to look on the clock; and Mrs Danvers, one of the Bed-chamber women, taking notice, that she fixed her eyes a long time upon it, asked her, What she saw in the clock more than ordinary? The Queen answered her only with turning her head, and a dying look; at which Mrs Danvers being frightened, she called for help. The Physicians judging, she was seized with a fit of an apoplexy, caused her to be let blood; upon which she came to herself again, and was pretty quiet till a little after nine, when she was seized with a second fit of heaviness and dozing, which increased so much upon her, that for above an hour she was speechless and motionless. Those about her judging, she was either

(1) 'He exposed (says the Author of the White-stoff) their new schemes, ridiculed their impolitic measures, and foretold them to what distresses they would reduce themselves in a little time, putting them in mind of a debt they would owe to the national justice at last, and how unwilling they would be to pay it. He prophetically told them, they would be in a little while reduced to the primitive meanness and contempt in which he found them! That he had too long borne the reproaches which was due to their measures, which he had in vain persuaded them against, and that it was time now that the world should see, who were the enemies to the British Establishment.'

1714. either dead, or near expiring, the Dukes of Ormond, one of the Ladies of the Bed-Chamber, then in waiting, sent, with all speed, a messenger to the Duke her husband, with this melancholy news, which being brought to the Committee of Council, then assembled at the Cockpit, they immediately went to Kensington. In the mean time the Physicians thought fit to give the Queen a vomit, which not having all the desired effect, they administered another medicine, proposed by Dr Mead; upon which she recovered her speech and senses.

The Dukes of Somerset and Argyle, being informed of the Queen's desperate condition, instantly repaired to Kensington, and, without being summoned, went into the Council-Chamber, where the Lord Chancellor, the Dukes of Shrewsbury and Ormond, the three Secretaries of State, the Bishop of London, and some others, were in a Committee. It is easy to imagine, that some of them were surprized at their coming in; but, after they had acquainted the Board with the reasons which brought them thither, the Duke of Shrewsbury returned them thanks for their readiness to give the Council their assistance in that critical juncture. Then they took their places, and moved, that the Physicians might be examined, and ordered to give an account in writing of the Queen's illness, which they did. After this, one of the Council represented, how necessary it was, in case the Queen died, that the place of Lord-Treasurer should be filled; to which the whole Board assenting, the Duke of Shrewsbury was proposed, and unanimously approved, as the fittest person for that high trust. Sir Richard Blackmore, Dr Shadwell, Dr Mead, and the other Physicians, who were examined, having assured the Council, that the Queen was sensible, the Chancellor, with the Duke of Shrewsbury, and some other Lords, were ordered to attend her, and lay before her the unanimous opinion of the Council; upon which she said, 'They could not recommend a person she liked better than the Duke of Shrewsbury;' and, giving him the Treasurer's Staff, bid him use it for the good of her people. The Duke would have returned the Lord-Chamberlain's Staff, but she desired, he should keep them both; so the same person was at once possessed of three of the highest places of trust, honour, and profit under the Crown of Great-Britain, being Lord-Treasurer, Lord-Chamberlain, and Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. The Duke's advancement to the post of Lord-Treasurer immediately changed the face of affairs; baffled the Lord Bolingbroke's schemes; alarmed the friends of the Pretender; and revived the spirits of the well-affected to the Hanover Succession (1). Upon the motion of the Dukes of Somerset and Argyle, it was agreed, that all Privy-Counsellors, in or about London, without distinction, should attend; which the Lord Sommers, and some other friends to the House of Hanover, did that very day.

About three o'clock in the afternoon, the Queen relapsed into a lethargy or apoplectic fit, out of which she hardly recovered by the application of the spirit of sal ammoniac to her nostrils. The Physicians thought fit to apply blisters; but, at the same time, acquainted the Council, that the Queen's life was in the utmost danger, and entirely depended on the effect of this last remedy.

In the mean time, the Privy-Council took into consideration the state of the Kingdom; and very severe reflections were made on the late Administration, for leaving the maritime places, particularly the important town of Portsmouth, unprovided with men and warlike stores, and consequently incapable of defence, in case of a sudden invasion, which might be reasonably apprehended, in case of the Queen's death (2). But, the present business not being to enquire into, but to mend faults, the Council, with great prudence and dispatch, provided for the security of the Cities of London and Westminster, of the Maritime Towns, and of Scotland and Ireland. Orders were immediately dispatched to four regiments of horse and dragoons quartered in remote counties, to march up to the villages near London, to keep the Jacobites and Disaffected in awe: And to seven of the ten battalions of British forces, to embark at Oxford, and sail for England with all possible speed. An embargo was ordered on all shipping, and directions were given for fitting out as many men of war, as could soonest be got ready. By these orders the public tranquillity remained undisturbed, and no consternation appeared, but in the faces of the avowed partisans of the Pretender.

The Queen continued all night in a lethargic fit, which increased to such a degree about ten o'clock on Saturday morning, that all the Physicians despaired of her life. Upon this the Privy-Council sent orders to the Heralds at Arms, and to a troop of Life-Guards, to be in a readiness to mount, in order to proclaim the Elector of Brunswick King of Great-Britain. At the same time, they caused a letter to be written to his Electoral Highness, to acquaint him with the extreme danger the Queen's life was in; with the measures they had taken to secure the Crown

(1) It would take up another volume (says the Author of the History of the White-Staff) to give an account how struck they appeared at this surprising blow. What gave away the Staff? Said they, after they had stood looking upon one another speechless and confounded for some time, at a private assembly of all their Confederates, which was held on this occasion, where they gave vent to their passions, and broke out into all the extravagancies of rage and despair. 'The blast of hell, and the rage of a million of devils, be on this cursed Staff (said the Secretary, flinging the purse to the ground) it is he that has ruined us.' 'Give away the Staff, said the Bishop, by G—— I could not have believed the durst have done it? What can we do without it? We have but one way left, France and the Lawful Heir; it must and shall be done by G——.'

Whither do I launch (says the Author) this is a scene of such consequence, filled with such a discovery of black designs, that it cannot be entered upon here, but must be referred to another occasion. See Hist. of the White-Staff.

(2) Sir John Gibson, Deputy-Governor of Portsmouth, had, a little before, sent up to the Secretary of State an information he had received, of great preparations then making at Havre de Grace, for an embarkation of troops, which he apprehended to be in order to invade the Kingdom, and bring in the Pretender: And, at the same time, he represented how unprovided he was, both with men and warlike stores, to defend that important place, in case of a sudden attack: But no notice was taken either of his information, or representation.

Crown to him; and to desire him to repair, with all convenient speed, to Holland, where a British Squadron, that was fitting out with all possible expedition, would attend him, and bring him over, in case of the Queen's death. This letter was that very morning sent express by Mr James Craggs, and with him orders were dispatched to the Earl of Strafford, to desire the States-General to get ready to perform the guarantee of the Protestant Succession, if need should require.

This done, the Privy-Council resumed the consideration of the State of the sea-port towns, and ordered a strong reinforcement to be sent down to Portsmouth; and rightly judging, that, if the Pretender's friends stirred any where in Great-Britain, it would be, most probably, in Scotland, they ordered Major-General Whetnam to repair thither, and assist Major-General Wightman; and appointed the Earl of Berkely to command the fleet. The Queen gave some signs of life between twelve and one o'clock, and took some spoonfuls of broth. She continued in a lethargic condition till about six in the afternoon, when, her pulse beating a little faster and higher, those about her began to entertain some hopes. But the blisters not having had the desired effect, she expired on Sunday the 1st of August, a little after seven o'clock in the morning, having lived forty-nine years, five months, and six days, and reigned twelve years and five months, wanting seven days. She was not able, either to receive the Sacrament, which the Bishop of London was ready to administer, or to sign the draught of a will, whereby she directed her burial to be in the same manner and place with her late Royal Consort; and in which she left legacies to some of her servants.

Thus died Queen Anne, whose character has already, in great measure, been described, but will more fully appear in the following remarks on the circumstances and affairs of her Reign.

Remarks
Reign and Character of Queen Anne.

No Reign was ever more memorable than this for important events. Different accounts and numerous comments have disguised and confounded many material particulars. But, notwithstanding this, the true state of affairs, and the real character of this Princess, may, without much difficulty, be explained. No period of time afforded men more eminent for wisdom and abilities, and more distinguished by successes equal to their merit. Had not such circumstances happened, Europe must have submitted to an Universal Monarchy, which would not have endured any remains of civil or religious Liberty.

When the war was begun, nothing could be more menacing than our prospects. The House of Bourbon despising all treaties, and most solemn engagements, without any difficulty or opposition seized territories more extensive and considerable, than were ever gained by the most rapid Conqueror, by the toils of a long life. All the powers of Europe were obliged, by the laws of prudence and self-defence, to oppose a Monarch thus prepared for their destruction. Those, at remoter distances, were easy and insensible; and some, who were nearly concerned, entered into the pernicious measures of France. The pride and oppression of the Court of Vienna aggravated the evil, by giving occasion to the insurrection of those subjects*, of whose usefulness and importance the present times have afforded full evidence.

The Turks remaining quiet during the whole war; the insurrection in the Cevennes; and the victory at Hockstedt, are instances of the most favourable incidents. When we review the case of those brave and oppressed Protestants, how can we forbear inquiring, Why was not a deep and incurable wound then given to France in her vitals? Must we ascribe our fatal neglect to bigotry, perfidy, to an aversion to all foreign Churches, and to the natural operation of Tory principles? It is affirmed, it was only carried by one vote at the Council-board, not to call them rebels in our Gazette: And, Will your Majesty assist rebels? Is said to have been the expostulation of a very grave Nobleman with the Queen's conscience. While too many were averse, others seem to have had no true sense of the importance of this incident. Complaints have been likewise made of our being betrayed by our Agents.

The wonderful and very seasonable success at Hockstedt was properly pursued by our great General. But, how faulty was the House of Austria on their part? How much valuable time was wasted; and how feebly did they come prepared to the siege of Landau? Military preparations were neglected, and the vain pomp and shew of a King of the Romans chiefly regarded. Thus the troops were obliged to continue in the field till the beginning of winter, to their great detriment. The feebleness or slowness of the Germans, or the envy of their General, defeated the designs which were excellently formed, of penetrating into France on its weakest side. A year's reprieve thus gained enabled the enemy to offer us battle. A complete and cheap victory was gained and followed with all desirable consequences. Time spent in the sieges of this and the following years has been represented as the want of conduct, or something worse. But the importance of a barrier is evident to every honest and thinking man. When this security is neglected, the awe and terror it must produce will convince by facts far more effectual than the clearest reasoning. The entering France, and leaving behind the numerous fortified towns of the new conquests, had any mischance happened, would have been deemed an unpardonable want of precaution. To a second attempt, by the way of Lorrain, there was nothing to give encouragement.

Our advantages in other parts were very considerable; particularly by disappointments of the enemy in the sieges of Gibraltar and Barcelona. But what account can be given of our misfortune and misconduct, when a sure, near, and easy method of possessing Spain was offered? What hindered Lord Galway's marching with proper expedition to Madrid? Had this been executed, all the Courts and Tribunals of the Kingdom would have been secured. By dispatches from thence the Governments of America might have been gained. But in what terms shall we mention the delays of King Charles and the Earl of Peterborough, after the flying retreat of King Philip and his army? Their behaviour, in all its parts, was a direct contradiction to all the dictates of prudence, interest, and glory. Had they immediately assembled the troops in Valencia and Catalonia, joined Lord Galway, and marched directly to the Pyrenees, Philip must have been for ever excluded; and the great and good

The disappointment before Toulon was almost equally affecting. Such a conquest would have been a most sensible wound to France. Had not the army been weakened by the great body of troops sent to the conquest of Naples, the affair must have succeeded. Jesuitical counsels and French money are supposed to have influenced the Court of Vienna. The reasoning fatally urged was to this purpose: If the naval power of France is destroyed in the Mediterranean by taking Marseilles and Toulon, the uncontrollable dominion of two maritime powers, which are Protestants, will be intolerable. The Priests of Italy and Spain trembled for Rome and the Holy House. They had lively forebodings of something worse than the return of the days of Cromwell. As they had an assured prospect of Spain, the perfect awe and subjection of the maritime part of that Catholic Kingdom to Heretics came into consideration: This, though known to Dr Hare, was not inserted in his excellent political tracts published in 1711 and 1712, for a very obvious reason; since it would have given assistance to the Ministers in their evil designs of infusing into the Nation ill-will and aversion to the House of Austria, and kind inclinations to that of Bourbon.

Not improving advantages and opportunities is matter of easy observation to all, who reflect on the several wars, of which we have accounts. In Confederacies, wherein there are a variety of humours and opposite interests, such misfortunes are in a great measure unavoidable. But, notwithstanding the several escapes of the enemy, the Duke of Marborough's sure and steady progress, and the damages the French sustained in other places, reduced them to a state of the utmost distress and terror. Their frontiers were impaired to such a degree, that we had gained an easy and secure admission into the open and defenceless parts of France, had his Queen and Country duly supported this great Captain. The grand Monarch would have been driven from his Capital; his glory had received an indelible stain; and his vain and insolent subjects a just mortification. Such advantages would have repaid all our toils and expences. He must have gladly compounded by recalling his grandson from Spain. His forcible and fraudulent acquisitions must have been surrendered; and sure foundations laid for the lasting peace and safety of this part of the world. Clearer and more obvious truths appear no where in the histories of any age or people; yet such hath been the delusion of party, that contrary representations have gained an entire credit. The speculative and practical propagators of them have been considered by a numerous party, as the best Writers, and the wisest and most worthy Ministers.

The temper, behaviour, and management of the Queen, on whom so much depended, deserves a particular and impartial consideration. As both parties in their turns were greatly dis-obliged and offended, no praises have been given her for personal steadiness and wisdom. In some sermons indeed, parts and abilities have been ascribed to her; but, were such passages duly explained, the abilities would be found to belong only to her Ministers.

Great are the dishonours, which have redounded to the sacred order by the behaviour of those Princes, who have been most favoured with their esteem. The effects of their zeal have not appeared in a warm and equal concern for the welfare of society; but in aiding one party to oppose and ruin the other. Benevolence and compassion have been disregarded; and wrath, clamour, and brutal qualities have been encouraged; and those of the divine and human kind been greatly neglected.

There were two things, to which the inglorious part of this Reign may be chiefly imputed; the Queen's passion for Favourites, and the prejudices of her Education. To the secret influence of Favourites was owing the disgrace of her General, who, while he was steadily pursuing the interest of the Public, was not only dismissed and loaded with the heaviest reproaches, but even prosecuted for what had been granted him by the Queen's warrant under her own hand, and what was afterwards given to the Duke of Ormond. By the same secret influence, the exchanging the Able, Honest, and Successful, for Those whose management proved them in all respects the reverse, was esteemed an important deliverance. Hence also it was, that the Ministers had often such put upon them as were their enemies, and the just aversion of those on whose assistance they depended. This incommoded every Ministry, and was the cause of the Queen's constant complaints of her being only a Royal Slave. In a word, passion for favourites seemed to have a greater effect upon her, than the impressions of ambition and glory: For otherwise, the most worthy designs had not been abandoned, when there was so near a prospect of their accomplishment.

The prejudices of the Queen's education had also a great share in fullying the glory of her Reign. It was her misfortune to be educated in such times, and under such persons, as had given her wrong ideas of Religion and the Church, and infused into her, from her very infancy, strong prejudices against the Whigs, who were represented to her as enemies to the Constitution in Church and State. Deliberate reviews are very uncommon, and especially in those who are at the height of power. This evil was therefore incurable, and had very ill consequences! Hence, though the Queen has been justly commended for her devout and regular attendance on the offices of the Church (1), and for ardent wishes for its prosperity, yet for want of true notions of religious liberty (which she had never been taught) attempts were repeatedly made in the beginning of her Reign, with her approbation, to discourage and distress the Dissenters. But these attempts were disappointed by the moderation and justice, which then subsisted in the House of Lords. The concurrence of the Treasurer * • Lord and General † in those measures hath been re-

But the immediate and pressing motive of their behaviour was a necessity of complying with the inclinations of their Royal mistress. Had they refused, they would have given their rivals a very dangerous advantage. And, though we should allow the fullest strength to their old leaven, yet it must be supposed, if they had been at perfect liberty, their known prudence and policy would have restrained such appearances of it at this time. For nothing could be more mortifying and offensive to the Dutch, and all the Reformed Churches. Besides, to begin such a war with disuniting measures at home would have been to the last degree absurd.

Distressing and incapacitating were consistent with the designs, the views, and the measures of the four last years of the Queen's reign. All Protestants abroad, as well as those at home, who differed from the Establishment, were marked with infamy. A loud noise for the Church filled all places, and prevented all attention to the calamity and destruction preparing for the State. Depriving the Dissenters of the natural right of educating their children was the prelude to the divesting of them of their most important privileges in society. For their power of voting for Members of Parliament would have been taken away; and they would have been rendered equally incapable of being concerned in the choice of Members of Corporations.

How soon hath the sense of such a deliverance been lost! Because impracticable favours have not been granted, many of them, who dignify themselves with the name of Consistent Protestants, and the true assertors of liberty in its full extent, have shewn themselves extremely perverse both in their words and actions; and in some places applied their wonderfully-preserved privileges and capacities for the service of an interest, which had doomed them to destruction; in others, they have been indolent and unconcerned.

How the Queen's zeal for the Church operated in the affair of Dr Sacheverel, is but too well known. This zeal gave the enemies of the Ministry advantages at Court and in the Country, beyond their most sanguine expectations. To the mad ferment which was diffused through the Kingdom, and which influenced the future elections, the easy success of the new Ministry may be justly ascribed. For though they had been possessed of power; and though the Nation was tired out with taxes; yet nothing but the operation of the noise and name of the Church could have given them so secure a majority. This alone, after such affecting successes, was capable of producing an insensibility of the advantages given the enemy, and of the distress, to which we most faithlessly and insolently reduced our Allies. Our liberties, trade, and commerce could only by this means have been placed in so bad a situation.

1714. An explanation of the real secret of the management of the new Ministry, and of the impeaching Parliament, hath not been attempted. Perhaps of this, as well as of some other particulars both at home and abroad, no full and exact account will ever be given. It hath been said, that the Treasurer and his Friends foresaw and intended some of the consequences. The Junto and their Friends, the zealous promoters of it, were to have been given up. That the Junto had often made remonstrances and demands, both with regard to persons and things, in a manner disagreeable to the Prime Minister, may be allowed, without supposing a wife man capable of so absurd a scheme for his deliverance. Besides, the combination between the then Patriots and the Tories was known to be so firm, as not to suffer him to entertain the least hopes of making any impression. From all appearances, we may conclude it to have been the effect of hasty unthinking zeal. Express and Parliamentary approbation was intended for the principles, on which the Revolution is founded. Something of this kind seemed necessary, because, throughout this Reign, Revolution principles had been perpetually disgraced and opposed from the Press and the Pulpit.

The heart of the Queen was well known, and her secret affections and dissatisfactions well understood. Therefore, during the trial of Dr Sacheverel, and immediately after, the principles of the Revolution were vilified beyond measure; and the Doctrines of Slavery became matter of glory, as the peculiarials of Christianity and the Church. Addresses were graciously received, wherein, with the omission only of his name, the Pretender's title was expressly asserted; and, by evident implication, this was calling the Possessor of the Throne an Usurper; language, which hath ever been unpardonable with every other Prince. However this be, most certain it is, that those who had expressed their readiness to concur in the measures of the Court, were regarded as well affected, and declarations and assurances in favour of the House of Hanover were considered only as a matter of necessity and form.

No one of our Monarchs ever had greater advantages of doing good both at home and abroad, nor had any Reign been distinguished with such glorious and important events. Germany saved from destruction; the Imperial Crown preserved and fixed on the head of our Ally; Flanders subdued; the exorbitant power of France reduced; the Union of England and Scotland, are events for which the Reign of Queen Anne will be had in everlasting remembrance. But by a dishonourable peace, how fruitless were these important events rendered? How soon was the power of France restored to a condition of injuring, oppressing, and terrifying the world? And very probably, nothing but the Queen's sudden removal prevented the execution of those schemes in favour of the Pretender, which the Peace-makers had laid, and for which due preparation had been made (1).

Had

(1) It is made a question by some, whether the Queen knew any thing of the design of bringing in the Pretender, notwithstanding the strong appearances of it. In 1708, when the attempt was made on Scotland, Sir George Bing had no instructions as to the person of the Pretender. When this particular was taken into consideration, the council broke up in confusion. For when some mentioned methods of dispatch, the moving appearance of the Queen's flowing tears prevented all farther deliberation. Lamberti says (Vol. VIII. p. 657.) that

Had not the Emperor and Catalans prolonged the war, Lewis XIV. some months before the Queen's death would have sent us his last legacy; for he would have been at perfect liberty to have aided those here, who had prepared every thing for a second Restoration. Who can mention the Catalans, and forbear lamenting their severe and horrible usage? We not only neglected their securities and privileges, though they had been true to all their engagements, but assisted in completing their ruin (1). The case of the Catalans seems to afford full proof, that the Queen was deceived by her Ministry, and kept in total ignorance of affairs; for if that had not been the case, she must have had no inclination to truth and probity, and have been incapable to distinguish between right and wrong, in the strongest instances, which cannot well be supposed (2).

The domineering manner, in which we joined with France, in dictating terms to our Allies; the faithless and insolent manner of abandoning them; the injurious usage of them in debates and resolutions of Parliament, and by Ministerial Writers, have given impressions greatly detrimental to all future Negotiations, and fixed indelible infamy upon our Nation.

Queen Anne, as to her person, was middle sized, that it was very evident, the Queen of Great-Britain was extremely inclined to set the Pretender on her Throne. This inclination first appeared on the death of her son the Duke of Gloucester. For an express being sent by the Queen (then Princess of Denmark) to the Court of St Germain, to notify the Duke's death, the Earl of Manchester, Ambassador from King William to the Court of France, sent his Secretary Mr Chetwin to Loe, to inform the King of this proceeding. The reader may also see the extract Numb. I. annexed to the end of this reign, concerning the Pretender's affair.

(1) See the case of the Catalans, Numb. II, at the end of this reign.

(2) How grossly the Ministry imposed on the Queen, appears from several transactions, orders and directions given by the Ministers in the Queen's name, directly contrary to her sentiments as expressed in her messages and speeches to the Parliament, concerning the terms of peace, which she communicated to both Houses. The Committee of Secrecy examined this matter, and compared the Queen's Declarations with the measures her Ministers presumed to take in carrying on the negotiations. This they did in the following manner, in their report to the House of Commons.

The first time that the Queen made any mention of the peace to the Parliament, was on December 11, 1711, at which time nothing had been concluded between England and France, but the special Preliminaries that were signed by the Earl of Dartmouth and Mr St John on the part of England, and Monsieur Mesnager on the part of France, September 27, 1711, and the general preliminaries signed by Monsieur Mesnager only, which were sent over by the Earl of Strafford as the foundation of a general peace. After these Preliminaries were signed, Mr St John had pressed Monsieur de Torcy, that the King of France would explain himself with regard to the Allies; begs that the Queen may have some explication of his intentions in respect to the particular interest of the Allies, and concludes with saying, if the Sieur Gaultier returns with these marks of confidence, you will see our Parliament as much inclined to peace as ever it was to war.

Such explications as the King of France thought fit to make, are contained in the answer to the memorial brought by Monsieur Gaultier, Nov. 18, 1711*. Upon which her Majesty, at the opening of that Session, in laying before the Parliament the state of the treaty then on foot, according to the advice and representation made to her by her Ministers, said, 'That notwithstanding the arts of those who delight in war, both place and time are appointed for opening the treaty of a general peace. Our Allies, especially the States-General, whose interest I look upon as inseparable from my own, have, by their ready concurrence, expressed their confidence in me.' The Queen thought the States had readily concurred with her; but it must be remembered, that the States had in the strongest manner represented against the propositions signed by Mr Mesnager, as too general and uncertain, not being a sufficient foundation upon which a Negotiation might be hazarded; they dreaded the fatal consequences of opening the general conferences, before the articles offered by France were made specific, and before they knew what they were to trust to for their own barrier and their commerce. These representations were made in Holland to the Earl of Strafford; and Mr Buys was sent over into England to enforce them here.

But, instead of acquainting the Queen with these representations, or acting according to her Majesty's sentiments, Mr St John, October 9, declares, 'Certain it is, that her Majesty is so far determined in her measures, that those will deceive themselves who may imagine by delay to break them.' And October 29, 'The Queen remains firm in her first resolution, of causing the Conferences to be opened upon the articles signed by Monsieur Mesnager.' And November 2d, 'The Queen will not finally concert a plan for the prosecution of the war with the States, until they join with her in agreeing to open the Conferences of peace.' And November 15, Lord Strafford says, 'He had now told them her Majesty's order to him was to declare, that she should look upon any delay as a refusal to comply with her propositions.' By these threats and extraordinary measures, the States are compelled by the Queen's Ministers, to consent to open the Conferences; when at the same time her Majesty was persuaded, that they readily concurred in what had been proposed to them. Her Majesty declares, 'She looks upon the interest of the States-General to be inseparable from her own.' Mr St John declares, 'That Britain had gone so much too far in weaving her interest into that of the Continent, that it would prove no easy task to disentangle them without tearing and rending.'

The Queen says further, 'The Princes and States Ibid. which have been engaged with us in this war, being by treaties entitled to have their several interests secured at a peace, I will not only do my utmost to procure every one of them all reasonable satisfaction, but I shall also unite with them in the strictest engagements for continuing the Alliance, in order to render the general peace secure and lasting.' And in her message of the 17th of January following, her Majesty again expresses 'The care she intended to take of all her Allies, and the strict union in which she proposed to join with them.'

By these Declarations it appears, her Majesty's own resolution was to unite with the Allies in the strictest engagements. But her Ministers had taken upon them, in the private propositions sent over by Mr Prior, to insert an article, 'That the secret should be inviolably kept between England and France, till allowed to be divulged by the consent of both parties.' And although France, in the first propositions sent over by Monsieur de Torcy, had offered to treat with England and Holland, either separately or jointly, with the rest of the Allies, at the choice of England, the Queen's Ministers excluded the Allies; and in the Conference held with Monsieur Mesnager, 'They are much surprized to find that he had orders to insist, that the Queen should enter into particular engagements, upon divers articles, which depend not upon her, and which regard the interest of the Allies: And they insisted that it was absolutely necessary to remit the discussion of the particular interests of the Allies to general Conferences.' And when Mr St John was pressing Monsieur de Torcy to give them some explanations to the Parliament. She was reckoned a pattern of conjugal affection, and a prudent indulgent Mother. She was liberal, though an enemy to luxury and profuseness. She was very reserved; and, in all conditions of life, she required a strict attendance from all persons in their respective stations, she herself being nicely observant of all the decorums of a Court.

1714. sized, and well made, but not so majestic as her Sister Queen Mary. Her hair dark brown; her complexion sanguine and ruddy; her face round, rather comely than handsome; her features strong and regular; and the only blemish in her face was owing to the defluxion she had, when young, in her eyes, which left a contraction in the upper-lids, and gave a cloudiness to her countenance. Her bones were small, and hands beautiful. She had a very good ear for music, and performed on the Guitar, an instrument formerly much in vogue. Her voice was remarkably clear and harmonious, which particularly appeared, in the graceful delivery of her speeches

The exercise she principally loved was hunting, which she practised in her chaise; but the gout increasing upon her, and growing extremely unwieldy, she disliked that and other diversions, conducive to her health, which perhaps might have been longer preserved, had she not eat so much, tions of what was designed for the Allies, he assures him, 'If the King would offer a plan of specific Preliminaries, the Queen will never communicate it to her Allies.' And upon another occasion, he declares, 'This Negotiation was begun and carried on upon a supposition, that the Queen must desist from many conditions which in rigour she was obliged to procure for her Allies.'

In the message of the 17th of January the Queen declares, 'Her Plenipotentiaries had begun, in pursuance of their instructions, to concert the most proper ways of procuring a just satisfaction to all in Alliance with her, according to their treaties, and particularly with relation to Spain and the Indies.' And her Majesty had said before, in answer to an address from the House of Lords, presented the 11th of December 1711.

Sept 229 'I should be sorry any one could think I would not do my utmost to recover Spain and the Indies from the House of Bourbon.'

The Committee did not doubt but her Majesty was determined to recover Spain from the House of Bourbon: But, that her Ministers had no such thoughts, and did not in the least endeavour it, appears in every part of the Negotiation. In the first propositions sent over by Mr Prior, demands are made of the King of France, to be performed by the King of Spain, which the King of France was to engage for. And, as appears by an entry in Lord Strafford's book, Mr Prior had orders to see if they had full powers from Spain. In the special Preliminaries, an acceptance whereof was signed by the Earl of Dartmouth and Mr St John, September the 17th, 1711, it is laid expressly, The King promises in the name of the King of Spain his grandson, and according to the powers which his Majesty has received from that Prince, That Port Mahon and Gibraltar shall remain to the English. These steps had been taken by the Queen's Ministers, even before her Majesty had made these Declarations; which the Committee cannot therefore but conclude her Majesty was not informed of. And although the Queen's Plenipotentiaries were obliged by their instructions to insist, That Spain and the West-Indies should not be allotted to any branch of the House of Bourbon; when the Plenipotentiaries of France, on the 11th of February 1711-12, gave in their specific explanation of the general Preliminaries, signed by Mr Mesnager; the King of France made his first offers in the name, and by virtue of powers from his grandson King Philip, as King of Spain. On the 4th of March 1711-12, at a meeting of the Ministers of the Allies at Utrecht, where they were to communicate to each other their respective demands, Count Zinzendorf insisted, That the restitution of the whole Spanish Monarchy should be expressly mentioned; upon which occasion it appears, by a letter from the English Ministers of the 6th of March, That they were the only Ministers that did not make any mention at all of Spain, and that they were sensible of the disadvantageous consequences of being so; but being desirous to take off this odium, they make a general Declaration concerning the just and reasonable satisfaction for the Queen's Allies, in conformity to their Alliances; and humbly hope what was said will not be found contrary to what has been thereto declared.

All the attempt that the Queen's Ministers ever made towards obtaining this great point, which her Majesty declares, she should be sorry any one could think she did not do her utmost to procure, was to demand assurances that the Crowns of France and Spain should never be united. The method of preventing this union was never mentioned by the Queen's Ministers in order to be treated of, nor the sense of France and Spain ever asked upon it, till the latter end of March 1712.

In the same message her Majesty further adds, 'The world will now see how groundless those reports are which have been spread by men of evil intentions, to serve the worst designs, as if a separate peace had been treated, for which there has not been the least colour given.'

In this Declaration, her Majesty is advised by her Ministers, in order to clear them from the just suspicions which all the world had conceived of the separate measures they were engaged in, not only to declare there had not been the least colour given for such jealousies, but to brand all that entertain such apprehensions, with the character of men of evil intentions, that had the worst designs to serve. But that most just cause had been given for these reports, is sufficiently evident from what was just now observed. The Ministry had insisted that the secret should be inviolably kept between England and France, exclusive of all the Allies. A separate Negotiation between England and France had been carried on by papers sent backward and forward, and much time spent therein, as is said in Lord Strafford's instructions. Mr Prior had been sent into France, and Mr Mesnager had been in England, and not the least communication was given for five months together to any of the Allies of these transactions, which were depending from April 1711, to September following, from the time that the first proposals signed by Monsieur de Torcy were sent to the States, till the seven general Preliminaries signed by Mr Mesnager, were communicated to them. When these general Preliminaries were signed, which were sent over as a foundation to open the general Conferences, a set of special Preliminaries between England and France was signed on both parts, which were concealed, publicly disowned, and never appeared till this enquiry; and all these transactions had passed, however disguised to her Majesty, before the time that her Ministers advised the Queen to impose so grossly upon the Nation, as to declare in Parliament, there had not been the least colour given for these surmises.

Her Majesty is advised here to declare, That to report that a separate peace had been treated, proceeds from evil intentions, and to serve the worst designs. But the Committee observes, That after this Declaration of the Queen, her Ministers propose to France, agreed with France, and sent positive and repeated orders to the Queen's Plenipotentiaries, not only to treat, but to conclude a separate peace with France. On the 20th of June 1712. Mr St John acquaints Monsieur de Torcy, the Queen will make no difficulty to conclude immediately a separate peace with France, leaving the Allies a time wherein they may have liberty to submit to such conditions, as shall be agreed upon between

It was her unhappiness not to be much acquainted with our English History, and the actions of her Predecessors; whereas, Queen Mary between the Queen and the most Christian King. In answer to this, Monsieur de Torcy tells Mr St John, upon condition the Queen does immediately make a separate peace, and keep no measures with her Allies, the King has determined to send his orders to permit the English troops to enter into Dunkirk. On the 12th of July, 1712. Mr St John thinks the Queen in a condition not to lose a moment's time in concluding with the Ministers of France the Convention for a general suspension of arms both by sea and land, and even the treaty of peace between Britain and France. And on the 4th of August, 1712. Monsieur de Torcy acquaints Mr St John, That the King consented to the Duke of Savoy's having Sicily upon certain conditions; where in one express condition is, That a peace be concluded between England and France, Spain, and Savoy. And at last, when the treaty drew near to a conclusion, and almost all the Allies were ready to sign, on the 20th of February, 1712-13. positive orders are sent to the British Plenipotentiaries to conclude and sign with France; and on the 28th, Lord Bolingbroke repeats his orders to the British Plenipotentiaries to conclude and sign with France: And acquaints them, 'The Duke of Shrewsbury had declared, that their Lordships had orders, in case the French complied, as they now have actually done, to sign her Majesty's peace with France without further delay; and that his Grace had also declared, That in this case her Majesty would open the Parliament by telling them that she had made a peace with France: These two considerations, his Lordship says, were perhaps the most prevalent inducements to the French Court to come roundly into her Majesty's propositions.'

The Committee close this head with repeating a passage from one of Lord Bolingbroke's letters to Mr Prior, wherein he says, 'If such overtures as these were not instantly accepted, our separate peace would, fitting this Parliament, be addressed for, made, approved, and the cause of France for once become popular in Great-Britain.'

Sept. 267. On the 6th of June 1712, the Queen says, 'I am now come to let you know upon what terms a general peace may be made.'

On the same day, Lord Bolingbroke acquaints Monsieur de Torcy, 'That though the King of France had not answered the Queen's demands, according to expectation, the Queen would not defer going that day to Parliament, and making all the declarations that were necessary to render the Nation unanimously inclined to the peace.'

ibid. The Queen says, 'The difficulties had been increased by other obstructions, artfully contrived to hinder this great and good work.' Whereas it is notorious, that the Ministers had received but the day before, the account that King Philip had consented to make the renunciation, upon which account only the Queen's speaking to the Parliament had been deferred.

ibid. The Queen says, 'I have not omitted any thing which might procure to all our Allies what is due to them by treaties, and what is necessary for their security.'

Lord Bolingbroke, on the very same day, in his letter to Monsieur de Torcy, says, 'Lord Strafford is going back to Utrecht, and the instructions he is to carry will put the Queen's Plenipotentiaries in a condition to keep no longer those measures to which they have hitherto been obliged to submit; but from henceforth they may openly join with those of France, and give law to them, who will not submit to just and reasonable conditions.'

ibid. The Queen says, 'Nothing has moved me from steadily pursuing, in the first place, the true interest of my own Kingdoms.'

Lord Bolingbroke just before, on the 24th of May, had proposed to Monsieur de Torcy, 'That the Queen being much more intent upon the general peace, than any particular advantages, Commisaries should be appointed to settle, after the peace, such points relating to trade, as required a longer discussion than the present crisis would admit.'

The Queen says, 'That to prevent the Union of the two Crowns, she would not be content with what was speculative, but insisted upon something solid.' Although Monsieur de Torcy had before declared to the Queen's Ministers, 'That to accept of this expedient which they proposed, would be to build upon a sandy foundation.'

The Queen says, 'The nature of the proposal for a renunciation is such, that it executes itself; and that France and Spain are thereby more effectually divided than ever.' But Monsieur de Torcy had before assured the Queen's Ministers, 'That this renunciation would be null and void, by the fundamental laws of France; and they would deceive themselves, who accepted of it as an expedient to prevent the Union of the two Crowns.'

The Queen says, 'Provision is made, that the same privileges and advantages as shall be granted to any other Nation by France, shall be granted in like manner to us.' But it appears, by a letter of Lord Bolingbroke's in January following, to the Duke of Shrewsbury, 'That France refused to let our trade stand upon the foot of Gens amicitissima; declared the Tariff of 1664, which was granted to the Dutch, except the four species, was too beneficial for us; and refused to grant it, until another Tariff should be made in Great-Britain exactly conformable to that of 1664, whereby our duties would be reduced as theirs are in France by that Tariff.'

As to our commerce with France, the Queen says here, June 6, 1712, 'It was in a method of being settled.' And Mr Prior says of it in May following, near a twelvemonth after, 'We had like to have made an Athanasian business of it at Utrecht, by that explanation of our own way of understanding our own commerce. Their letters to you, full of surmises and doubts, that all was unhinged; and their letters to us again, that explanations, however made, were only to save appearances, and signified nothing: This Mélange, I say, and my endeavouring to understand it, had like to make me run mad, if the Duke of Shrewsbury's extreme good sense, and Mons. de Torcy's not only honest, but right understanding, had not redressed us.'

The Queen says, 'The French consented to deliver p. 268. up Newfoundland and Placentia.' But it must be remembered, that in the preliminaries signed in September preceding, the French had reserved to themselves a liberty of taking and drying fish in Newfoundland.

The Queen says, 'An absolute cession was to be made of Nova Scotia, or Acadia.' But Cape Breton, which was always understood to be, and is so declared by the Queen's instructions to the Duke of Shrewsbury, to be part of Nova Scotia, is expressly given up to France.

The Queen says, 'The trade to Spain and the West-Indies may in general be settled, as it was in the time of the late King of Spain, Charles the Second.' But when the project of the treaty of commerce came from Madrid, Lord Bolingbroke says of it, 'They had sent a blind, lame, miltapen, indigested monster, instead of that fair offspring, which we had reason to expect from our candour.'

If all the other parts of this speech be strictly examined, it will be found that the Ministry did so grossly deceive the Queen, in order to impose upon the Parliament by her authority, that there is scarce a paragraph that does not contain some unfair, or at least equivocal representation of the state of the Negotiations. And when the Queen was advised by her Ministers to make this communication to Parliament, as the terms upon which a general peace might be made, it is very evident, they had no assurances that France would make good what they prevailed upon the Queen to declare in so solemn and public a manner.

(1) This seems to confuse the scandalous report of the 1714. Mary was extremely well versed, not only in our own, but the Histories of other Countries.

Her Reign may be called Bloodless, not one person having been executed, at least beheaded, for treason, during the whole course of it; which cannot be said of any Reign since the time of Edward I, who died in 1307.

Semper Eadem was the motto of Queen Elizabeth, which Queen Anne assumed upon her Accession to the Throne; and which, had she pursued with the same resolution and steadiness, she might have exceeded her in glory and fame. But in one thing she was very unlike Queen Elizabeth, whom she proposed for her pattern. Queen Elizabeth was very sparing of her honours, and a man must have deserved it, before he could obtain so much as a Knighthood at her hands (1): Whereas Queen Anne made more Peers of the Realm at once, than the other did in a Reign of forty-four years. Indeed, her Great-Grandfather King James, was the first that was lavish in conferring honour, whose example was but too much followed by his Descendants; so that Queen Anne was not singular in that respect, except in creating so many together, for an end that will remain a blemish upon her Administration, as long as History endures.

In Queen Anne ended the line of the Stuarts: Their merit and demerit may be rightly stated, by considering what their regards or disregards were to the welfare of Europe; to the union and strengthening of the Protestant Interest; and to the quiet and prosperity of their subjects. In order to make up such an account duly and accurately, many important materials are still wanting.

There had been a new vault made on the South-side, and towards the East-end of Henry VII's Chapel, to deposit the body of King Charles II, in which that Prince, Queen Mary, King William III, and Prince George of Denmark, were laid. Here the remains of Queen Anne were likewise deposited, and there being no more room left, the vault is closed up with brickwork.

the Queen's drinking spirituous liquors, which was told with so much assurance, that many who loved and esteemed her gave in to it, whereas one of her * Historians affirms it for a truth, that she abhorred all strong waters. The French Continuator of Rapin gives credit to the common report, and says, she accustomed herself to it out of complaisance to the Prince her husband.

THE Committee begin with observing, that Abbot Gaultier*, though he did not appear to have any public character, resided in England during the greatest part of the Negotiation for peace; and, upon extraordinary occasions, was often sent backward and forward. But the share, he had in the more public transactions, was not his only business. It was evident, some Negotiations, which required more than ordinary privacy, were verbally transacted; and, upon all such occasions, Abbot Gaultier was the person, to whom the French and English Ministers mutually referred each other. And as of necessity nothing could be a greater secret, than all matters relating to the Pretender, this province was particularly allotted to Abbot Gaultier, that through his hands, and under his conveyance, by French Couriers, going continually betwixt France and England, such practices might be carried on with great safety, which, in any other manner, had been too dangerous an undertaking.

The first time, that any secret Negotiation is expressly referred to Abbot Gaultier, is found in a letter of Mr Secretary St John, of March 4, 1711-12, wherein he tells Monsieur de Torcy, 'He had deferred writing to him of late, till he might write with certainty, till the necessary dispositions were made among our people at home, and till the Queen had taken the only resolution, which could bring us, in a short time, to a good and solid peace. I have now the satisfaction to tell you, that this resolution is taken; and that Mr Harley will carry with him this night, or to-morrow morning, the final instructions of the Queen to her Plenipotentiaries. I refer myself to Mr Gaultier, to explain to you more at large the subject of this Gentleman's Commission, and what the Queen hopes his most Christian Majesty will do to co-operate with her.'

The Committee of Secrecy observed, that several letters and papers were wanting, which, by the circumstances of time and matters then depending, appeared to be of moment and consequence; it was not to be expected, that those, who had been so careful to suppress matters of less importance, would leave behind them any transactions, that might tend openly and directly to favour and support the cause of the Pretender. But there were still left several passages, which are a plain indication of the tenderness and regard, with which the cause and person of the Pretender were treated, as often as mentioned, and which the Committee thought fit to bring together in one view, as follows:

There is a paper, that was left in Lord Bolingbroke's closet, dated at Versailles the 24th of September 1711, indorsed, as other office-papers usually are. It gives an account, that the Pope's Nuncio had, in his last audience of the King of France, made the following declaration: 'That the Court of Rome being fully informed, that France was endeavouring to procure a peace upon the most advantageous terms, that was possible; and being persuaded, that if the peace should be made, England would not suffer, that the King of France should permit the Prince of Wales to continue in his Realms; the Court of Rome offers to the King of France; to give this Prince an asylum at Rome; or in any other part of the Ecclesiastical Dominions.¹ To which the King of France returned in answer, 'That an asylum for the Prince of Wales would be no obstacle to the peace: That if, the Allies did truly desire to make a peace, he would accept of any reasonable propositions they should make; and in this case an article for the Prince of Wales would be inserted in the treaty.'²

June 7, 1712, the Bishop of Bristol, giving an account to Lord Bolingbroke of some discourse he had with some of the Ministers of the Allies, says, 'Monsieur Conbruck, one of the Emperor's Plenipotentiaries, kept also within the terms of decency, save only, that he took it for granted, that one great end of all this management on our part was to bring in the Pretender; which apprehension one of the Ministers of the States lately owned in private discourse, to have been the fundamental reason of all their conduct of late.'³

It is well known, what great stress and weight was laid upon the removal of the Pretender out of the Dominions of France. This was what all the Nation, with great justice, expected, and what the Queen declared was taken care of, as an additional security to the Protestant Succession. But his removing out of France, and being permitted to reside in Lorrain, was not only a great surprize to all the Nation, but was received with such just indignation, that the Parliament addressed the Queen upon this occasion, 'That she would insist upon his removal from Lorrain; that residence being equally or more dangerous to Great-Britain, than his abode in France.'⁴ Her Majesty's answer, That she would repeat her instances, occasioned in the House of Lords a becoming resentment, that the Duke of Lorrain should presume to receive and entertain the Pretender to her Majesty's Crown, in defiance to her Majesty's application to the contrary. But it now appears in what manner the removal of the Pretender out of France was transacted and settled; and that his residing in Lorrain was not only with the approbation, but even by the direction and appointment of the English Ministry. Mr St John, in his letter to Monsieur de Torcy, of the 24th of May, 1712, O. S. when he sent him over the conditions, upon which her Majesty would make those important and decisive declarations to Parliament, concludes that letter with saying, 'He hopes, that, with the general repose, we shall see revived, in a few weeks, a good understanding between two Nations, which may become, to each other, the most useful friends, for the same reasons they have been the most formidable enemies. The Queen commands me to tell you, that she hopes, when you send an answer to this letter, we shall have an account, that the Chevalier had begun his journey.' In answer to this, Monsieur de Torcy says to Lord Bolingbroke, on the 10th of June, 'You may assure the Queen, that the Chevalier is ready to depart at a moment's warning, if he did but know where he was to go, and in what place he might be in safety. I own to you, that I know no Prince, who is willing to receive him, for fear of displeasing the Queen or other powers. It will be absolutely necessary, that there should be some explanation upon this subject, which I desire you to make to me by the Abbot Gaultier, if you do not judge it proper to do it yourself.'

Mr Secretary St John, on the 6th of June 1712, O. S. writes a public letter, in answer to the several points contained in Monsieur de Torcy's last letter; but, in that letter, takes no notice at all of the Chevalier. But the day after, June the 7th, 1712, he writes a private letter, as he calls it himself, to Monsieur de Torcy, and concludes it with saying, 'The Abbot Gaultier will write to you upon the subject of the Chevalier.' There were two copies of this private letter, one delivered by Lord Bolingbroke, the other entered in Lord Strafford's book: And, in the copy of this letter given by Lord Bolingbroke, this passage, 'That Abbot Gaultier shall write about the Chevalier,' is omitted by his Lordship.

On the 22d of June 1712, N. S. Monsieur de Torcy writes two letters to Lord Bolingbroke. In the public letter nothing is said of the Pretender: The private letter concludes with saying, 'I have the honour to send you a letter under the King's hand for her Britannic Majesty; and I refer you to what the Abbot Gaultier shall say to you about the departure of the Chevalier.'

On the 21st of August 1712, Lord Bolingbroke being then in France, to give the finishing stroke to all matters of consequence, that were undetermined, in his dispatch to the Earl of Derimouth, giving an account of his proceedings at the Court of France, says, 'The Chevalier has fixed his departure for the first of next month, N. S. They propose, that he shall retire to Bar, and they intend to write to the Duke of Lorraine, to ask of the Emperor, and other Princes, a security for his person during his residence in that place.'

But on the 28th of December 1712, N. S. it appears, that the Chevalier was still in France; upon which account Mr Prior writes thus to Lord Bolingbroke: 'Another point, upon which this Court is very solicitous, is, that the Chevalier remaining in any town of France obstructs the signing the peace; yet he cannot go to Lorraine, till the Emperor's passports will secure him there. Your Lordship, by the perusal of the papers, will see the state of that case, and I have only to add upon this subject, that the Court of France expresses an impossibility on their side to do more than they have done; and hopes we should have interest enough with the Emperor, to obtain such passports from him, as may secure, as well the person, who is to go into Lorraine, as the Duke of Lorraine, who is to receive him.'

Mr Prior, on the 29th, writes to the same effect to the Lord-Treasurer, and says, 'The Monarch is a good deal troubled upon this head, lest the young man should fall into the hands of Hussars or Barbarians. And Monsieur d'Aumont has, I presume, orders to speak to our Ministry upon it. As to the dowry, I shall not only be dunned to death, but hanged; for the Dowager sends messages to me, which you in England do not think it extremely lawful to receive. But, if it is to be paid, pray let it be done in an handsome manner, that may shew the charity of the Queen, and the generosity of her Lord-Treasurer.'

The papers, referred to in Mr Prior's letter, contain an account of what the Duke of Lorraine had done at the desire of the King of France, to obtain from the Allies the necessary safeguard for the Chevalier. He says, that understanding, that the Queen of Great-Britain had already granted her safeguard or protection to the Chevalier de St George, he believed they had no more to do, but to apply to the Emperor, and to the States-General.

By this account it is evident, that Abbot Gaultier was the person intrusted to manage the affairs of the Pretender, with whom such practices were verbally to be transacted, as the British Ministers did not think proper to commit to writing. It appears, that the place, to which he was to go, because nobody would receive him at the hazard of the Queen's displeasure, and where he might remain in safety, was to be prescribed from England: That this was not fixed and determined till Lord Bolingbroke went into France: And, if his Lordship's instructions are considered, it will be hard to find in them any thing of that importance and secrecy, as to require his going in person to settle it. His Lordship gives an account from thence, that the Pretender was to go to Bar; and this is acquiesced in here, without the least objection made. The Ministry are told by Mr Prior, that the Court of France hopes, by our interest, such passports would be procured, as might secure his person. And, in the paper sent to France from the Duke of Lorraine, it is asserted, that the Queen of Great-Britain had already granted her protection to the Pretender.

But, November 6, 1713, Lord Bolingbroke writes to Mr Prior, and says, 'Her Majesty having repeated to the Duke of Lorraine the instances, which, you know, have been so often made to the most Christian King, for removing of the Pretender to her Crown out of his Dominions, I am directed to acquaint you therewith, that you may speak to the Minister of Lorraine, and to any other Minister, whom you shall think proper; and let them know it is absolutely inconsistent with the amity and good correspondence, that is between the Queen and their Masters, to receive into their Dominions, or to protect a person, who disputes her Majesty's most undoubted title, and thereby endeavours to disturb the peace and quiet of her Kingdoms. That you may be able to shew them, that this is the collective sense of the whole Nation, as well as the Queen's command to you, I herewith send you the addresses of both Houses of Parliament.' This can be understood as no more than a bare compliance with the addresses of Parliament. And how little repentment and indignation was conceived against the Duke of Lorraine, for this indignity offered to her Majesty, appears from a letter written by

by Lord Bolingbroke to Mr Prior, November 10, within four days after his last-mentioned letter upon the subject of the Pretender, 'This letter, says he, will be delivered to you by Baron de Forstner, who has been twice at our Court, with the character of Envoy from the Duke of Lorrain, and who is extremely well with your friends on this side of the water, that I make no doubt, but that he will be a welcome acquaintance to you. I must, at the same time, recommend the interest of the Duke of Lorrain his Master to your care. You know, Sir, how little that Prince has yet felt the good effects of what was stipulated for him at Ryswick. You know, Sir, how justly he pretends to an equivalent from this Emperor for the Montserrat. In a word, you are enough apprized of his wants, of his expectations, and of her Majesty's earnest desire, if by any means he can, to contribute to the ease and to the advantage of a Prince, who deserves much better usage than he has on many occasions met with.

There were several other letters, that were wrote after the address of Parliament, to press the removal of the Pretender from Lorrain: But, after what has been said, it is needless to observe, what little effect was to be expected from such representations made in the several Courts of Europe, which were known to be contrary to the sense and intention of the Court of Great-Britain. And, if any further demonstration was wanting to shew their true spirit and inclination, it may be observed, that the addresses in Parliament were made in July 1713, and the first letter, that Lord Bolingbroke wrote in pursuance of those addresses, was the 6th of November, which was four months after the addresses were presented to the Queen.

It will not be improper to insert here an extract of a memorial, touching the demolition of the sluices of Dunkirk, delivered by Monsieur de Torcy to Lord Bolingbroke, at Paris, in August 1712. 'It is not our business now to examine, whether the Queen of England, and the English Nation, were in the right to demand the demolition of the fortifications, and the filling up the harbour of Dunkirk. That is a thing resolved and agreed upon. It may perhaps come to pass, in the course of this affair, for reasons easily to be foreseen, that England shall repent having demanded the demolition of a place, and the destruction of an harbour, which might be of great use in conjunctures, which perhaps are not very remote.' The Committee of Secrecy did not take upon them to explain, what conjunctures France had in view, and which they thought not very remote, when Dunkirk might be of particular service; but they thought proper to conclude that part of their report with observing, That the Pretender did, immediately upon the demise of Queen Anne, publish a Declaration, which the Duke of Lorrain acknowledged in his letter of the 6th of December 1714, that he received from the Pretender himself, wherein is this remarkable passage: 'Yet contrary to our expectations, upon the death of the Princess our Sister (of whose good intentions towards us we could not for some time past well doubt; and this was the reason we then sat still, expecting the good effects thereof, which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death) we found, that our people, instead of taking this opportunity of retrieving the honour and true interest of their Country; by doing us and themselves justice, had immediately proclaimed for their King a foreign Prince, to our prejudice, contrary to the fundamental and incontestable laws of Hereditary Right, which their pretended acts of Settlement can never abrogate.' Thus stood the Pretender's affairs at the death of Queen Anne.

II. The case of the Catalans, as represented in the Report of the Committee of Secrecy, June 1715.

AFTER several unsuccessful attempts by way of Portugal, and the design upon Cadiz, to settle King Charles on the Throne of Spain; and that the Confederate fleet had appeared before Barcelona in 1704, without the desired success; her Majesty, in the beginning of the year 1705, sent Mr Crowe as her Minister to Genoa, with private instructions, to the following effect: 'That her Majesty being informed, that the people of Catalonia were inclined to cast off the yoke imposed upon them by the French; and by withdrawing themselves from the power of the Duke of Anjou, to return to the obedience of the House of Austria, was desirous to maintain and improve that good disposition in them; and, to induce them to put the same speedily in execution, had made choice of him to carry on so great a work, for the advantage of her service, and the good of the common cause. He is therefore ordered to repair to Genoa, Leghorn, or other such neutral country or place, as he should judge most proper for carrying on her Majesty's service in this particular; and to treat with the Catalans, or any other people of Spain, about their coming into the interest of Charles the Third of Spain, and joining with her Majesty and her Allies. For that purpose he is to inform himself, what number of forces they will raise, and what they expect shall be sent to assist them. If any of the Nobility insist upon a sum of money to be advanced to them, he must assure them, he does not doubt but he shall be empowered to remit to them whatsoever is necessary and reasonable for their support, as soon as they are actually in the field. That he shall give the Catalans, or other Spaniards, assurances of her Majesty's utmost endeavours to procure the Establishment of all such rights and immunities, as they have formerly enjoyed under the House of Austria. That she has, for their further satisfaction, sent to King Charles the Third, for powers for confirming the same to them; and that she is willing, if they insist on it, to give her guaranty, that it shall be done.'

Mr Crowe had also a Commission of the same date with his instructions, to treat with the Catalans upon the terms before-mentioned, upon this express condition on their side, that they should acknowledge and receive King Charles as lawful King of Spain, and utterly renounce the House of Bourbon.

He had, with this, credential letters signed by the Queen, directed to the Nobility, Magistrates, and all Officers, civil and military, of Catalonia, desiring them to depend upon the promises he should make them in her name.

The Earl of Peterborough and Sir Cloudesley Shovel, by their instructions, dated May 1, 1705,

are likewise ordered to use their endeavours to induce the Catalans to join with them in their undertakings; and, to animate that people, to prosecute their liberty with more vigour, they are empowered to assure them of the Queen's support, and to promise them, in the Queen's name, that she will secure them a confirmation of their rights and privileges from the King of Spain, that they may be settled on a lasting foundation to them and their posterities. But, left persuasions alone should not prevail, they are ordered, in case the Catalans make no suitable return to these kind offers, to annoy the towns on the coast of Spain, and to reduce them by force.

In conformity to these instructions, a declaration was drawn here, and delivered by Mr Secretary Harley to the Earl of Peterborough, for him to publish in Spain, full of assurances, in the Queen's name, of support, and of their liberties on the one hand, and threats on the other; which declaration he, on his arrival in Spain, did accordingly publish.

The success of that expedition is well known. King Charles, in his letter to the Queen, of October 22, 1705, gives an account of it, and what it was owing to, namely, 'The assurances of your Majesty's generous protection, upon which my subjects of Catalonia expose their lives and fortunes.'

No want of fidelity or zeal for the common cause during a long war, which abounded with extraordinary turns of fortune, was ever objected to these people. On the contrary, they received to the last the applauses of the Allies, and assurances repeated to them by every General and Minister, who was sent from Great-Britain to that Country, that they should never be abandoned.

When the Queen entered into separate measures of peace, Lord Lexington was sent Ambassador to Spain; at which time, considering the circumstances of King Philip's affairs, and the obligations he had then received from the Queen, the Catalan privileges, if plainly demanded and insisted upon, could not have been refused; and without it, could never be expected to be granted to a people so remarkably zealous for the common cause.

But his instructions, instead of directing him to insist upon this, as a condition of the Queen's coming into the peace, order him only to represent to the Court of Spain, that it is no less for the King's interest, than for the Queen's honour, that a general amnesty, without exception, be granted to all Spaniards, who have adhered to the House of Austria, and, in a particular manner, to the Catalans, with regard to their persons, estates, dignities, and privileges.

These instructions, though very defective, were not complied with; for Lord Lexington, in the 11th article of his paper, which is called demands, delivered to the Court of Spain, upon his arrival there expresses himself thus: 'That the Queen prays his Catholic Majesty, that a general amnesty, without exception, be granted;' but leaves out the words in his instructions, with regard to their persons, estates, dignities, and privileges.

The King's answer was, 'That the general amnesty, relating entirely to the general peace, was not proper for the present treaty; and therefore he leaves it to be then treated of: That his Majesty will make use of his great clemency, provided the Queen will contribute to the safety, to the repose, and to the interests of so many faithful subjects, who, according to their duty, had followed his righteous cause in Flanders, and in all the parts of Italy; and that an express article be inserted in the peace, wherein it shall be declared, That all subjects, who have done their duty, by adhering to his Catholic Majesty, shall be established in their estates and honours, of what nature soever they be, which they enjoyed, when they were under his obedience; and that they may mortgage, exchange, or sell, at their pleasure; and that they shall have full liberty to continue in the service of their King; and that neither, upon this pretext, or any other whatsoever, they shall receive the least prejudice, or the least harm in their estates and honours, or any molestation whatever; and that any municipal law to the contrary (if there be any such) shall be made void by the treaty of peace.'

Lord Lexington transmits this answer to England, which, though containing a direct refusal at present of what was desired, and only general assurances of clemency from the King, on conditions, that could not possibly be expected to be complied with; yet his Lordship, in his letter to Lord Dartmouth, writes word, That the 11th article (which is this about the Catalans) was agreed to; and thinks, what they desire is but justice; and then goes on, 'Thus, my Lord, I have finished my Negotiation in the best manner, I could, and hope it will be to her Majesty's satisfaction.'

No dissatisfaction was shewn by the Ministry in England, either with this manner of negotiating, or the fruitlessness of it; but the Lord Lexington is ordered to proceed in the business, both as it was an act of humanity, which every one to the utmost of their power, ought to promote; and that the interest of the King of Spain was most nearly concerned by that means, to get the Germans out of the Country.

Hereupon another memorial for an amnesty is presented: The motive used to induce the King to grant it, is his own interest, and to remove the Germans, without any notice taken of the Queen's honour being concerned in the affair.

The King answered, 'That the Catalans had deserved little from him: That they were now reduced to a small extent of ground, by the withdrawing of the troops of Britain and Portugal: That his troops, and those of the King, his Grandfather, were entering into their Country by three several ways: Therefore, more in complaisance to the Queen, than for the arguments, that had been offered, he was willing to grant his pardon to those Catalans, who acknowledged his clemency, and repenting them of their error, should submit to his Dominion and Vassalage within a time to be prefixed.'

Count Zinzendorf, in the project for evacuating Catalonia, insisted upon the preserving the people their privileges. But the King of Spain refused it, and would only grant them an amnesty and pardon.

Lord Dartmouth, in his letters both to the Marquis de Monteleone and Lord Lexington, says, 'He cannot express the Queen's surprize to hear, that the privileges of the Catalans were not intended to be preserved to them by the Court of Spain: That these privileges were necessarily cessarily included in the meaning of a general amnesty already granted. And this was an affair, wherein the Queen's honour was extremely concerned, and that she was obliged by motives of conscience not to depart from it.' Lord Lexington is hereupon ordered to insist again upon it in the strongest manner imaginable; that when the King of Spain is convinced of her Majesty's steadiness, and the firmness of her resolution to adhere to this demand, no doubt he will yield to what has been so solemnly promised, and is in itself so reasonable. That the Marquis de Monteleone, being restrained by his instructions from treating upon this point, the negotiating of it must entirely lie upon Lord Lexington.

Accordingly, his Lordship presents another memorial for a general amnesty, with the confirmation of all their privileges. The amnesty, he says, was granted; but the privileges entirely refused, and in such a positive stile, as he never met with, but in demanding a track of ground about Gibraltar.

In another letter to Lord Dartmouth, speaking of the many denials he met with in Spain, he says, ' Things are not here upon the same foot, as they were before the suspension; for the King told me these words, We know, that the peace is as necessary for you as for us, and that you will not break it off for a trifle.'

It may seem, at first sight, unaccountable how the Queen's endeavours could fail of success, when she declared her conscience was concerned in this matter; and that though she desired a peace, she would not act inconsistently with honour and justice to obtain it.

The first fatal step to the ruin of the Catalans was the orders sent Lord Lexington (contrary to his first instructions) upon his arrival at Madrid, to acknowledge Philip as King of Spain, in a private audience, before any one article of peace or commerce was settled, which put him in a condition of refusing this, and whatever else he should think fit.

The manner how Spain gained this important point, appears to be as follows: Lord Dartmouth had acquainted Mr Prior, that Lord Lexington was not to acknowledge Philip King of Spain, till he had agreed to the demands his Lordship was to make in the Queen's name. However, Lord Dartmouth thinks it convenient, that the sentiments of the French Court should be known upon this matter as soon as possible.

This method of proceeding with Spain was very much disliked in France; and Mr Prior writes Lord Dartmouth a very elaborate letter, full of Monsieur de Tercy's reasons, to induce the English Ministry to recede from that point, and concludes with this remarkable one, ' That the whole treaty being eventual, this acknowledgement of Philip as King of Spain, would fail, as the other points, unless the conditions were made good, and the peace agreed and ratified.'

Hereupon the Lord Bolingbroke determines this matter in favour of Spain, by imputing the former directions to Lord Dartmouth's mistaking the Queen's meaning, and writes Mr Prior word, that he was equally surprized and vexed to find, by the uncouth way of explaining the Queen's sense, that Mr Prior had been led to imagine, it was intended Lord Lexington should make any difficulty of acknowledging the King of Spain as such. ' The proceeding this way,

by acknowledging the King in the first place, says his Lordship, seems natural, civil, and unexceptionable; but any other scheme is absurd and inconsistent with all the rest of our proceedings.' And he then concludes, ' For God's sake, dear Matt, hide the nakedness of thy Country, and give the best turn thy fertile brain will furnish thee with, to the blunders of thy Countrymen, who are not much better Politicians, than the French are Poets.'

Lord Dartmouth, it seems, thought fit to acquiesce, and, the same day that this letter was writ, dispatched orders to Lord Lexington, to acknowledge King Philip in the first place, notwithstanding his former instructions to the contrary.

But to return to the Catalans: The Ministers did not shew that zeal for the Queen's honour, as might be expected, but plainly gave up this matter. Lord Bolingbroke, in his letter to the Queen's Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, tells them, ' It is not for the interest of England to preserve the Catalan liberties; and likewise begs leave to make an observation to them, that the Catalan privileges are the power of the purse and sword; but that the Castilian privileges, which the King of Spain will give them (in exchange for the Catalan) are the liberty of trading and resorting to the West-Indies, and a capacity of holding those beneficial employments the King has to bestow in America, which, says his Lordship, are of infinitely greater value to those, who intend to live in a due subjection to authority.'

Lord Lexington also, instead of supporting the Catalan privileges, treated the people as rebels; and to induce Spain to make peace with Portugal, puts Monsieur Orry in mind of the necessity Spain is in of withdrawing their troops from Andalusia, in order to end the rebellion of the Catalans.

When the Convention was forced upon the Emperor for evacuating Catalonia, the Imperial Ministers at Utrecht insisted upon the preserving, by that treaty, the privileges of Catalonia, Majorca, and Ivica. But France and her Confederates insisting, that this matter should be referred to the peace, the Imperial Ministers at last acquiesced, upon the Queen of Great-Britain's declaring again, ' That she would interpose her good offices in the most effectual manner, to obtain the privileges of Catalonia, Majorca, and Ivica.' And the French King engaged, at the same time, to join his endeavours for that purpose. Hereupon, the Negotiation in Spain was kept up, till our treaty of peace with that Crown was ripe, by which the Catalan liberties were to be abandoned. This Lord Lexington signed, contenting himself with protesting against that article at the same time he signed it, as he had writ word before he intended to do; and that therefore the Queen was entirely at liberty to reject it. Notwithstanding the King of Spain's former refusal, Lord Lexington is again directed to insist upon the Catalan privileges, and is again told, That the Queen thought herself obliged by the strongest ties, those of honour and conscience, to insist upon it for a people, whom the necessity of the war had obliged her to draw into her interest. His Lordship had signed the treaty with Spain before these orders to present another memorial arrived. He thereupon acquaints the Marquis de Bedmar, that he was sorry he was obliged to do any thing, which he knew was against the King's sentiments, but having received express orders, he must follow his duty, and presents the following memorial:

'The under-written Minister of the Queen of Great-Britain, in pursuance of the strict orders he received the last post, is obliged most humbly to renew the instances he has so frequently made to your Majesty in favour of the Catalans. The Queen orders him to represent, that she has nothing more at heart, than to obtain for these people the same privileges they formerly enjoyed, which she thinks herself obliged to do by the two strongest motives, that are possible, honour and conscience, that she may not leave a Nation, which the misfortune of war obliged her to draw into her interest, in a worse condition than she found them. She hopes, that after all the pains she has taken for procuring a solid and lasting peace to Europe, your Majesty will not leave her with the grief of having been the occasion of the loss of the privileges of that people; but rather, that in respect to the strict friendship, which with God's blessing is so near being established between your Majesties, as well as the Union so necessary to the interests of both Nations, your Majesty will not make any difficulty any longer, to grant this favour to her Majesty, which she has so much at heart.'

The Marquis de Bedmar's answer to this memorial was, That this point about the Catalans having been debated in the treaty lately concluded, and signed in this Court by his Excellency and himself, which his Excellency will own, and may be pleased to acknowledge, the King does not see, that any thing farther is to be done in the matter.

This treaty was sent to England, and ratified by the Queen. Lord Dartmouth says, in his letter to Lord Lexington, that Lord Bolingbroke had the principal share in the Negotiation; and that the article of the Catalans was put in as soft terms, as was consistent with the Queen's honour to allow.

The terms of the treaty are, That the Catalans shall have the same privileges as the King's best beloved subjects the Castilians enjoy.

When the King of Spain had received this convincing proof of our Ministry's attachment to his interests, and that the ties of the Queen's honour and conscience were of no force with them, when opposed to his desires, he takes a further step, and directly proposes to Lord Lexington, that the Queen would assist him with ships to block up Barcelona. His Lordship's answer was, That he was afraid this proposal would meet with this difficulty, That her Majesty would be very unwilling to lend her ships to exterminate a people that had taken up arms, in a great measure, at the instigation of her Ministers: And that she would think she had done enough to gratify the King, in not insisting upon the preserving for them their antient liberties, without helping to destroy them. But the regard the Ministry had to this request of the King, will afterwards appear.

The French Ambassador and the Princefs des Ursins, proposed to Lord Lexington, (and the night before he left Madrid, the King sent for him, and engaged him) to write a letter, concerted with him, and approved by the King, to the Regency of Barcelona, advising them to submit themselves to their King. His Lordship assures them of his constant endeavours to do the best he could for them: That God had not permitted him to do more than he had done: That if they would take their resolutions soon, before he was out of Spain, he would write for them in the manner they should desire: And concludes his letter with new assurances of his concern for their interest.

To make this appear the more friendly to them, he tells them, he had intrusted the Consul at Alicante to get this letter conveyed to them, upon some pretence or other; though a duplicate of it was also sent to the Count of Leobenraine, one of the King of Spain's Generals, before the town, with direction to have it sent in as by a deserter, without his knowledge.

Mr Burch, his Lordship's Secretary, amongst other reasons, gives this for the writing this letter, That if the Catalans had a mind to accommodate, the Queen would have the mediation: And if they had not, that then the Court of Spain would see, that her Majesty would be always ready to serve them.

But this artifice to induce the Catalans to abandon their defence, in hopes of his Lordship's good offices, had no effect upon men determined to die for the liberty of their Country. Nothing but force could extort that from them; and therefore Sir Patrick Lawless, in September 1713, presents a memorial to the same effect, with what was proposed the month before to Lord Lexington in Spain, setting forth, that the Catalans and Majorcans had not submitted themselves to the King's obedience, and interrupted all commerce and correspondence in the Mediterranean; and submits it to the consideration of the Queen, not only as guarantee of the treaty of evacuation, but as it concerned the interests of Great-Britain; and therefore his Catholic Majesty hopes, the Queen will order a Squadron of her ships to reduce his subjects to their obedience; and thereby compleat the Tranquillity of Spain, and of the Mediterranean commerce.

As soon as the season of the year would permit, a fleet is accordingly fitted out for the Mediterranean, under the command of Sir James Wylbart, whose first instructions bear date the 28th of February, and the additional 18th of March 1713-14; by which he is ordered to enforce a strict obedience to the treaty of evacuation in all its parts, upon any complaints of the Queen's subjects, of interrupting of commerce or depredations by the vessels of Catalonia, Majorca, Sardinia, Naples, and other places, to demand restitution; and, in case of a refusal, to make reprisals: To repair with the fleet before Barcelona, then besieged by the enemy, and demand immediate payment of the value of the Queen's stores in the town, or a sufficient security for payment in some reasonable time: To take care to time his arrival before the town, according to the advices from Lord Bingley, then designed to be sent to Spain: By the strongest representations to induce the Regency of Barcelona to accept of the terms, that shall be obtained for them: To take all the necessary measures, pursuant to the Queen's intentions, to put an end to the confusions that now reign in those parts: And all proper methods of persuasion to induce the inhabitants of Majorca to submit to the terms that shall be offered them; and, in case of refusal, to employ his squadron in countenancing and assisting all attempts, which may be made for reducing them to a due obedience.

It may be observed here,

1. That although the Queen had engaged herself by the treaty of evacuation, to employ her good offices in the most effectual manner, to obtain the Catalans their liberties; yet instead thereof, the most effectual methods were used to the contrary; and Mr Prior acquainted Monsieur de Torcy, that the Queen was assured, the Catalans would submit upon the terms before offered by the King of Spain, without so much as mentioning their antient privileges any more.

2. That the French King, who had put himself under the same obligation as the Queen by that treaty, after this account from Mr Prior of the Queen's sentiments, thought fit also not to ask for their privileges; Mr de Torcy also alledging, that the King had little interest with the Court of Spain.

3. That Britain was under the same engagements by that treaty, to support the privileges of Majorca, as those of Catalonia, at the time Sir James Wilsbart had direct orders to attack them.

4. That when those rigorous measures were forming against the Catalans, Lord Bolingbroke writes word to Mr Prior, 'That by what we observe in the Catalan Agent here, of whom we have never taken the least notice as a public man, it is pretty plain, that a reasonable accommodation might be made, as he expresses it, with that turbulent people.' What was called turbulency in the Catalans, may appear by their answer to the Duke of Popoli, the King of Spain's General, who summoned them to surrender. They told him, they would die rather than be slaves; but if their antient liberties were confirmed to them, they would open their gates, and receive him with all gladness.

The House of Lords expressed their concern in a public manner for the miseries of the Catalans; and by their address to the Queen, April 3, 1714, made it their most humble and earnest request to her Majesty, 'That she would be graciously pleased to continue her interposition in the most pressing manner, that the Catalans may have the full enjoyment of their just and antient privileges continued to them.' Her Majesty's answer was, 'That at the time she concluded her peace with Spain, she resolved to use her interposition upon every occasion, for obtaining those liberties, and to prevent, if possible, the misfortunes to which that people are exposed by the conduct of those more nearly concerned to help them.'

Hereupon, for form's sake, and to allay the indignation conceived against the Ministry by the people in general, who compassionated the calamities of those who fought for liberty; the demand of the Catalan privileges is again put down in Lord Bingley's instruction, who was before ordered to go to Spain, but was never sent. So that the only favour obtained from the Ministry by this earnest address of the House of Lords in behalf of the Catalans, was an intimation sent by Lord Bolingbroke to the Admiral, not to appear before Barcelona, nor to attack the Majorcans, till he should hear from Lord Bingley, and receive directions from England: And also a letter from his Lordship to Mr Grimaldo, above two months after the address, though the town was invested at the time of making it, wherein he makes a kind and friendly complaint, as he terms it, that the Catalan privileges had not been yet granted them, nor any reasonable terms offered, which they must either have accepted, or forfeited the Queen's compassion, and that of the whole world.

The Admiral had also his scruples, whether his orders, couched in ambiguous terms, would justify him in attacking Barcelona. He therefore writes to Lord Bolingbroke and Lord Bingley upon it, and submits it to Lord Bingley's consideration, whether the Catalans might not refuse conditions, that may be most advantageous, if they find he is not to act by force; and desires, that his orders to act before Barcelona, either by force or otherwise, may be very plain and clear; assuring him, that he will most punctually obey those already given him, and such as he shall hereafter receive.

When Sir James Wilsbart arrived at Cádiz, he gave the Governor a list of the ships under his command for the Mediterranean service, who sent it immediately to Madrid: But though several messages came from Court to the Governor during the Admiral's stay there, no one compliment was made him, to signify his arrival was welcome, or any question asked about what services he was to perform; which a little surprized him: That as soon as they had an account at Madrid of his arrival at Cádiz, Mr Orry was dispatched to Catalonia with full power to treat with the Catalans: 'So that, says he, it would appear, that though the King of Spain has all the advantages of the Queen's ships, as much as if they were actually before Barcelona, by representing to those people, which they very well knew, our arrival in those parts, and how far we are on our way to the Mediterranean; yet the King would not seem to owe the success of such agreement to the Queen and her ships, but to France only.'

But this Negotiation of Mr Orry failing of success, by the Catalans refusing to submit, without having their liberties granted them, obliged the Court of Spain to take more notice, than otherwise they were inclined to do, of the Admiral, who, from Alicant, writes to Lord Bingley, then expected at Madrid. That he had received a very civil letter from Mr Grimaldo, who sent him the King's orders for exempting the provisions for the fleet from paying any duty. He tells him, That this exemption was usually granted to the Admiral himself, that commanded; but, being a trifle, he submits it to his Lordship's better judgment, whether the granting him this might not be a means to prevent any thing that might be intended by the Court of Madrid more to his advantage; and leaves it to his Lordship's consideration, what may be most for his interest at that place; and hopes, by his friendship, to find some marks of favour from thence, in regard to his expence in this expedition, so much intended for their service, and for which he has no allowance from home but his pay, which will not defray half his charges.

In another letter of Sir James Wilsbart to Lord Bingley, he acquaints his Lordship, that though he had formerly desired him to move the King of Spain, that the grant of exemption of duties for provisions for the fleet might be made to himself; yet, upon farther consideration of the matter, which is but of small moment, and may appear greater at the Court of Spain and England

England than really it is, he desires his Excellency not to take any notice of it, but let it stand as it does; and desires his countenance and assistance upon any other occasion, that the Court of Madrid might take to express their good-will to him. Nor was it long before the Admiral gave the Court of Spain more particular proofs, that he was not unworthy of their expected favours.

After Barcelona had been invested a considerable time by the Spaniards, and reduced to great difficulties for want of provisions, the French King, though engaged with the Queen by the treaty of evacuation, to employ his good offices in the most effectual manner, in favour of the Catalan liberties, thought fit to send his troops against them, commanded by Marshal Berwick, who opened the trenches before Barcelona the 1st of July, O. S. 1714. And, on the 8th of the same month, Sir James Walsart, in the Queen's name, writ them a threatening letter, directed to the Deputies, and others, who possessed the Government there, telling them, that complaints had been made of their disturbing the commerce of the Queen's subjects; and that they had insolently presumed to take, carry up, and plunder their ships, and used the men in a barbarous manner: He had therefore thought fit to send Captain Gordon with two men of war, to represent to them these unwarrantable and presumptuous proceedings; and by the Queen's command demands immediate satisfaction for the same, and the punishment of the Officers of the ships with the utmost severity. If this be not punctually complied with, he leaves it to themselves to judge what the consequences may be.

The Deputies returned answer, 'That only one of those vessels, mentioned in Captain Gordon's memorial, was taken by them into Barcelona, being laden with salt, for which they paid the price immediately to the Captain of it: That being besieged, they thought they might do so with justice. and by the law of Nations: That they were so far from living like pirates, as their enemies suggested, in order to distress them, by preventing any one's coming with provisions for their relief: That what English vessels had entered their ports with provisions, had been well treated, and had freely sold their merchandize, and at a higher price, than they could have got any where else: That they had paid them with their best sort of money, and to all their satisfactions: That they had that day published an order, forbidding, upon pain of death, any of their ships to molest any English, even though they were going with provisions to the enemy. They hoped his Excellency will be satisfied with their conduct, which is conformable to the rights of people, that are besieged; assuring him, that when they know any of their ships, either with Commission, or without, that shall have caused the least damage to any English, they will not only immediately inflict a rigorous punishment, but repair all the damage, desiring to live in the good correspondence they have had with this noble and generous Nation, with the utmost deference for the Queen, and ready to obey his Excellency's orders with all affection and respect.'

nia entered into to receive Charles the Third for their King, was founded on the protection of the High Allies, but most particularly of England, without which they were not capable of undertaking so great an enterprise. That they had, for seven years together, endeavoured to serve the English Nation in every thing it was possible for them to do, by contributing troops and considerable sums of money without interest. And though they had pleased themselves with the thoughts of the happiness to be always subjects of Charles III, yet by the ordinary change, to which human affairs are liable, they now see the troops of the Duke of Anjou, aided by the French, Masters of all the Principality, except Barcelona and Cardona, committing through the whole the most execrable hostilities, burnings, and plunderings, without sparing the effusion of innocent blood, and without distinction of age or sex. That for a year together the enemy's army had oppressed Barcelona by sea and land, making them continually suffer the calamity of so long a blockade, during which time the enemies have thrown fourteen thousand bombs into the town; which have ruined the greatest part of the houses: That now they expect to be attacked in form, and that in twenty-four hours the town will be battered in breach. They cannot express their affliction, to see the danger of the Inhabitants exposed to be victims of that cruelty, with which the enemy threatens to treat them. Having no comfort left, they fly to the Queen of Great-Britain, beseeching her protection by the enclosed letter to Don Dalmases, their Envoy at London; and, in the mean time, till an answer can come, they beseech his Excellency, from their souls, to mediate with the French troops, who oppressed them, for a suspension of arms, since the congress at Baden, now sitting, to conclude of a general peace, may still determine this affair: They doubt not, that his mediation will be able to procure them this relief, since his Squadron is superior to that of the enemy. They see no other remedy in nature for their misfortunes; and therefore hope his Excellency will not refuse them: That if Catalonia has merited any thing by its services, and by its conjunction with the English Nation, this is the time to receive the fruits of it: That it is worthy of his Excellency to comfort the afflicted, and not to deny them this favour in their great necessity.'

How the Admiral was affected with this letter, appears by one of his to Lord Bingley, dated Aug. 7, 1714, wherein he acquaints him, 'That Mr Grimaldo had signified to him from the King of Spain, that all the King's ships of war being employed before Barcelona, his Majesty could not send any of them to meet his Flota then coming home; and therefore desired the Admiral to send three of his upon that service;' which was accordingly complied with. Of this he had acquainted Lord Bolingbroke, and hoped to meet with her Majesty's approbation.

The Catalans thus abandoned and given up to their enemies, contrary to faith and honour, were not, however, wanting to their own defence; but appealing to Heaven, and hanging up at the High Altar the Queen's solemn declaration to protect them, underwent the utmost miseries of a siege; during which multitudes perished by famine and the sword, many were afterwards afterwards executed, and many persons of figure were dispersed about the Spanish Dominions in dungeons.

III. The Lord Oxford's Letter to the Queen,
June 9, 1714.

May it please your Majesty,

I Presume, in obedience to your Royal command, to lay before your Majesty a state of your affairs. Though I have very much contracted it from the draught I made, and the vouchers from whence it is taken, yet I find it swell under my pen in transcribing, being willing to put every thing before your Majesty in the clearest light my poor understanding can attain to. It was necessary to lay it before your Majesty in the series of time, from the beginning to this present time; and when that is completely laid before you, it remains only for me to beg God to direct your Majesty.

And as to myself, do with me what you please; place me either as a figure, or a cypher; displace me or replace me, as that best serves your Majesty's occasions, you shall ever find me, with the utmost devotion, and without any reserve,

M A D A M,

Your most dutiful, most faithful, most humble, most obedient subject, and unworthy servant,

O X F O R D.

A brief account of public affairs, since Aug. 8, 1710, to this present 8th of June, 1714. To which is added, the state of affairs abroad, as they relate to this Kingdom; with some humble proposals for securing the future tranquillity of her Majesty's Reign, and the safety of her Kingdoms.

Her Majesty, on the 8th of August 1710, was pleased to alter her Treasury, and two days after, in a new Commission, Robert Harley, by her Majesty's great favour, was made Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The state of affairs at home and abroad are fresh in every one's memory.

The condition of the Treasury at that time was laid before her Majesty in a large representation.

I beg leave to touch some few heads: The army was in the field, no money in the Treasury; none of the Remitters would contract again; the Bank had refused to lend a hundred thousand pounds to Lord Gadolphin, on very good security; the Navy, and others branches of service, eleven millions in debt, which enhanced the price of every thing proportionably; the Civil List in debt about six hundred thousand pounds; and the yearly income too little for the current certain expence, by the lowest computation, one hundred twenty-four thousand, four hundred ninety-five pounds, two shillings and four-pence.

In a few days this new Commission made provision for paying the army, by the greatest remittance that had ever been known: Though the opposition from every office, which was full of persons who were enemies to the change made by the Queen, was very strong, and very troublesome and vexatious: And such was the situation of affairs, that nothing but great patience could ever have overcome these difficulties; it being impossible, as well as unavoidable, to make removes, but by degrees.

As soon as it was possible (and notwithstanding the clamours then raised, it was the only proper time) a new Parliament is called.

Its first meeting was November 27, 1710. Robert Harley had prepared the funds ready (before the Parliament met, as he had done every Session to this day) not only for the current service of the year, both by sea and land, but also for easing the Nation of above nine millions of debt. This was thought so chimerical, when Robert Harley did begin to open it, that it was treated with ridicule, until he showed how practicable it was. It is true, this gave great reputation abroad, and enabled to treat advantageously of a peace. It raised sinking credit at home; but, at the same time, as it drew envy upon Harley from some, and the rage of others, so it gave offence to some of his fellow-servants, who told him plainly, that he ought to have told his secret, and if he would not get money himself, he ought to have let his friends share a hundred thousand pounds, which would not have been felt, or found out, in so vast a sum as nine or ten millions.

To this principle was owing the setting on foot at this time the unhappy voyage to Canada; to all which meetings Harley avoiding coming, and gave Lord Rochester his reasons; and after he desired his Lordship to be a means to the Queen, to hinder that expedition, but it happened to be too late. But Lady Masham knows how much Harley was concerned at it, though he did not know the true spring of that voyage, which will appear after in this paper.

The beginning of February 1710-11, there began to be a division among those called Tories in the House, and Mr Secretary St John thought it convenient to be lifting a separate party for himself.

To prevent this, Lord Rochester and Harley desired to have a meeting, and to cool such rash attempts; and it was contrived Mr Secretary St John should invite us to dinner (which was the last time he ever invited Robert Harley, being now above three years) where was the Duke of Shrewsbury, Earl Poulet, Lord Rochester, and others; and Lord Rochester took the pains to calm the spirit of division and ambition.

Harley was at this time seized by a violent fever; and on his first coming abroad, March 8, met with a misfortune which confined him many weeks. The transactions during that time, are too public, as well as too black, for Harley to remember or to mention.

In the end of May, 1711, the Queen, out of her abounded goodness, was pleased to confer undeserved honours on Robert Harley; and, on the 29th of the same month, was pleased to put the Treasurer's Staff into his hands: A post so much above Harley's abilities to struggle with, that he had nothing but integrity and duty to recommend him to her Majesty's choice; so he must have recourse to her Majesty's transcendent goodness and mercy to pardon all his faults and failings, both of omission and commission, during the whole course of his service.

But

But to return and resume the thread of this discourse. The 4th of June 1711, three days after the Treasurer was sworn, he was surprized with a demand of twenty-eight thousand thirty-six pounds and five shillings, for arms and merchandize, said to be sent to Canada. When the Treasurer scrupled this, Mr Secretary St John and Mr Moore came to him with much passion upon this affair; and, about a fortnight after, the Secretary of State signified the Queen's positive pleasure to have that money paid: And accordingly her Majesty signed a warrant, June 21, and the Treasure not being able then, with all his precaution, to discover further light, the money was paid, July 4, 1711.

Since the return from that expedition, the secret is discovered, and the Treasurer's suspicion justified: For the public was cheated of above twenty thousand pounds.

There is reason to be more particular upon this head, because it is one of the things never to be forgiven the Treasurer; and Lord-Chancellor told him more to that purpose, that they told him no Government was worth serving, that would not let them make those advantages, and get such jobs.

One thing more is craved leave to be added, That the Treasurer was forced to use all his skill and credit to keep the House of Commons from examining this affair last Parliament.

June the 12, 1712, the first Session of last Parliament ended.

From this time, to the beginning of the next Session, the Treasurer's hands were full of negotiating the peace in all Courts abroad; and besides the ordinary and necessary duty of his office at home, he had frequent occasions of calming the quarrels and grudges Mr Secretary had sometimes against Lord Dartmouth, sometimes against Lady Masham, and sometimes against the Treasurer himself.

The second Session of the last Parliament began December the 7th, 1711.

This was attended with great difficulties and dangers, as well from the practices of the discontented here, as the designs carried on by Mr Buyt, Prince Eugene, and Boikmar; in which designs concurred the Emperor, and other States and Princes who gained by the war.

This put her Majesty under a sort of necessity to preserve the whole, and to take a method which had been used, to create some new Peers.

So many have been brought formerly out of the House of Commons, of those who used to manage public affairs, it was proposed to Mr Secretary, That if he would be contented to stay in the House of Commons that Sessions, her Majesty would have the goodness to create him a Peer, and that he should not lose his rank.

The second Session ended the 21st of June, 1712, and notwithstanding Boikmar's memorial, and all other attacks both from abroad and at home, Supplies were provided, and every thing relating to the Public put upon a good foot, and the Malecontents began to despair, as appeared by the Duke of Marlborough's retiring abroad, and other particulars.

After the Session was ended, the Queen, as she had promised, ordered a warrant for Mr Secretary St John to be a Viscount: This happened to put him in the utmost rage against the Treasurer, Lady Masham, and without sparing the Greatest.

It did avail very little to tell him how much he had got in place; for had he been created with the other Lords, it would have fallen to his share to have come next after Lord Trevor: But the Treasurer, with great patience, bore all the storm, of which Lord Masham was often a witness of the outrageous speeches; and Mr Moore very lately told the Treasurer, that Lord Bolingbroke said very lately to him, that he owed him a revenge upon that head.

This discontent continued, until there happened an opportunity of sending him to France; of which there was not much occasion: But it was hoped, that this would have put him in good humour; which it did, until in October 1712, there were Knights of the Garter made.

This created a new disturbance, which is too well remembered, and breaks out now very often in outrageous expressions publicly against all then made.

In November, on the death of Duke Hamilton, he was much against Duke Shrewsbury's going, for reasons very plain, which then were in Negotiation: For before the last Session of that Parliament began, a new model was framed, or a scheme of Ministry; which how they afterwards came to fall out, will appear in its due place.

The third and last Session began April the 9th, 1713; which was as soon as the peace was concluded, and could be proclaimed.

It is not decent to take notice, That during this whole Negotiation, the Treasurer was obliged, by his own hand, and his own charge, to correspond in all the Courts concerned in the Negotiation; and very often he had the good luck to set right several mistakes, and to obtain some things very little expected: But the only merit of this belongs to her Majesty, the credit of whose favour brought it about, and gave power to the Treasurer to act with success.

During this Session, the Lords of the Cabinet, and others, met every Saturday at the Treasurer's, in order to carry on the Queen's business, as they had done the year before on Thursday's. Many offers were made, and repeated by the Treasurer, in order to attack former offenders, and quiet the minds of the Gentlemen, and of the Church-party; and the only reason for this failing, was, because of the project laid for their new scheme, and putting themselves at the head, as they called it, of the Church-party.

This being the last Session of Parliament, and some Gentlemen fearing their elections, and some for other reasons, dropt the bill of Commerce.

The Treasurer saw this opportunity, and immediately took it, and prevailed with Sir Thomas Hammer, and others, to come into the payment of the civil list debts, incurred before the change of the Treasury, though the present Treasurer was railed at, and maligned; which he chose to bear patiently, rather than own the true reason, that there was no money to do it with, which would have ruined all at once.

This step of paying the debts, put the Malecontented into the utmost rage, which they did very publicly express in both Houses.

This last Session of that Parliament, and the third since the change of the Ministry, ended July the 16, 1713.

The peace with France being over, and it growing necessary to put her Majesty's affairs into a further and more settled regulation, and to ease the Treasurer of the burthen, as well as envy, of such a bulk of business: Her Majesty was pleased to approve of the scheme of the Duke of Ormond's staying here to attend the army affairs, which was necessary at the time of disbanding; Duke Shrewsbury to go to Ireland, upon his return from France; Lord Findlater to be Chancellor of Scotland; Lord Mar third Secretary; Lord Dartmouth Privy-Seal, and Mr Bromley Secretary of State, and Sir William Wyndham Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am sure the Queen very well remembers the rage this caused, as perfectly defeating their scheme, and shewing that her Majesty would put her affairs upon a solid foot: The Lord-Chancellor said it was against law, and to this day will not treat Lord Findlater with decency; and Lord Mar has met with many ill treatments, as well as Mr Secretary Bromley.

But that the Treasurer might leave them without excuse, and make her Majesty's affairs, if possible, easy with and to those in her service; as soon as he was recovered enough to write, he wrote a large letter to Lord Bolingbroke, containing his scheme of the Queen's affairs, and what was necessary for Lord Bolingbroke to do, as belonging only to his province. This letter was dated July the 25th, 1713, and was answered July the 27th, by Lord Bolingbroke; the copy was shewn to Lady Majbam, who came to visit the Treasurer then confined to his chamber; and she then thought it a very good one, and what was proper for the occasion. I believe the whole would be of use to give light to her Majesty into the ground and foundation of the follies and madnefs which have since appeared; the whole is ready for her Majesty's perusal when she pleases.

In this letter the Treasurer gives an account to Lord Bolingbroke of the occasions, or rather the pretences, for giving disturbance to the Queen's servants. He proposes the remedy, and what was requisite to be done by him as Secretary in his own province, and also assurance of the Treasurer's assistance to the utmost, and of his desire to consult with him (Lord Bolingbroke) how to unite the rest of our friends.

Being then sick, the Treasurer took the liberty to put Lord Bolingbroke in mind of the several particulars which then required dispatch, and were solely belonging to his province, without any other interposition than that of taking your Majesty's direction.

Amongst others, that of a circular letter upon the addresses of both Houses, relating to the Pretender.

This was not done in three months. His Lordship wrote word it was done July the 27th.

In the same letter the Treasurer proposed, that (according to the treaty of peace) care should be taken of the following particulars, viz. Newfoundland, Hudson's-Bay, Acadia, St Christopher's, Assiento, and other things contained in the treaties of Commerce.

These particulars the Treasurer thought to have been executed, until within a few weeks he heard the contrary by accident, and that the time in the several treaties was elapsed. Upon this, the Treasurer on Wednesday, June the 2d, told Mr Moore of this, and that every body would be liable to blame who are in the Queen's service. Thursday, June the 3d, 1714, Lord Bolingbroke writes to the Treasurer a letter, which begins thus:

'Mr Moore has been this morning with me, and has put into my hands a paper, which he calls, I think not improperly, a charge upon me.'

This paper contains the neglect above-mentioned in the Treasurer's letter, of July the 25th, 1713, and yet those faults are now charged upon the Treasurer.

From this account it is observable, that the Earl of Oxford took to himself the credit of corresponding with his own hand, and at his own charge, in all the Courts concerned in the Negotiations of peace, and that very often he had the good luck to set right several mistakes, and obtain some things little expected: That he boasted of his laying hold of a seasonable opportunity in Parliament, upon rejecting the bill of Commerce, to prevail with Members of the House of Commons to come into the payment of the Civil List debts; and also charged several persons, then in high stations, with corruption, and embezzlement of the public money; and recommended himself to the Queen, by having used all his skill and credit to keep the House of Commons from examining into the same. The Committee of Secrecy having received information, that large sums of money had been directed for special services relating to the war, by signs-manual, and warrants upon the same, countersigned by the Earl, which sums were afterwards paid to his order, the Committee thought it incumbent upon them to lay before the House copies of these signs-manual and warrants, and orders thereupon, together with extracts from the register of the Exchequer, by which it appeared, that these large sums issued for the service of the war, were received and applied to the Earl's private use.

IV. A letter from the States-General to the Queen of Great-Britain, &c. dated Hague, June 5, 1712, N. S.

MADAM,

AFTER all the proofs which your Majesty has given during the course of your glorious Reign, of your great zeal for the Public Good, and of your adherence to the Common Cause of the High Allies; after so many marks you have had the goodness to give us, of your tender affection, and of your Friendship to our Republic; and after the repeated assurances you have given us, and that very lately too, of your intentions, that your troops should act against the common enemy, until the war was concluded by a general peace: It is impossible we should not be surprized and afflicted by two declarations we have lately received, one after another, in the name of your Majesty; the first by the Duke of Ormond your General, that 'he could undertake nothing without new orders from you;' the other by the Bishop of Bristol, your Plenipotentiary to the Congress at Utrecht, 'That your Majesty perceiving that we did not answer as we ought, the proposals which you had made us, and that we would not act in concert with your Ministers on the subject of peace,

you would take your measures apart: And that you did not look upon yourself to be now under any obligation whatever, with respect to us.

As soon as we had notice of those declarations, we sent orders to our Minister, who has the honour to reside at your Majesty's Court, to represent to you the reasons of our surprize, and the consequences of those declarations; and to request you with that respect which we always had, and which we shall for ever entertain for your Royal person, that you would give other orders to the Duke of Ormond, that he may act with all possible vigour, according to the exigency of the war; and that your Majesty would have the goodness to entertain other sentiments of us, than those which the Bishop of Bristol had declared to our Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht.

But the more we consider those declarations, the more important we find them, and the more we apprehend their consequences: Therefore we could not forbear applying ourselves by this letter directly to your Majesty, hoping that you will consider it, as we promise ourselves you will, both from your great prudence and wisdom, and from your so much famed zeal for the public welfare; particularly from your usual friendship and affection for us and our Republic.

We protest before all things, that as we ever had a true friendship, as well as the highest respect for your Majesty, and a sincere affection to all your interests, with an earnest desire to live in a perfect good understanding and union with you; we have still the same sentiments, and shall always preserve them, wishing for nothing more, than to be able to give your Majesty the most convincing proofs of it.

After this, we pray your Majesty to consider, according to your great penetration, whether we have not just ground to be surprized, when we see a stop put, by an order in your Majesty's name, without our knowledge, to the operations of the Confederate army, the finest and strongest which perhaps has been in the field, during the whole course of the war, and provided with all necessaries to act with vigour; and this, after they had marched, according to the resolution taken in concert with your Majesty's General, almost up to the enemy, with a great superiority, both as to the number and goodness of troops, and animated with a noble courage and zeal to acquit themselves bravely; so that, in all human appearance, and with the Divine Assistance, which we have experienced so visibly on so many other occasions, we should have been able, either by battle or sieges, to gain great advantages over the enemy, to have bettered the Affairs of the Allies, and to facilitate the Negotiations of Peace.

We flatter ourselves indeed with the hopes, which the Duke of Ormond has given us, That in a few days he expects other orders; but in the mean time, we are sorry to see one of the finest opportunities lost, being uncertain whether we shall have another so favourable, since the enemy have time given them to fortify themselves, and take their precautions, while the army of the Allies lies still without action; and, consuming the forage all round, deprive themselves of the means of subsisting for time to come, in those places where, by concert, the operations of the campaign were designed; which may make such enterprizes impossible hereafter, as were practicable now, and consequently render the whole campaign unsuccessful, to the inestimable prejudice of the common cause of the High Allies.

Certainly when we consider the army as it really is, composed of the troops of your Majesty and the other Allies, joined together by common concert, to act for the greatest advantage and furtherance of the Common Cause, and the assurances which your Majesty had given us by your Letters, by your Ministers, and last of all, by your General the Duke of Ormond, of 'your intentions that your troops should be ordered to act with their usual vigour,' as well as the engagements into which your Majesty is entered, not only with respect to us, but also separately and jointly with us, in respect to the other Allies; it is very difficult for us to conjecture and conceive, how an order so prejudicial to the common cause, given so suddenly, without our knowledge, and undoubtedly too without the knowledge of the other Allies, can agree and consist with the nature of an Alliance, and with those assurances and engagements just now mentioned. For though, according to the declaration of the Bishop of Bristol, your Majesty holds yourself to be disengaged from every obligation with regard to us, it is plain, that the matter now in question is not our particular interest or advantage, but that of all the Allies, who will suffer by the prejudice, which an order so little expected must needs bring to the Common Cause.

But, Madam, we cannot forbear telling your Majesty, that the declaration made by the Bishop of Bristol, at Utrecht, has no less surprized us, than that of the Duke of Ormond in the army. It appears to us so extraordinary, that we know not how to reconcile it with the great goodness and kindness which your Majesty has always honoured us with; and not being able to conceive how such a sudden change could happen, with respect to us, we are not only surprized, but afflicted at it. We have carefully examined our conduct, and find nothing in it, that can have given ground to that dissatisfaction which your Majesty expresses with us, by this declaration.

From the very first day that your Majesty ascended the Throne, we testified all the deference that you could desire from a State in friendship and alliance with you. We carefully sought after your amity and affection, and considering the happy effects which a good intelligence, harmony, and union between your Majesty and us, and the two Nations, might produce, and have really produced, and the advantage which resulted from thence to both, as well as to the common cause of all the Allies, we made it our business heartily to cultivate them, and more and more to gain your Majesty's confidence, and to conform ourselves to your sentiments as much as possibly we could.

We think that we gave a signal proof of this, particularly with regard to the Negotiations of peace; since not only after we were informed of the Conferences formerly held in England upon this subject, we did expect that your Majesty would give us an account of them; having this firm confidence in your friendship for our Republic, and in your zeal for the Good of the Common Cause, that nothing would be done to prejudice us, nor the other Allies: But also when your Majesty communicated to us the preliminary nary articles signed by M. Mefnager in England, and when you propofed to us the calling and holding a Congress for a general peace, and required of us to grant for this end necessary paffports for the enemies Minifters, we confented to it, though we had many reasons, which to us feemed very well grounded, not to enter into fuch a treaty without a better foundation, or at leaft without the concurrence of the other Allies; but we preferred your Majesty's sentiments to our own, in order to give you a new proof of our deference.

We did no lefs, with refpect to the difficulties which were started on the fubject of the treaty of mutual guaranty for the Succeffion of the Proteftant line to your Majesty's Kingdoms, and for our Barrier; a treaty of fuch importance to the two Nations, that we look upon it as the ftrongeft tie that could be thought on to unite for ever the hearts and interefts of both, concluded after the matureft deliberation, and ratified on both fides in the moft authentic form: For though we might have flood to the treaty as it was, yet we entered into a Negotiation upon thofe difficulties, and particularly on the point of the Affiento, concerning which, we gave our Plenipotentiaries fuch inftructions, that we no longer doubted but all the difficulties would have been adjusted to mutual content, and that we fhould thereby have entirely regained your Majesty's confidence; and the rather, becaufe, in the firft place, when the meeting of a Congress for a general peace was in hand, your Majesty declared to us by your Ambaffador, 'That you defired no more than our concurrence in that fingle point, and this only mark of our confidence, and that then you would give us ftrong and real proofs of your affection towards us, and of your upright intentions, with refpect to the common caufe of all the Allies;' and that afterwards, when the difficulties about the Succeffion and the Barrier were raifed, your Majesty did likewife affure us, that if we would remit fomething upon the moft effential points, and particularly about the affair of the Affiento, it would be the true way to re-eftablifh a mutual confidence; which being once reftored, your Majesty would take particularly to heart the interefts of this State, and act in conjunction with us in the whole Negotiation, to obtain an honourable, good, and fure peace.

But we find ourfelves very much out in our expectation, fince, at the very fame time, when we made the greateft advances towards your Majesty, and that we did verily believe we fhould come to an agreement about the points in difference, we fee the Earl of Strafford gone, without finifhing that affair; we fee the army ftopped in the beginning of its career; and we hear a declaration, by which your Majesty looks upon yourfelf to be difengaged from all obligations with us; for which the reasons alledged are, 'That we have not answered as we ought, the advances which your Majesty made towards us, and that we would not act in concert with your Minifters about the peace.'

If your Majesty will be pleafed to look with a favourable and equitable eye upon our conduct, we flatter ourfelves, and have a firm confidence, that you will find nothing in it which can give you fuch difadvantageous ideas and thoughts of us; but that you will rather find, that we have performed and do, ftill perform all that we are bound to, as good and faithful Allies; and particularly to your Majesty.

What we have faid already, might perhaps be fufficient to perfuade you of it; but we mult add, that having always efteemed your Majesty's affection, and a good harmony betwixt the two Nations, as one of the ftrongeft fupports of our State, and of the Proteftant Religion, and as one of the moft effectual methods to maintain and advance our common interefts, and thofe of the whole Confederacy; and this fincere opinion being firmly imprinted on our hearts, we were never backward to communicate and confult in all confidence with your Majesty and your Minifters, upon the affairs of peace, according to the foundations laid down in the Grand Alliance and other Treaties. We declare, that we have always been inclinable and ready to do it; and are fo ftill, as far as we can, without prejudice to the other Allies, and without departing from, or acting againft, the Engagements, Treaties, and Alliances which we have entered into.

But, Madam, all the propofals hitherto made to us upon that fubject, were couched in very general terms, without communicating to us the refult of the Negotiations betwixt your Majesty's Minifters and thofe of France, nor even your Majesty's thoughts about the fubject, which we ought to have concerted together. It is true, that in fome of the laft Conferences, your Majesty's Minifters demanded to know whether ours were furnifhed with a full power, and authorized to draw up a plan for the peace; but it had been juft, before fuch a thing was demanded of us, That they fhould have communicated the refult of the Negotiations, fo long treated of betwixt your Majesty's Minifters and thofe of the enemy; or, at leaft, they fhould have told us your Majesty's thoughts.

Had that plan related only to your Majesty's intereft and ours, we fhould perhaps have been in the wrong not to have forthwith come into it, though even in that cafe the affair would not have been without its difficulties, fince the leaft notice of it which fhould have come to the enemy, muft have been very prejudicial: But as the plan in queftion concerned the intereft of all the Allies, and almoft all Europe, we had very ftrong apprehenfions, That as the particular Negotiations betwixt your Majesty's Minifters and thofe of France, and the readinefs with which we confented to the Congress at Utrecht, and to the giving of paffports to the enemy's Minifters, had already occafioned abundance of fufpicions, and much uneafinefs to his Imperial Majesty, and the other Allies: We fay, we apprehended, that his Imperial Majesty, and the other Allies coming to know (which would have been very difficult to conceal from them) the concert betwixt your Majesty's Minifters and ours, for a plan of peace, and that before the Minifters of France had given a fpecific answer to the demands of the Allies, their fufpicions and uneafinefs would have increafed, and that way of proceeding might have given them ground to entertain prejudicial thoughts, as if it had been the intention of your Majesty and us, to abandon the Grand Alliance and the Common Caufe, or at leaft that we alone took upon us to determine the fate of all the other Allies; by which his Imperial Majesty and the other Confederates might have been pushed on to separate measures, and to take such steps as would be no ways agreeable to your Majesty's interest.

We thought these reasons strong enough to justify our conduct to your Majesty on this head; and if we did not enter with all the readiness which you might have wished for, into the concert proposed, we hope, that at most, your Majesty will look upon our backwardness, only as an excess of prudence, or of scruple, and not in the least as a want of confidence in your Majesty; while the Allies might have considered it as a departing from the treaties, and particularly from the eighth article of the Grand Alliance. We also hope that your Majesty, for the reasons here alleged, will lay aside those hard thoughts of us, as if we had not answered as we ought, the advances which your Majesty made towards us, and that we would not act in concert with your Ministers, upon the subject of the peace. But, Madam, though your Majesty should not acquiesce in our reasons (of which however we cannot doubt) we pray your Majesty to consider, Whether that be sufficient for your Majesty to think, that you are disengaged from all obligations with respect to us?

Had we acted against, and contravened the engagements and treaties which we had the honour to conclude with your Majesty, we might have expected from your goodness and justice, that you would have represented those Contraventions to us, and not have looked upon yourself to be disengaged, till such time as we had refused to give all necessary redress. But, as we did no ways engage to enter with your Majesty into a concert to draw up a plan of peace, without the participation of the other Members of the Grand Alliance, the backwardness we have shewn upon that head, cannot be looked upon as a contravention of our engagements, and therefore cannot serve to disengage your Majesty from your's, with respect to us, since we are verily persuaded, that we have fully answered all our treaties, and all our Alliances, both with your Majesty, and with the High Allies in general; and that we have done more in this present war, than could in justice and equity have been expected from us. All the difference betwixt your Majesty and us in this point, is no more, if rightly considered, than a disparity of sentiments.

and Religion, any one of those Potentates could quit all their engagements, and disengage themselves from all their obligations, there is no tie so strong, which may not be broke at any time; and we know of no engagements that could be relied on, in time to come.

We assure ourselves, that when your Majesty considers the consequences, you will not persist in the declaration which the Bishop of Bristol has made: We beseech you, with all the respect, and all the earnestness of which we are capable, that you would not; and also that you would be pleased to revoke the order given to the Duke of Ormond, if it be not revoked already; and that you would authorize him to act according to occurrences, and as the exigency of the war, and the advancement of the Common Cause shall require.

We also request you, Madam, to communicate to us the result of the Conferences betwixt your Ministers and those of the enemy, or at least your thoughts upon the peace, and we will endeavour to give your Majesty all imaginable proofs of our deference for your sentiments, and of our sincere desire to preserve your valuable friendship as much as we can, without acting contrary to the faith of the engagements into which we have entered, by Treaties and Alliances with your Majesty, and other Potentates.

We are firmly persuaded, that it is not your Majesty's intention in any manner to break them, since you have always been of the same opinion with us and the other Allies. That a good union betwixt the Allies, not only during the present war, but also after the peace shall be concluded, is, and always will be the most solid, and even the only method to preserve the liberty and independency of all together, and of every one in particular, against the great power of France.

We expect also, that after having given such great and signal proofs of your wisdom, of your firmness, and of your zeal for the support of the Common Cause, your Majesty will not now take such resolutions as may be prejudicial to us and to the other Allies; but that, in order to obtain an honourable, sure, and general peace, you will pursue the same methods, and keep to the same maxims which you formerly held, and which Almighty God hath blessed in so remarkable a manner, by victories and great events, which will render the glory of your Majesty's Reign immortal (1).

(1) To these papers it may be proper to add extracts of the Treaties of Utrecht.

I. Between Great-Britain and France.

I. Perpetual peace and true friendship.

II. Cessation of all hostilities.

III. All offences, damages, &c. shall be buried in oblivion.

IV. The most Christian King acknowledges the limitation of the Succession to the Kingdom of Great-Britain, in the Protestant Line, and on the faith, word, and honour of a King, declares, He and his Heirs shall accept and approve the same for ever; and promises, that no one besides the Queen and her Successors, according to the said limitation, shall ever, by Him or his Successors, be acknowledged King or Queen of Great-Britain; and that he and his Heirs will take all possible care, that the Person, who, since the decease of King James, did take upon him the title of King of Great-Britain, shall not, at any time hereafter, return into the Kingdom of France, or any the Dominions thereof.

V. The most Christian King promises, for Himself and Heirs, that they will at no time disturb the Queen of Great-Britain, her Heirs and Successors of the Protestant line, nor give any aid, favour, or counsel, directly or indirectly, by land or sea, in money, arms, ammunition, stores, ships, soldiers, or any other way, to any person who should oppose the Protestant Succession.

VI. The Union of France and Spain being the chief foundation of the war, it is provided and settled by renunciations, that these Kingdoms shall never be joined in one*. The most Christian King engages, that

* In this article are included, I. The French King's letters patents, which admit the renunciations of the King of Spain, and those of the Dukes of Berry and Orleans. II. The King of Spain's renunciation. III. The Duke of Berry's renunciation. IV. The Duke of Orleans's renunciation. V. The French King's letters patent of December 1700.

that he will not endeavour to obtain any usage of navigation and trade to Spain and the Spanish Indies, than what was practised in the Reign of Charles II. of Spain, or than what shall be granted to other Nations.

VII. Free Navigation and Commerce, as before the war, and as agreed by the treaty of Commerce this day made between the two Nations.

VIII. That the ordinary distribution of justice be opened, so that the subjects of both sides may sue for, and obtain their rights, according to the laws of each Kingdom.

IX. The most Christian King shall take care, that the fortifications of Dunkirk, towards the sea, be razed within two months; and those towards the land within three months, and the harbour be filled up, and the sluices or moles levelled at the King's expence; and that the fortifications, harbours, and moles be never repaired again. All which, however, shall not begin to be ruined, till every thing is put into his hands which is to be given him instead thereof, or an equivalent.

X. Hudon's Bay shall be restored to the Queen of Great-Britain.

XI. All damages to the Hudon's Bay Company, by depredations of the French in time of peace, shall be satisfied, according to the estimates of Commissaries to be named at the requisition of each party. The same concerning the damages last year in the Island of Montserrat, and concerning the things complained of by the French, relating to Nevis, and Castle of Gambia.

XII. The Island of St Christopher, all Nova Scotia or Acadia, Port Royal or Annapolis, shall be delivered to the English, and the French excluded from all kind of fishing in the seas, bays, or other places on the coasts of Nova Scotia; that is, on those lying towards the East, within thirty leagues, beginning from Sable-Island, and thence stretching along towards the South-west.

XIII. Newfoundland, and the adjacent Islands shall belong wholly to Britain; and the town and fortresses of Placentia shall be delivered up within seven months. Only it shall be allowed to the French to catch fish, and dry them on land from Cape Bonaville, round northward to Point Riche. But the Island of Cape Breton, as also all others, both in the mouth of the river, and gulph of St Lawrence, shall belong to the French.

XIV. A year shall be allowed to the French to remove and carry off their effects, from the places to be yielded up by this treaty, and the free exercise of their Religion, to those that are willing to remain there.

XV. The French of Canada shall give no molestation to the five Nations of Indians, subject to Britain; and the English shall behave peaceably to the Americans, friends of France, and on both sides they shall enjoy full liberty of going and coming on account of trade.

XVI. All letters of reprisal and marque shall be recalled, and none granted hereafter, but upon plain proof of a denial, or wrongful delay of justice; and unless the petition of him, who desires the letters of reprisal, be shown to the Minister of that Prince, against whose subjects the letters are demanded, that he, within four months or sooner, may make inquiry, or, procure satisfaction. But in case of no Minister, the letters are not to be granted till after four months, from the day the petition was exhibited to the Prince, against whose subjects the letters are desired, or to his Privy-Council.

XVII. The conditions of the suspension of arms, made the 11th day of August last, relating to ships, merchandizes, and other effects, taken on either side, shall be truly executed.

XVIII. But in case through inadvertency or imprudence, any thing should be committed by any subject, whereby any article of this treaty hath not its effect, this peace shall not be interrupted or broken; but that subject alone shall be answerable for his own fact.

XIX. In case of a future war, six months from the day of the rupture shall be allowed to the subjects of each Nation, to remove all their effects, and retire themselves where they please.

XX. Just and reasonable satisfaction shall be given to all the Queen's Allies, in those matters which they have a right to demand from France.

XXI. The most Christian King will, in friendship to the Queen, grant, in his treaty with the Empire, all things concerning Religion, to be settled according to the treaties of Westphalia.

XXII. Justice shall be done to the family of Hamilton, concerning the Dukedom of Chateleraut, to the Duke of Richmond, concerning such requests as he has to make in France, and to Charles Douglas, concerning certain lands, and to others.

XXIII. All prisoners taken during the war, shall be set at liberty without distinction or ransom.

XXIV. All the conditions of the peace made this day, between the Kings of France and Portugal, are confirmed by this treaty, and the Queen of Great-Britain takes upon herself to be Guarantee.

XXV. The peace made this day between France and Savoy, is particularly included in this treaty, her Majesty of Great-Britain expressly declaring, she will be bound by the stipulations of security and guarantee promised therein, as well as by those, she has formerly taken upon herself.

XXVI. Sweden, Tuscany, Genoa, and Parma, are in the best manner included in this treaty.

XXVII. Their Majesties have also been pleased to comprehend in this treaty the Hans-Towns, namely, Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg, and the City of Dantzick, with this effect, that as soon as the general peace shall be concluded, the Hans-Towns, and the City of Dantzick, may for the future, as common friends, enjoy the antient advantages which they have heretofore had in the business of trade, either by treaties, or by old custom.

XXVIII. Those shall be comprehended in this present treaty of peace, who shall be named by common consent, on the one part, and on the other, before the exchange of the ratifications, or within six months after.

XXIX. Lastly, solemn ratifications for this present treaty, and made in due form, shall be exhibited on both sides at Utrecht, and mutually and duly exchanged within the space of four weeks, to be computed from the day of the signing, or sooner if possible.

XXX. In witness whereof, We, the underwritten Ambassador Extraordinary, and Plenipotentiaries of the Queen of Great-Britain, and of the most Christian King, have put our Seals to these present Instruments, subscribed with our own hands, at Utrecht the 31 day of March ^{March} 1713.

II. Between Great-Britain and Spain.

I. Perpetual peace and true friendship.

II. Against the Union of the Kingdoms of Spain and France, as in the VIth article of the treaty with France.

III. A general amnesty on both sides.

IV. All prisoners to be freed without ransom.

V. and VI. Concerning the acknowledging and promising not to disturb the Protestant Succession, as in the IVth and Vth articles of the treaty with France.

VII. That the ordinary distribution of justice be restored.

VIII. That there be a free use of Navigation and Commerce, as it was in the Reign of Charles II. of Spain, and also according to the treaties of Commerce which are now, or will forthwith be made at Madrid. And whereas it is, by common consent, established as a fundamental rule, that the exercise of Navigation and Commerce to the Spanish West-Indies, shall be as in the time of the said Charles II., that therefore this rule may be observed inviolably, it is especially agreed, that no licence shall at any time be given to the French, or any other Nation, to introduce Negroes, Goods, Merchandizes, or any things whatsoever into the Spanish American Dominions, except what may be agreed by the treaty of Commerce aforesaid, and the privileges granted granted in the Affiento de Negros, mentioned in the XIIth article, except also what the Catholic King or his Successors shall promise by any contract, after the Affiento de Negros is determined. It is further agreed, that none of the Spanish Dominions in America shall ever be alienated from the Crown of Spain, to the French or other Nation. On the contrary, the Queen of Great-Britain will endeavour and assist the Spaniards, that the ancient limits of their American Dominions be settled, as in the time of Charles II.

IX. The subjects of each Kingdom shall, in all countries, have at least the same privileges as to duties, or customs, and shall have the like favour in all things, as the subjects of France, or any Nation they favoured, do or shall hereafter enjoy.

X. Gibraltar is given up to the Crown of Great-Britain: But (to prevent abuses by importing any goods) without any territorial jurisdiction, and without any open communication by land with the country round about. Provisions, however, and other necessities in times of scarcity, may be bought with money for the use of the garrison and ships in the harbour. No leave shall be given to Jews or *Moor*s to reside there, nor shelter to any Moorish ships of war, whereby the communication between Spain and Ceuta may be obstructed, or the coasts of Spain infested. The free exercise of their Religion shall be granted to the Catholic inhabitants; and in case the town of Gibraltar shall hereafter be granted or sold, Spain shall have the preference of having the same.

XI. The Island of Minorca, with all its towns and castles, particularly Port-Mahon, is also yielded to the Crown of Great-Britain. No refuge to be given to Moorish ships, but only on account of traffic. In case of alienation, the Crown of Spain to have the preference. The inhabitants to enjoy their religion, estates, and honours; and those that retire, to sell their estates.

XII. The Catholic King grants to the South-Sea Company, with exclusion of all others, the contract for introducing Negroes into his American Dominions, commonly called el Pado del Affiento de Negros, for the space of thirty years, beginning from the 1st of May 1713, with the same conditions enjoyed by the French, together with tracks of land on the river of Plata, sufficient for the subsistence of those who are in the service of the Company, and of their Negroes. The ships of the Company may also come close to land; but a Spanish Officer shall be appointed to take care that nothing be done, contrary to his Master's interests, and all belonging to the Company shall be subject to the inspection of the Officer, as to matters relating to the tracks of land, and disputes to be referred to the Governor of Buenos Ayres. The contract of the Affiento concluded at Madrid, the 26th of March 1713, with all its conditions, not contrary to this article, is deemed as part of this treaty.

XIII. At the earnest desire of the Queen of Great-Britain, that the Catalonians should not only obtain a full and perpetual oblivion of all that was done in the late war, and enjoy all their estates and honours, the Catholic King hereby grants the desired amnesty, and all the privileges which the Castilians enjoy, or may hereafter enjoy.

XIV. As Sicily is by this treaty yielded to the Duke of Savoy, the Queen of Great-Britain will take care, that in default of heirs-male, the possession of Sicily shall revert to the Crown of Spain, and not be alienated on any pretence whatsoever, unless to the Catholic King.

XV. All treaties heretofore concluded between the two Crowns are hereby confirmed, as far as they are not contrary to those treaties lately made and signed. And as the Gaspusoans pretend to certain rights of fishing at Newfoundland, it is agreed, that all such privileges as they and other people of Spain are able to claim by right, shall be allowed them.

XVI, XVII, and XVIII. The same as XVIIIth, XVIIth, and XIXth of the treaty with France.

XIX. The Kings, Princes and States, mentioned in the following articles, and all others nominated on either side by common consent, before the ratifications are exchanged, or within six months after, shall be included in this treaty.

XX. Whatsoever shall be contained in a treaty between Spain and Portugal, with the approbation of Great-Britain, shall be deemed an essential part of this treaty.

XXI. The treaty of peace this day made between Spain and Savoy, is included in this treaty, the Queen of Great-Britain declaring, she will be obliged by the terms of promise and guarantee therein made.

XXII. Sweden, Tulcan and Parma, shall be included in this treaty.

XXIII. And also the Republic of Venice, for the sake of the neutrality they have observed, and the many acts of humanity performed by them.

XXIV. And the Republic of Genoa, on the same accounts.

XXV. The City of Dantzick shall also be included.

XXVI. Solemn ratifications of this treaty shall be exchanged on both sides, within six weeks or sooner.

In witness whereof the Ambassadors and Plenipotentiaries signed and sealed this present treaty at Utrecht, the 13 day of July 1713.

Separate Articles.

I. Since his Catholic Majesty is steadfastly resolved, and does solemnly promise by these presents, that he will not consent to any further alienation of Countries, Provinces, or Lands belonging to the Crown of Spain, the Queen of Great-Britain does likewise promise, that she will persist in those measures, by which she has taken care, that none of the Parties in war shall require or obtain of his Catholic Majesty, that any farther part of the Spanish Monarchy be torn from it. And when it shall seem to the Queen of Great-Britain to be for the common benefit, the King of Spain does give his consent, that a new treaty be entered into between Great-Britain, Spain, and Portugal.

II. The Queen of Great-Britain obliges herself to procure forthwith the Lady Ursini to be put into possession of the Duchy of Limburg, or other countries in the Netherlands, which shall produce an annual clear revenue of 30,000 l. Scudi, according to the Diploma granted by his Catholic Majesty to that Princess, the 28th day of September, 1711.*

* This princess having quitted her rank and prerogatives at the Court of Rome, was made first Lady of the Bed-chamber to the Queen of Spain, whom she met at Nice in Provence, and conducted into Spain. Afterwards, when the Regency of Spain was trusted to the Queen, at the King's going to command his armies in Italy, the Princess Ursini assisted her with her care and counsel. She likewise took upon her the care of the education of the Prince of Asturian. These are the reasons alledged by the King, for his granting her the territory of Limburg, and obliging the Queen of Great-Britain to procure it for her.

*Account and character of King
George I.*

THE Illustrious House of Han- over entirely owe their advancement to the Throne of Great- Britain, to the effectual measures taken by King William and Queen Anne, for the exclusion of all Catholic Princes.

Had not the order of the Succession been changed, and supposing the doubtfulness of the Pretender's birth a sufficient reason to set him aside, the House of Savoy would have been in possession of the British Dominions, as they derive their right from the Princess Henrietta, Daughter of King Charles I. whereas the House of Hanover are descended from the Princess Elizabeth, Daughter of King James I. Nor was it out of any particular regard for the Dukes of Hanover, that the English Nation agreed to alter the Succession, but out of a belief, that it was absolutely necessary for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the liberties of the State. All Catholics were therefore declared incapable of succeeding to the Crown, and consequently the Succession was established in the Protestant branches. Upon this foundation it was, that, the Duke of Gloucester being dead, the Princess Sophia was acknowledged for lawful Heir to the Imperial Crown of Great-Britain.

Though this change of the Succession has been exclaimed against by many, it is built on very strong reasons. In Catholic Countries, a Protestant King will not be endured: Why therefore should a Protestant State be obliged to suffer a Catholic King? Are there not, between Sovereign and Subjects, mutual obligations? And is not the preservation of Religion one of the greatest? If the Catholics think their Religion unsafe under a Protestant Prince, has not experience taught the Protestants, that their Religion can never be secure under a Catholic Prince? What the Nation had suffered from the zeal of King James to introduce his Religion, did it not sufficiently justify their fears and precautions? To maintain the Protestant Succession against the pretended Heir, and several others, who, after his decease, might put in their claim.

1714. the best measures were taken. Of these, the most effectual was the humbling the exorbitant power of France, by which King James and his pretended Son were protected. Lewis XIV was at last forced to abandon their defence, and acknowledge the Protestant Succession. All the other States, enemies of France, rejoiced at the Revolution, and made it their interest to support it. The Union of Scotland with England had the same end, and was so eagerly desired by King William, only that the Scots might cease to wish for a separate King, and concur with the English in the Succession they had established.

Pursuant to the act of Succession, George Lewis, Son of Ernest Augustus, first Elector of Brunswick-Lunenbourg, by the Princess Sophia, Granddaughter of King James I, ascended the Throne on the death of Queen Anne. His mature age, being then fifty-four years old (1), his experience, his personal qualities, his numerous family, the general peace then in Europe, the interest his Allies had to support him, seemed to promise him a quiet and peaceable Reign; but, however, he was not without his disturbances. This Prince had great talents for a Crown, and had not failed to exert them on occasion. He was concerned in all the affairs of Germany, and always came off with advantage. The great services, he had done for the Emperor Leopold, determined the Emperor Joseph, his Successor, to use all his power to procure him admittance into the Electoral College: And the Emperor Charles, Successor of Joseph, caused him to be acknowledged Elector by Lewis XIV, and by the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria, who, till the treaty of Rastadt, had refused him that title. He had waged war in person and with success. His campaign on the Rhine in 1709 was glorious, and would have been much more so, had not the too great bravery of Count Mercy disappointed his project of sending aid to the Duke of Savoy, to enable him to penetrate into la Franche Comté. This Prince had an excellent spirit and noble sentiments: He was much more sensible of services than of injuries; courageous, little capable of dissembling or hiding his thoughts; My maxim (said he, soon after his arrival in England) is never to abandon my friends, to do justice to all the world, and to fear no man. To these valuable qualities he joined a great application to business, and a sincere desire to render his subjects happy.

All these virtues together had gained him the respect and love of his German subjects, who were all submissive to his will; and their obedience had nothing of constraint, because his commands were always reasonable, and dictated both by equity and goodness.

As soon as Queen Anne had resigned her last breath, the Privy-Council met, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and Resident Kriegenberg (in whose hands they were lodged) produced the Elector of Brunswick's three instruments, nominating the persons to be added, as Lords Justices, to the seven great Officers of the Realm (2).

After the opening of the instruments, a proclamation was issued, declaring, that the High and Mighty Prince George, Elector of Brunswick-Lunenbourg, was, by the death of Queen Anne, become our lawful and rightful liege Lord, King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland. This proclamation was signed by above a hundred Lords and Gentlemen, several of whom, in less than a year, entered into treasonable plots to deprive the King of his right, and broke out into open rebellion against him.

King George was proclaimed at the usual places, and with the usual solemnities, in the Cities of London and Westminster. The streets were crowded with multitudes of people, and no disorder was committed. The same day the Lords Justices appointed the Earl of Dorset to carry the King the news of his inauguration, and to attend him in his journey to England.

The Earl of Sta, Lord Justice-General of the North-Britain, having received notice of the Queen's death, and orders to proclaim the King, went to the lodgings of the Duke of Montrose (one of the Lords of the Regency) where he found the Marquis of Tweeddale, and several other Lords and persons of distinction, who, with the Magistrates of Edinburgh, and the Officers of the State, caused the King to be proclaimed with great ceremony.

Two days after the Lords Justices of Ireland, and in Ireland, the Archbishop of Armagh and Sir Constantine Phipps, having received the like notice, proclaimed the King on the 6th of August at Dublin. At the same time, they issued a proclamation for disarming Papists, and seizing their houses.

There was not the least disturbance or interruption given in any place to the proclaiming of the King; only at Oxford, the Mayor received a letter brought by a person in a Bachelor's gown, requiring him to proclaim the Pretender (3). The Mayor communicated this letter to the Vice-Chancellor, and both of them transmitted copies of it to Mr Secretary Bromley, Representative for the University of Oxford, who

(1) He was born May 28, 1660.

(2) The great Officers were:
Dr Tennison, Archbishop of Canterbury,
Lord Chancellor Harcourt, John Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamshire, Lord President, Charles Talbot, Duke of Shrewsbury, Lord-Treasurer, William Legg, Earl of Dartmouth, Lord Privy-Seal,
Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, first Commissioner of the Admiralty, Sir Thomas Parker, Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench.

To these were added, by the Elector of Brunswick, in the instrument under his own hand, the following persons:

Duke of Shrewsbury,	Earl of Anglesea,
Duke of Somerset,	Earl of Carlisle,
Duke of Bolton,	Earl of Nottingham,
Duke of Devonshire,	Earl of Abingdon,
Duke of Kent,	Earl of Scarborough,
Duke of Argyle,	Earl of Oxford,
Duke of Montrose,	Lord Viscount Townshend,
Duke of Roxburg,	Lord Hallifax,
Earl of Pomfret,	Lord Ossepier.

(3) In the letter were these expressions:

'This is to warn you, if you should receive an order to proclaim Hanover, not to comply with it; for 1714. who sent them letters of thanks. The Vice-Chancellor also offered a reward of a hundred pounds to the discoverer of the Author.

Precautions taken.
In the mean time, the Lords of the Regency finding the Nation much exposed by the ill condition of the army and fleet, took all possible precautions to guard against a surprize. They dispatched such Officers of the army, as they could trust, to their respective posts; gave orders to reinforce the garrison of Portsmouth, and sent vessels out to view the harbours of France. They chose Mr Joseph Addison to be their Secretary, and ordered all dispatches, directed to the Secretary of State, to be sent to him. This was particularly mortifying to the Lord Bolingbroke, who was now obliged to stand at the door of the Council-Chamber with his bag and papers, and to receive orders from those, whom, a few days before, he expected to command.

The Parliament meets.
The Parliament met at Westminster, the afternoon of the very day the Queen died, pursuant to the act, which regulated the Succession. The Speaker being in Wales, it was moved by Mr Secretary Bromley, that the House should adjourn to the Wednesday following. But this motion, though seconded, was answered by Sir Richard Onslow, that time was too precious for any to be lost at a critical juncture. And therefore the House adjourned only to the next day.

The Lord Chancellor's speech to both Houses.
On the 5th of August, the Lords-Justices came to the House of Peers, where the Lord-Chancellor, in their name, made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

‘IT having pleased Almighty God to take to himself our late most gracious Queen of blessed memory, we hope, that nothing has been omitted, which might contribute to the safety of these Realms, and the preservation of our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, in this great conjuncture. As these invaluable blessings have been secured to us by those acts of Parliament, which have settled the Succession of these Kingdoms in the most illustrious House of Hanover; we have regulated our proceedings by those rules, which are therein prescribed.

‘The Privy-Council, soon after the demise of the late Queen, assembled at St James's, where, according to the said acts, the three instruments were produced and opened, which had been deposited in the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Resident of Brunswick. Those, who, either by their offices, or by virtue of these instruments, had the honour of being appointed Lords-Justices, did, in conjunction with the Council, immediately proceed to the proclaiming of our lawful and rightful Sovereign King George, taking, at the same time, the necessary care to maintain the public peace.

‘In pursuance of the acts before-mentioned, this Parliament is now assembled, and we are persuaded, you all bring with you so hearty a disposition for his Majesty's service, and the ‘public good, that we cannot doubt of your assistance in every thing, which may promote those great ends.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

‘We find it necessary to put you in mind, that several branches of the public revenue are expired by the demise of her late Majesty; and to recommend to you the making such provisions in that respect, as may be requisite to support the honour and dignity of the Crown: And we assure ourselves, you will not be wanting in any thing, that may conduce to the establishing and advancing of the public credit.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

‘We forbear laying before you any thing, that does not require your immediate consideration, not having received his Majesty's pleasure. We shall only exhort you, with the greatest earnestness, to a perfect unanimity, and a firm adherence to our Sovereign's interest, as being the only means to continue among us our present happy tranquillity.’

The Commons being returned to their House, Mr Secretary Bromley moved for an address of condolance and congratulation, insisting much on the great loss, the Nation had sustained by the death of the late Queen. Mr Robert Walpole moved for something more substantial, ‘to give the King assurances of their making good all Parliamentary funds;’ and Mr Onslow, afterwards Lord Onslow, very justly observed, ‘That the strefs of the address ought not to lie upon condoling, but upon congratulating and giving the King assurances of their maintaining both his Majesty's undoubted title to the crown, and public credit.’ Accordingly, instructions were given for drawing up the following address, which was unanimously agreed to the next day:

Most Gracious Sovereign,

‘WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great-Britain, in Parliament assembled, having a just sense of the great loss the Nation has sustained by the death of our late Sovereign Lady Queen Anne, of blessed memory, humbly crave leave to condole with your Majesty on this sad occasion.

‘It would but aggravate our sorrow, particularly to enumerate the virtues of that pious and most excellent Princess; the duty we owe to your Majesty, and to our Country, oblige us to moderate our grief, and heartily to congratulate your Majesty's Accession to the Throne; whose princely virtues give us a certain prospect of future happiness in the security of our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, and engage us to assure your Majesty, that we will, to our utmost, support your undoubted right to the Imperial Crown of this the hand of God is now at work to set things upon a right foot, and in a few days you will see wonderful changes; which if you are wise enough to foresee, you will obtain grace and favour from the hands of his Sacred Majesty King James, &c.’

1714. ' this Realm, against the Pretender and all other persons whatsoever.

' Your faithful Commons cannot but express their impatient desire for your Majesty's safe arrival and presence in Great-Britain.

' In the mean time, we humbly lay before your Majesty the unanimous resolution of this House, to maintain the public credit of the Nation, and effectually to make good all funds which have been granted by Parliament, for the security of any money which has been, or shall be, advanced for the public service, and to endeavour, by every thing in our power, to make your Majesty's Reign happy and glorious.'

The same day, the House of Peers agreed upon the following address:

Most gracious Sovereign,

Address of the Lords.
Pr. H. L.

' WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, though deeply sensible of the great loss these Nations have sustained, by the demise of her late Majesty of blessed memory, think it our duty, at the same time, with thankful hearts to Almighty God, to congratulate your Majesty upon your happy and peaceable Accession to the Throne: And we do, with the utmost loyalty and duty, assure your Majesty of our zealous and firm resolutions to support your undoubtedly rightful and lawful title to the Crown, against all enemies and pretenders whatsoever.

' Our zeal and affection for your Majesty's service engage us to exert ourselves with all vigour and unanimity for securing the public safety; and we will always, to the utmost of our power, maintain the honour and dignity of your Crown. And we do, with faithful hearts, beseech your Majesty, as soon as possible, to give us your Royal presence, which we are persuaded will be attended with all other blessings to your Kingdoms.'

This address having been transmitted by the Lord-Justices to the King, he returned this answer:

GEORGE R.

The King's answer to the Lords address.

' I take this first opportunity to return you my hearty thanks for your address, and the assurances you have given me therein.

' The zeal and unanimity you have shewn, upon my Accession to the Crown, are great encouragements to me; and I shall always esteem the continuance of them as one of the greatest blessings of my Reign.

' No one can be more truly sensible than I am, of the loss sustained by the death of the late Queen, whose exemplary piety and virtue so much endeared her to her people, and for whose memory I shall always have a particular regard.

' My best endeavours shall never be wanting to repair this loss to the Nation. I will make it my constant care to preserve your Religion, Laws, and Liberties inviolable, and to advance the honour and prosperity of my Kingdoms.

' I am hastening to you, according to your desire, so affectionately expressed in your address.'

The address of the Commons being also transmitted to the King, he returned the following answer:

GEORGE R.

' Your dutiful and loyal address is very acceptable to me. The unanimity and affection my Commons have shewn, upon my Accession to the Crown, are most agreeable instances and pledges of their fidelity to me. I have a just sense of your inexpressible loss, by the death of your late Sovereign. You may be assured of my constant endeavours to secure to you the full enjoyment of your Religion, Laws, and Liberties; and that it will always be my aim to make you an happy and flourishing People; to which your resolution to maintain the public credit of the Nation will greatly contribute. I am hastening to you, according to your earnest desire, and the just expectations of my people.'

A great many persons, particularly the leading men among the party, whose designs were frustrated by the Queen's sudden death, being extremely angry with Dr Ratcliffe, for not attending the Queen, when sent for by the Duke of Ormond, their resentments were carried so far, that, on the 5th of August, Sir John Packington made a complaint against him in the House of Commons. But it being represented, that the Doctor, who had the honour of being a Member of the House, was then absent, that matter dropped.

Two days after, there was a debate about the choice of a Chairman of the Grand Committee of Subsidy; some of the Tory Members having moved and insisted on placing Sir William Wyndham in the Chair. But Mr Walpole represented, that Mr Conyers had, for so many years, so well discharged that office, that it would be inconsistent with gratitude, good manners, and prudence, to chuse another. Upon which Mr Conyers was placed in the Chair. The Tories having lost this point, some of them, on pretence of shewing extraordinary zeal for the new Government, proposed the giving the King a million sterling for the civil list, which was 300,000*l.* more than the late Queen had enjoyed. But, though no direct opposition was then made to that motion, yet it was afterwards dropped; the wisest of the King's friends knowing, that the Tories would take occasion from thence to reproach him, as oppressing the Nation by a higher revenue than the Queen, as they afterwards suggested in their libel, called English advice. For this reason, the proposal for the same sum as had been granted to the Queen was approved, and a bill for that purpose, being brought in, passed with great dispatch. While the bill was depending, Mr Horatio Walpole moved, that the Committee should have power to receive two clauses; one for the payment of the arrears due to the Hanover troops in English pay, being 65,000*l.* the other for 100,000*l.* to be paid by the Treasury, to any person that should apprehend the Pretender, 1714. tender, if he should land, or attempt to land in any of the King's Dominions. Sir William Wyndham seconded Mr Walpole as to the arrears; and Mr Shippen very frankly owned, he had opposed that payment in the late Reign, but that he was for it now. Mr Aldworth, Member of Parliament for New Windsor, supported likewise the motion; but, as if he designed to expose the Members, who, at this juncture, appeared so forward to pay those very troops, which, a few months before, they had treated as runaways, he said, 'That, for his part, he had formerly been against the payment, because he had been given to understand, in that very House, that those troops were deserters; but that he had since been informed, they were hired to fight, and had served well as long as there was fighting: And if, when they came in fight of the enemy, they, who hired them, would not suffer them to fight, he did not see any reason, why they should be called deserters.' As to the clause, for giving 100,000 l. to such, as should apprehend the Pretender, Mr C—n said, the next day, 'That he was not the day before in the House, when that clause was moved; but, if he had been present, he would have opposed it, because, in his opinion, the Protestant Succession was no longer in danger, since his Majesty's peaceable Accession to the Throne.' And he was so positive in this assertion, that he defied all the House to prove the contrary. He was seconded by Mr Shippen; but Mr Pulteny, and after him the Lord Lumley, made it clearly appear, 'That the Protestant Succession was in danger, as long as there was a Popish Pretender, who had many friends both at home and abroad: That the late Queen was sensible of that danger, when she issued out her proclamation against him; and that the case was not altered by her Majesty's demise: That the Nation would be at no charge, if the Pretender did not attempt to land; and, if he did, 100,000 l. would be well bestowed to apprehend him.' To this Mr C—n made no reply.

A letter from the King.
Mr Craggs, who, the day before the Queen died, had been dispatched to Hanover, returned, the 13th of August, with letters from the King to the Lords-Justices: Upon which they went to the House of Peers; and the Chancellor, in their name, made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Chancellor's speech to both Houses upon it, Aug. 13.
'IT is with great satisfaction we can now tell you, that we have this morning received a letter from the King, wherein his Majesty is graciously pleased to acquaint us, that his Majesty is hastening hither, to employ his utmost care for putting these Kingdoms into a happy and flourishing condition.

'He has commanded us, in the mean time, to continue our care of every thing, that may conduce to the peace and safety of his Dominions. And we are assured, that, if this had required his more immediate preference, he would, without the least delay, have repaired hither, for the support of so dutiful and faithful subjects. For his Majesty does very particularly express his great satisfaction in the loyalty and affection, which his people have universally shewn upon his Majesty's Accession to the Crown.

'At the opening this Session, we did not mention to you the apprehensions we then had, from the smallness of the sum at that time advanced, that the lottery would not be full, being desirous, in the first place, to try to make it effectual in the manner the Parliament had established it. But we are obliged now to acquaint you, that all our endeavours have failed of the desired success, though the contributions have been thereby considerably increased,

'We must therefore earnestly recommend to you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, to take this into your consideration, and to give such further encouragement, as you shall think proper, for raising the whole sum, which was intended, and is absolutely necessary for carrying on the service of the year.'

The Parliament had, before the Queen's death, passed an act for a lottery for 1,400,000 l. *The public credit was then so low, that not above sixty or seventy thousand pounds had been subscribed. This was occasioned partly by the diffidence of the monied-men in the late Administration, and partly by the low interest allowed for the blank tickets. The Lords of the Regency and Privy Council, to restore public credit, and fill the lottery, went in a body to the Bank, and subscribed large sums themselves, which was such an encouragement to others to follow their example, that above 700,000 l. was subscribed in two days; and the Parliament, pursuant to the King's desire, giving further encouragement by making a small addition to the interest for the blank tickets, one per cent. only, the remainder was subscribed in a few days more.*

Addresses of thanks for the King's letter were voted by both Houses, and sent to Hanover by the Lords-Justices, who, about a week after, came to the House of Peers to pass the money-bills, that were ready for the Royal assent. The Speaker, upon presenting the Civil List and Lottery bills, made a remarkable speech (1), and, the business of the Session being finished, the Lords-Justices prorogued the Parliament to the 3d of September.

Thus ended the second and last Session of the fourth Parliament of Great-Britain, and the last of Queen Anne's Reign.

The

(1) The speech was as follows:

My Lords,

'The Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of Great-Britain, in Parliament assembled, under the present happiness they enjoy by his Majesty's peaceable and quiet Accession to the Throne, could not enter upon any work more satisfactory and pleasing to themselves, than the providing a sufficient revenue for the occasions of his Majesty's civil Government, in order to make his Reign as easy and prosperous, as the beginning of it hath been secure and undisturbed.

They are sensible, that the peace of the Kingdom is not to be preserved, nor the rights and liberties of the Subjects to be protected, without supporting the just authority and dignity of the Crown; and therefore they have thought it their interest, as well as duty, to make such a provision, as may not barely suffice to the necessity

Hist. Reg.

The French Minister, Monsieur d'Iberville, who had behaved himself with great haughtiness, was, upon the Queen's death, seized with such an apprehension of being insulted by the people in his own house, that he sent a letter to the Duke of Ormond, to desire his protection; and, the Duke acquainting the Lords-Justices with it, some of the Trained-bands were ordered to guard his house. That Minister had, before he received any orders from his Court, assured the Regency, 'That his Master would inviolably maintain the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht, particularly with relation to the settlement of the British Crown in the House of Hanover.' And the Earl of Peterborough, who arrived in London from France on the 7th of August, told some of the Regency, that the French King had given him the like assurance; Mr Prior, having likewise, by orders of the Regency, notified the Queen's death to the French King, received the same answer. Some days after, Iberville received a letter from the Marquis de Torcy, approving what he had done; and another from the French King to the British Regency with the same assurance, importing likewise, 'That having been informed, that reports had been spread, as if he designed to make alterations in the late renunciations, he thought fit to declare, as he had already done to the Earl of Peterborough, that these reports were altogether false and groundless: That, the King of Spain having sent the Cardinal del Guidice as Ambassador to France, which might create some suspicions, his most Christian Majesty had desired the King, his Grandson, to recal him: And that the Elector of Brunswick having, some time before the death of the Queen, signified to his most Christian Majesty, that, whenever his Succession to the Crown of Great-Britain should take place, he would cultivate a friendship with his most Christian Majesty, he (the King of France) on his part, assured the Lords-Justices, that he would do all that lay in his power to maintain a good intelligence and amity between the two Crowns.'

The answer, which Mr Prior received about the Catalans, was not altogether so agreeable to England. The Regency had wrote to the Court of France, 'That, his most Christian Majesty having promised to interpose his good offices with the King of Spain in favour of the Catalans, they were surprized to find, that, instead of that, his most Christian Majesty had sent his troops to assist those of his Grandson, in the reduction of Barcelona; and that they hoped, his most Christian Majesty would make good his promises, and consider the ill consequences of his suffering his forces to act against a people, who were under the protection of the Crown of Great Britain.' To this Mr Prior received an answer, 'That the most Christian King had already made good his engagements in behalf of the Catalans: That their obstinacy was the cause of all the misfortunes, that might befall them: And that his glory would not suffer him to recal his troops from before Barcelona.' Some days before this answer was transmitted to England, the Marquis d'Almanza, one of the Deputies from the Principality of Catalonia, made application to the Lords-Justices, and communicated to them a letter he had received from the Governor of Majorca, with an account of the condition of the City of Barcelona. Upon which they ordered, that a copy of the letter, which they had written to the Court of France, should be communicated to the Marquis; and he was farther assured, that directions had been sent to Admiral Wilsbarr, not to molest the inhabitants of Barcelona, or hinder any relief to be brought to them by sea.

The Lords-Justices were sensible how little the French King's assurances, that he would not disturb the Protestant Succession, were to be relied on; and therefore, though they had sent a reinforcement to the garrison of Portsmouth, under the command of Colonel Pocock, they ordered another draught of five hundred Out-pensioners of Chelsea-Hospital to march thither, under the command of Colonel Jones; and, at the same time, ordered the Justices of the Peace of London and Westminster to take exact lists of the Popish Recusants, and to seize their arms and horses; and, necessity of the Government, but may be suitable to the State, the honour and lustre, which the Crown of Great-Britain ought to be attended with.

Whatsoever is superfluous in that provision, and more than the ordinary services of his Majesty shall require, will but inable him to exert his highest and most valuable prerogative of doing good: And we can give no greater proof of the trust we repose in his Majesty's gracious disposition, than putting the same intire revenue into his hands, which her late Majesty died possessed of; whose virtues we all admired, and of whose affection and concern for the Religion, Laws, and Liberties of this Kingdom, we had so long experience.

As the Crown itself descends immediately, and knows no vacancy, the Commons have taken care, that the revenue should follow it as close as possible; for they have given all the dispatch to this grant, which the forms of their proceedings would allow. So that when his Majesty shall please to answer the impatient desires of his people, by coming to take possession of his Kingdoms, he will find himself equally established in these revenues, as if he had succeeded to all by an uninterrupted right of inheritance. The only difference is this, that, if he had inherited them, he would have wanted one single proof of the duty, and affection, and unanimity of his subjects.

Our desire is, that this may be looked upon as an earnest and pledge of that zeal and fidelity, which we shall always retain, and which, upon every occasion, we shall be ready to demonstrate to his Majesty's person and Government: As such, we hope his Majesty will graciously accept it at this time; and hereafter, when he shall have had experience of this first voluntary offering of his loyal Commons, we hope he will find it to his satisfaction, as large and as ample as he could wish, might but the term of the grant be as long as we could wish, since it is to have equal continuance with his Majesty's life.

My Lords, the bill, which the Commons have passed for the purposes I have mentioned, is intitled, An act for the better support of his Majesty's Household, and of the honour and dignity of the Crown of Great-Britain.

They have also prepared another bill, as well for rectifying mistakes in the names of the Commissioners for the land-tax, as for raising so much as is wanting to make up the sum of fourteen hundred thousand pounds, intended to be raised by a lottery, for the public service, in the year 1714. This having been recommended to their care, and appearing to them to be necessary for his Majesty's and the public service, they have reason to think they have now abundantly supplied the defects in the former provision; and in this assurance they humbly present this bill also for the Royal assent.

1714 and, upon the landing of the seven British battalions from Osband, a battalion of the Earl of Orkney's Royal regiment of Fusiliers was commanded to march to Portsmouth, which made a strength sufficient for the defence of that important place.

On the 17th of August, the Earl of Berkley, Commander of the Squadron of men of war and yachts, appointed to attend the King and Prince, arrived on the coast of Holland. Monsieur Klingraef, the King's resident at the Hague, immediately dispatched an express to Hanover, to acquaint him with it.

Com-plaints of the Merchants against the King of Spain. Hist. Reg.
The ill conduct of the late Ministry with relation to the treaty of commerce with Spain soon appeared. For, on the 19th of August, the Merchants, trading to that Kingdom, laid before the Regency the difficulties under which they laboured, by means of a large donative which King Philip was about to extort from the British and other Merchants (1). This increased the general indignation against the Managers of the Spanish treaty, who had settled our trade to Spain in so precarious a manner, as made it subject to the will and pleasure of the King of Spain, whose Ministers believed themselves so secure of ours in England, that they thought they might put any hardships on our Merchants. But upon the news of the Queen's sudden death, and of the vigorous proceedings of the Regency, they entertained other sentiments, and recalled the orders they had given for exacting the donative.

Gaultier leaves England.
The latter end of August, the Abbot Gaultier, who had been the Agent of France and the Pretender, set out for that Kingdom, as many others had done upon the Queen's death, who had come hither on very ill designs.

About the same time, Mr Murray arrived express from Hanover, with an account, that the King had deferred his departure for some days; and brought several orders for the Regency and Council, particularly for the preparing a patent to create the Prince Royal, Prince of Wales; and for removing the Lord Bolingbroke from his office of Secretary of State; which was done on the last of August, with particular marks of displeasure; three of the Lords of the Regency, the Dukes of Sbreulbury and Somerset, and the Lord Cowper, having taken the Seals from him, and locked and sealed up all the doors of his office.

The union between England and Holland was so necessary for their mutual preservation, that it was one of the first cares of the Lords of the Regency to notify to the States the Queen's death, and his Majesty's peaceable Accession to the Throne. This was done on the 4th of August by the Earl of Strafford, the British Ambassador in Holland, who made a speech on the occasion, wherein he observed, that, by the act of Succession, all officers were to continue in employment six months after the demise of the Queen, unless the Successor otherwise disposed of the offices; and that consequently he remained still Ambassador of the Crown of Great-Britain. Upon the arrival of Baron Boisbarré's Secretary with the news of the Queen's death, Monsieur Klingraef, the Resident of Hanover, presented to the States a memorial, with a letter from the King, which was lodged in his hands, to be in readiness, if there should be occasion, by which the King required of the States the performance of their guaranty of his Succession to the Crown of Great-Britain. The States assembled that very night, upon Klingraef's delivering the King's letter; and, the next day, Aug. 15. came to a resolution to return this answer, N. 3.

‘That, as soon as they were informed of the sickness and death of the Queen, they immediately bethought themselves of their engagements for the guaranty of the Succession to the Crown of Great-Britain in the Protestant line, as it was settled by acts of Parliament. That, at the same time, they considered with themselves, not only how much it concerns the Kingdoms of Great-Britain, that the Settlement of the Succession in the Protestant line should have intire effect, but also how deeply the Protestant Religion, the safety of their State, and the liberty of all Europe, were interested therein. That therefore they unanimously resolved to perform their engagements, and to execute all that by Treaty of mutual guaranty they had promised. That as they received the account of the Queen's death with grief, so it was very acceptable news to them, that his Electoral Highness, as the next Heir in the Protestant line, was instantly proclaimed King by the unanimous advice of the Council, and with the acclamations of the People. That they most heartily congratulate him thereupon, and wish him all further happy successes in a prosperous Reign. That from this good

(1) An account of this affair was published in the two following letters from Cadiz:

Cadiz, July 29.

‘The King of Spain has demanded a donative in this place, and in other parts of Spain, and particularly of the British Merchants and other Foreigners inhabiting here; and their proportion of the donative is settled by a note left at each of their houses, regulating what each person is to pay, which the Merchants have refused to comply with, as being contrary to treaties in force, and have represented the same to the King of Spain: But, instead of finding redress, they have had soldiers quartered upon them, and expect the number to be doubled every day, during the time they shall refuse to pay the donative. However, they have resolved to let their effects be seized, rather than comply with a demand so unjust in itself, and so dishonourable to the British Nation, of which there is no precedent.’

Cadiz, July 29.

‘Our factory is insulted the most that ever was yet experienced from this Government; a donative (or free gift) being endeavoured to be extorted by violence from us. To which effect our Governor has put guards of Soldiers in our houses, threatening to double them at 8 rials value per diem, which amounts to half a dollar, until we pay the said donative, which amounts to 125 pieces of eight on some, on others more or less. Thus the principal of our articles and privileges are trampled on. This is the respect shewn to our Queen and Nation, and the honourable usage given to her subjects here. And what can be expected for the future? We hope a sudden and determined resolution will be taken at the Court of England, to get satisfaction for this arbitrary dragging the British subjects; and that a stop will be put to their ever pretending here any more to such an extortion and breach of public faith; otherwise no living, nor can we be ever secure here.’ Hist. Reg.

1714. good beginning they hope his Majesty will take peaceable possession of his Kingdoms without any opposition. That, nevertheless, they were willing and ready to perform their engagements, and to take all proper measures with him for that end. That, it being likely his Majesty will speedily go for England, they will be very glad, if he will please to take his journey thro' their Dominions. That they will endeavour to facilitate his passage with all that is in their power; and that they will at all times shew the high esteem they have for his Majesty's person and friendship; and that they have his interests as much at heart as their own.' This resolution was, with a letter to the King, delivered to the Resident of Hanover; and, at the same time, the States dispatched letters to the several Provinces, desiring them forthwith to provide the necessary funds for setting out a strong squadron of men of war; of which twelve, that were said to be designed for the Baltic, were almost ready to put to sea.

Treaty betw. Portugal and Great-Britain. About the middle of August, the Count de Albuquerque, Plenipotentiary of Portugal, in a Conference with the States-Deputes, notified to them the favourable declaration the Regents of Great-Britain had caused to be made to Monsieur de Brucade, the Portuguese Envoy at London, 'That Spain should be obliged to conclude peace immediately with the Crown of Portugal; or, in case of refusal, his Portuguese Majesty might depend upon being assisted by the Crown of Great-Britain, conformably to the treaty of defensive Alliance between these two Crowns.' This declaration having been reported to the States-General, they caused assurances to be given to the Portuguese Minister, 'That they would readily concur in all measures his Britannic Majesty might judge proper to be taken, for obliging Spain to agree with Portugal on fair and just conditions of peace.' After these declarations, there was little difficulty in concluding the treaty between Spain and Portugal.

The Earl of Strafford having received a letter from the King, to return the States thanks for their resolution about the guaranty, the Earl, two days after, made a speech to the States, and, among other things, said, 'That they had thereby engaged the Friendship of a King, which could not but be very advantageous to them, as well in regard to the neighbourhood and powerfulness of his Kingdoms and States, as with respect to his Majesty's personal merit, who, for his many excellent qualities, would be esteemed and courted by all Europe, as well as loved and respected by his own subjects: And that as he was known to be a Prince, who was a religious observer of his word, they might be assured, that, in gaining his friendship, they secured to themselves a solid and lasting support.'

The Court of France, confounded by the Queen's sudden death, followed the best counsel, which, in the present condition of their affairs, they could take, which was, to acknowledge King George. Accordingly, besides the forementioned declarations, Monsieur de Chateaufort, their Ambassador at the Hague, made the Earl of Strafford the usual compliments of condolence upon the death of the Queen, and, at the same time, those of congratulation upon the King's Accession to the Throne. And it is ob-servable, that the Pretender, who, by our Ministers and those of France, had been put in hopes of carrying his point, as appears by his own declaration*, and by what passed between* See our Ministers and the Abbot Gaudier, was in- P. 379- tirely disappointed. For upon the news, which he received the 14th of August, N. S. that the Queen was either dead, or past recovery, he posted immediately for Verfailles: But, the King of France having notice of it, the Marquis de Torcy sent to tell him, 'That his most Christian Majesty was surprized at his being returned into his Dominions, knowing the engagements he was under, in respect to the Succession of the Crown of Great Britain in the House of Hanover; and therefore desired him to quit his territories.' Upon this the Pretender, having made a melancholy visit to the Queen-Dowager of England at Chailot, returned to Barleduc, under the deepest concern for the ill success of his journey; and set out afterwards for the Court of Lorraine at Luneville, from whence he went to Plombieres, to drink the waters of that place.

It will not be improper to take notice of some remarkable passages at Hanover before the news of the Queen's death reached that Court. On the 26th of July, N. S. the Earl of Clarendon, Envoy Extraordinary from the Queen, arrived at Hanover; but, the Elector being then at Herenhausen, it was the 4th of August, N. S. before the Earl was conducted thither to have his first audience: One reason of the delay was, that the King of Prussia arrived there incognito on the 30th of July, N. S. The cause of this interview between these two Princes at this juncture was variously discoursed of; but, very probably, the design of it was to cultivate a good correspondence between them, which their enemies had endeavoured to interrupt. The French Court and ours knew, it would not be easy to defeat the Protestant Succession, while these two families, which were both included in the intail, were united in affection and interest; and therefore they attempted to divide them, by proposing to the King of Prussia's Minister here, that his Master should immediately succeed after the Queen, if he would fall in with the measures of the two Courts. But that King was too discerning to be caught in that snare: He knew, that their design was only to set the two families at variance, which must not only defeat the Protestant Succession, but ruin the interest of the Reformation, render the two families incapable of supporting their own or their Country's interest against the designs of France and Sweden, and facilitate the Pretender's way to the Throne of Great-Britain. He therefore not only rejected the proposal, but likewise assured the Elector of Hanover, that he would assist him with all his power to maintain his title to the British Crown; and, having concerted measures with him for their common interest, returned to Berlin the 3d of August, N. S.

Mr Craggs, who had been sent to Hanover with an account of the Queen's dangerous illness, arrived there on the 16th of August, N. S. and went directly to Herenhausen with the Privy-Council's letter to the King. The same night three other expresss arrived at Hanover; two to the King, and one to the Earl of Clarendon, with the news of the Queen's death; which the Earl communicated to him at two o'clock in the morning.

1714. morning. This was confirmed, four hours after, by the arrival of Monsieur Godike, Secretary to Baron Bothmar, with the further account of his Majesty's being proclaimed King of Great-Britain in the Cities of London and Westminster, without the least shew of opposition. The King received this news, so much to his glory and advantage, with a serenity of countenance and composure of mind, peculiar to him. The Baron de Rbede, his first Chamberlain, was immediately dispatched to Berlin, to desire an interview with the King of Prussia, before his departure for Holland. But, that Prince having begun his journey to Koningberg in Prussia, before the Baron's arrival at Berlin, the interview was prevented. However, as soon as the King of Prussia received from the Hague the news of the Queen's death, and of the proclaiming of King George, he immediately declared his resolution to contribute his assistance to the maintaining of that Succession, in case it should be disputed; and sent orders to his Ministers at the several Courts, particularly to Mr Bonnet, his Resident at London, to notify. 'That, as his Majesty had constantly declared himself in favour of the Succession of the House of Hanover to the Crown of Great-Britain, so now he was affected with peculiar joy to hear, that the Settlement of that Crown had, in due time, taken effect, by the proclaiming of King George; the rather, because it wisely tended to the promoting the Protestant Religion, and the true interest and welfare of the British Nation: And that, in case of need, he was ready to employ all the power which God had put into his hands, in assisting to maintain that Succession against all, who might offer to dispute it.'

The neighbouring Princes and States likewise either went in person, or sent Envoys and Deputies to congratulate his Majesty's happy Accession to the Crown; which occasioned a great concourse of people, and retarded the King's departure; the thoughts of which so afflicted the inhabitants of Hanover, who had so long enjoyed the blessings of his mild Government, that they were inconsolable. The King, in order to alleviate their grief, caused intimation to be given to the Magistrates, that they might ask some favour of him; and, at their request, the excise of provisions was taken off, the debts of insolvent debtors were discharged, and their persons set at liberty.

The King, having committed the Government of his German Dominions to a Council, at the head of which he placed his Brother Prince Ernest, took into consideration what part of the Royal Family he should carry with him, and then determined, that the Prince should go with him; that the Princess, his Consort, should follow a few weeks after, with the two eldest Princesses; and that the young Prince Frederic George should remain at Hanover with his youngest Sister. The King also named those of the household, who were to attend him to Great-Britain (1).

The King set out from Herenhausen the 31st He sets out of August, and in four days came to Utrecht, for Eng-land. from whence he went to the Hague. He had there several Conferences with the States, wherein the assurances, which had been mutually given by letters of friendship and effectual assistance, were confirmed (2). At length, on the 16th of September, the King and Prince embarked at Orange-Polder, on board the Peregrine and the Mary Yacht, which having, soon after, joined the Squadron of English and Dutch men of war, that waited for them, under the command of the Earl of Berkeley, they all sailed for England with a fair wind; and, the next day, about nine in the evening, arrived safe at the Hope, where the Admiral thought fit to drop anchor. There being a thick fog the Saturday morning, the yacht did not go up the river till the afternoon. The King and Prince went into a barge in Long Reach, and arrived at Greenwich about six o'clock in the evening. The Duke of Northumbreland, Captain of the Life-guard, and the Lord-Chancellor, at the head of the Lords of the Regency, received him at his landing, and complimented him on his safe arrival. The King chose to walk to his house in the Park, accompanied by most of the Nobility, and great numbers of the principal Gentry, through an infinite crowd of persons of all conditions. Before he left his yacht, he appointed the Earls of Dorset and Berkeley to be Lords of his Bed-chamber, and knighted Mr William Sanderfon, Captain of the Peregrine. After the King had undergone the fatigue of passing through the crowd, and of giving his hand to all, who approached him, he retired to his Bed-chamber, and sent for several of the Nobility, such as had most distinguished themselves by their zeal for his Succession. It was observed, that the Duke of Ormond, the Lord Chancellor, and the Lord Trevor were not of that number. The Earl of Oxford was not at Greenwich that evening, but was one of the earliest there the next morning; but had the misfortune to be undistinguished among the crowd, and, with great difficulty, had at last the bare honour of kissing his Majesty's hand, without exchanging a word with him.

Chappuzeau; two Surgeons, and two Valets de Chamber.

(2) The Marquis de Chateaufort, Ambassador of France, had an audience, among other foreign Ministers, to compliment the King on his Accession; and the report was, that he used these, among other civil expressions, 'There are yet a few difficulties to be removed, to put the finishing hand to the treaties yet depending; but your Majesty shall be the arbiter of the peace.' To which the King answered, 'I will be the guaranty of it.' The Duke de Ossuna, and the Marquis de Monteleone, Plenipotentiaries of Spain, came from Utrecht to the Hague, to wait on the King and had a private audience the 9th of September.

1714. Nor did the Earl escape such reflections from the spectators, as his conduct had justly deserved. On the other hand, the Duke of Marlborough appeared there, justly favoured by the King, and looked upon (though not yet declared) as Captain General (1). The Dukes of Shrewsbury, Somerset, Bolton, Argyle, Montrose, Rutland, and Montague; the Marquis of Dorchester; the Earls of Dorset, Bridgewater, Sunderland, Carlisle, Berkeley, Nottingham, Portland, Orford, Wharston, and Cholmondeley; the Lord Viscount Townshend; the Lords Ossulstone, Sommers, and Haitfax; the Bishop of Salisbury; General Hope, Mr Lechmere, and many others, received particular marks of favour; and the Duke of Argyle was declared Groom of the Stole to his Royal Highness; Colonel William Car and Colonel Tyrrel, Grooms of the Bed-chamber; the Earl of Heriford, the Lord Finch, the Lord Lumley, and Colonel Oughton, Gentlemen of the Bed-chamber to the Prince.

The King's entry. On the 20th of September, the King and Prince of Wales made their entry with great pomp and magnificence. There were in the King's coach the Prince, and the Duke of Northumberland, Captain of the Life-guard in waiting. Above two hundred coaches of the Nobility and Gentry, all with six horses, preceded the King's. When he came to St Margaret's Hill in Southwark, he was met by the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, Recorder, Sheriffs, and Officers of the City of London; in whose name Sir Peter King, Recorder, made a congratulatory speech. The Lord-Mayor delivered the sword to the King, who returned it to him, and he bore it in the procession bare-headed. The Royal pomp continued till his arrival at his palace of St James's, and was favoured by as fair a day as was ever known in that season of the year.

The Court was extremely numerous the next day, when, besides the British Nobility and Gentry, several foreign Ministers made their appearance; particularly those of France (2), Polland, Prussia, and Italy, took that occasion to congratulate his Majesty's happy Accession to the Throne, and safe arrival in England (3).

Before we proceed to the events of this Reign, it will be proper to give a general idea of the state of affairs in Great-Britain and Ireland.

The animosity between the several parties, which even at this day divide England, was, at King George's Accession, higher than ever. The Whigs, who had been in disgrace the four last years of the Queen's Reign, were full of resentment at the usage they had received from the Tories, and hoped to have full satisfaction under the new Reign, which they looked upon as the end of their humiliation. The Tories, on their part, were extremely apprehensive of a down fall, and this apprehension had engaged several of their Leaders in practices not only dangerous, but directly contrary to the measures, the Nation had taken with the two last Sovereigns and the House of Hanover. To the views of these men were ascribed the late peace with France, and the violence offered by the Queen to her Allies, to compel them to a reconciliation with that Crown, and to the sacrifice of the fruits of their victories.

Moreover, the principles of the Revolution had been far from being universally embraced. Not only the Papists espoused the abdicated family, but also great numbers of Churchmen; and it was much to be feared, that they would join with the Catholics to dethrone a Prince, whom they looked upon as a Foreigner. The famous distinction of a King de jure, and a King de facto, was not yet forgot, nor the doctrine of passive obedience; and several refused to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration.

Scotland was generally dissatisfied with the Union. They were apt to consider themselves

(1) The Duke of Marlborough, having been detained a fortnight at Osford by contrary winds, happened to land at Dever, the day the Queen died. He knew nothing of the Queen's death, no more than the Mayor and Jurats of Dever, by whom he was received in their formalities with the acclamations of the people, and with a discharge of a great number of guns from the plat-form, but none from the castle, which are used only in royal salutes. The reason of his coming at that time is not known for certain. He had been invited first by the Lord-Treasurer Harley, and afterwards by the Lord Bolingbroke, and great promises were made him. The compliment went so far, that orders were said to be sent to the Commanders of the castles and forts on the coasts of Kent, Essex, and Suffolk, to pay the same honours, by the firing of guns wherever he landed, as was done when he returned in triumph from his glorious campaigns. But it seems this ceremony was soon after countermanded by an express. However, the Duke consented to make a kind of public entry. About two hundred inhabitants of Southwark, with their Member at their head, resolved to meet and attend him through the Borough. He was likewise attended as he passed through the City with the like number on horseback. His coach happened to break down at Temple-Bar, and he was forced to go into another. He was censured by his enemies for this conduct, as if it was a sort of insult on the Queen, who was but just dead.

(2) Iberville the French Envoy said on this occasion, 'That, as soon as his Majesty's leisure would permit, he would desire an audience, to repeat to him the assurances, the Marquis de Chateaufort had given his

(3) An accident happened this day, which interrupted a little the gay humour the Court was in. Charles Aldworth, Member of Parliament for Windsor, had imbibed, at St Germain in France, strong prejudices against the Hanover Succession, which, at his return to England, he made no scruple of publishing, and confirmed them by frequent drinking the Pretender's health. This drew upon him several quarrels, in which he met with some disgraces; and, in the latter end of the Queen's Reign, he set so great value on that merit of his, that he thought himself not sufficiently taken notice of, which made him a little intractable. He took liberties in railing at the old Ministry; and, to ingratiate himself with their Successors, charged it as a crime in Colonel Chudleigh of the foot-guards, that he had drank the Duke of Marlborough's health. Colonel Chudleigh, the Cousin of the other Colonel, meeting unexpectedly Mr Aldworth in the Presence-chamber at St James's, expostulated with him about it; and, some By-standers expressing their surprize, that men, who had publicly drank the Pretender's health, should dare to appear in that place, Mr Aldworth came to hard words with Colonel Chudleigh, and challenged him; upon which they both went out, and fought in Marybone-Fields, notwithstanding Colonel Billet's endeavours to prevent it. Mr Aldworth was killed on the spot; and the King, being told of it, expressed his indignation at people's quarrelling in his Palace; but said, that, as he came to maintain the laws, he would leave the matter wholly to their decision.

as degraded to a province of England. They had always been pleased with the title of an independent Kingdom, heartily lamented the loss of it, and as heartily wished to recover it. That the Scots should, at King George's Accession, be in these sentiments, is no great wonder, since it requires ages to root out of the minds of a Nation such sort of impressions, however ill-grounded. Accordingly, the Scots began to shew their discontent soon after the Queen's death, of which there is the following account: The Regency having issued a proclamation for a reward of 100,000 l. for seizing the Pretender, they were informed that the Pretender's friends in Scotland designed an insurrection; and that some of them had been seen to go in arms towards the Highlands; upon which they ordered a good number of half-pay Officers, especially of those belonging to the Scots regiments, to go thither immediately, that, in case of necessity, they might raise the militia of the country, under the orders of Major-General Whetbam, who commanded in chief there. Though this precaution was necessary, yet the Scots Jacobites were so confounded, that they could do nothing considerable; so that the chief of them only held some consultations, and retired to their lurking places.

Commissions in Scotland.

Some of the Highlanders appeared in a body near Fort William at Inverlochy, in the western Highlands. But, the Governor sending out a detachment against them, they marched off; so that they could do nothing at that time in Scotland, but only steal some cattle, and took an opportunity by night to proclaim the Pretender. The Government ordered them to be prosecuted; and, by way of prevention, the Duke of Gordon was confined by the Regency to the City of Edinburgh, on his parole; his son, the Marquis of Huntley, to his house in the North; and his son-in-law, the Lord Drummond, to his Castle of that name. The Duke of Arbol, Lord Privy-Seal, who had caused the King to be proclaimed at Perth, was ordered to continue at his Castle of Blair in the Highlands, to preserve the peace of the neighbourhood: And the Regency being informed, that the Highlanders had appointed huntings, when it is usual for the Clans to attend their Chiefs, they forbade those huntings, and ordered Sir Donald Macdonald of Slait, one of those Chiefs, suspected to be in the Pretender's interest, to be made prisoner, and sent to the Castle of Edinburgh. The Lord Drummond was also ordered to be seized, but escaped to the Highlands, from whence he wrote to the Lords Justices, and offered bail for his good behaviour. The Earl of Broadalbin, who had sufficiently declared himself for the Pretender, tho' he had abjured him when he sat as one of the sixteen Scots Peers, thought fit to retire to an inaccessible Castle in a lake; upon which a detachment of foot was ordered to guard the avenues; and Captain Campbel of Glendoroul, who had a Commission, by the Earl of Oxford's means, to raise an Independent Company in the Highlands, was taken at Inverlochy, and from thence sent prisoner to Edinburgh. The late Lord-Treasurer had, a little before, set up a new Chamberlain's Court in Scotland, the old one having been long discontinued, because arbitrary Princes had made it a grievance to the subject. The design of reviving it now was only for a cover to bestow money upon such, as were in the Court-measures, Accordingly, the Earl of Mar, who managed the affairs of Scotland, recommended his own brother-in-law, Sir Hugh Paterson of Banockburn, and the Lord Haddo, eldest son of the Earl of Aberdeen, to be two of the Commissioners, to whom the Queen had granted a bill of 1000 l. each, payable by Mr Douglas, Receiver-General of the land-tax. The Lord Viscount Kilgib, one of the sixteen Scots Peers, and the Lord Lyon, King at Arms, two other relations to the Earl of Mar, had also grants for the like sum. Soon after the Queen's death, Sir Hugh Paterson demanded payment of his bill; but the Earl of May, Lord Justice-General of Scotland, interposed, and acquainted the Regents, how unreasonable a thing this was; and particularly that men, suspected of disaffection to his Majesty's Government, should have the public money distributed among them. Upon this the Lords Regents ordered the Duke of Arbol, Lord Privy-Seal, to put an immediate stop to all grants, that were not passed before the Queen's death; which disappointed those Gentlemen of their money, and saved 4000 l. to the Government.

When the King was proclaimed at Glasgow, forty or fifty unknown persons, while the Magistrates were busy in attending the proclamation, took an opportunity to pull down the Episcopal Meeting-House there, where one Mr Cockburn had set up the English Liturgy, by countenance of the late Government, more to disgust the Citizens, than in hopes of gaining Proselytes. As soon as the Magistrates heard of it, they sent to apprehend the actors, and to prevent the pulling down the House; but they had done their work, and made their escape, before the Magistrates came thither; so that none of them were discovered or taken. The Jacobite party took occasion from hence to reflect upon the Presbyterians, as if they had persecuted those of the Church of England, and inserted an account of it in the Post-Boy, with all the aggravating circumstances, that their malice and invention could suggest. Complaint was likewise made of it to the Regency, who ordered the Lord Advocate of Scotland to inquire into it. There was found good reason to suspect, that the thing was done on purpose by the disaffected party, to raise a clamour; because Mr Cockburn, the day before, had retired with his family and effects to Edinburgh, though the Magistrates of Glasgow had given him assurance of protection. This account being taken upon oath by the Magistrates, and sent up to the Regency, put an end to that matter. Thus stood affairs in Scotland, at the time of King George's Accession.

As for Ireland, the chief thing to be dreaded there, was the great number of Papists, who are ever ready to throw off the yoke of the English. A little more conduct in King James II., and a little more assistance from France, would have endangered that Kingdom. And, at the time of the Queen's death, Popery was in much the same situation.

Indeed there seemed to be no danger from any foreign power. Holland would not fail to fulfil all engagements: The King of himself was powerful: He had on foot a good number of troops, which, without obstacle, could have been embarked in his own Dominions. But, after all, Lewis XIV. was still alive: it could not be doubted, but that it was against his will that he had acknowledged the Protestant Succession, and promised not to disturb it. He was assuredly in the same sentiments still, and perhaps thought himself more obliged to keep his word with King James, on his death bed, never to forsake his son, than the engagements, the necessity of a peace had forced him into. It may be, what he would not do directly, he might do indirectly; With money, may not troops, arms and ships soon be had? It will be seen in the course of this history, that, without any aid, the English and Scots raised such an insurrection, as caused great disturbances: and what would they have done, had they been assisted! In vain would the King have depended on his own troops; they could not be brought over without the consent of the Parliament, and the English are too jealous of their liberty, to suffer any foreign forces, and it is with some sort of regret, that they bear even those of the States.

Such was the situation of the British Dominions and of Europe, when King George came to the Throne; and therefore it is no wonder, that, upon his arrival in England, his first proceedings expressed a dislike of the Tories and the late Ministry, and shewed his attachment to the Whigs. The persons, he had named for the Regency, were a plain proof what the friends of the late Ministry were to expect. He had, even before his arrival, removed the Lord Bolingbroke (1), and appointed the Lord Townshend Secretary of State in his room. The day after his landing at Greenwich, he sent the new Secretary to, acquaint the Duke of Ormond, that he had no longer occasion for his service as Captain-General, but would be glad to see him at Court.

These changes were followed by many others: The Duke of Marlborough was made Captain-General of the land-forces, Colonel of the first regiment of Foot-guards, and Master of the Ordnance. The Lord Cowper was made Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Warren Privy-Seal, and the Earl of Sunderland Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. The Duke of Devonshire was appointed Steward of the Household in the room of Earl Paulet, and Mr James Stanhope Secretary of State in the room of Mr Bromley, and the Duke of Montrose in the room of the Earl of Mar. The Duke of Somerset was made Master of the Horse, the Duke of St Albans Captain of the Band of Pensioners, and the Duke of Argyle 1714. Commander in Chief of the forces in Scotland, Mr William Pulteney was made Secretary of War, and Mr Robert Walpole Receiver and Pay-master-General of all the guards and garrisons, and all other forces of Great-Britain, and Pay-master to Chelsea Hospital, in the room of Mr How and Mr Moore. The Privy-Council was dissolved, and a new one declared, of which the Earl of Nottingham was President (2). Out of the Privy-Counsellors a Cabinet Council was formed, consisting chiefly of the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Marlborough, the Earls of Nottingham, Sunderland, The Lords Hallifax, Townshend, Sommers, and General Stanhope. All these had distinguished themselves by their professed opposition to the late measures, and the peace.

The Governors of places were also most of them changed. General Erle was made Governor of Portsmouth. There were as many alterations in Ireland as in England. Before the King's arrival, the behaviour of Sir Constantine Phipps had been such, that the Regency had removed him, as well as the Archbishop of Armagh, from being Lords-Justices of that Kingdom, and in their room appointed the Archbishop of Dublin and the Earl of Kildare, for which they had the King's letter of approbation and thanks (3). Alan Broderick was made Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and William Walsby Chief Justice. The Privy-Council was also dissolved, and another named, of which the Duke of Ormond was one (4).

All these changes were made before the Coronation, which was fixed to the 20th of October. The King is by some blamed, for not having joined to the great number of Whigs a few more of the Tories, which they suppose would have prevented the general discontent of that party. But it was very difficult for the King not to do as he did. The inclination which the Pretender had indiscreetly asserted, the Queen had for him in the latter years of her life * could be ascribed only to those who had the management of affairs. The Ministry, resolutely bent to end the war, notwithstanding the complaints of all the Allies (who placed their safety in the humbling of France) and particularly, notwithstanding the repeated opposition of the Duke of Hanover, they could not but be sensible, that, if he one day became their Master,

(1) Shortly after the King's arrival, a message having been sent to the Lord Bolingbroke, in the Country, for his coming to town, to be present at the taking off the Seals that had been put on his Office; he excused himself, saying, 'The same might as well be done by one of his Secretaries; but, if he could be so happy as to have the honour to kiss the King's hand, he would fly to throw himself at his Majesty's feet.'

(2) The rest were: The Prince of Wales, Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Lord Chancellor Cowper, the Dukes of Strevinsbury, Devonshire, Somerset, Bilton, Marlborough, Argyle, Montrose, Roxburgh, Kent, Marquis of Lindsey Lord Great-Chamberlain, the Earls of Warren Privy-Seal, Pembroke, Suffolk, Sunderland, Anglesea, Carlisle, Abington, Scarborough, Orford, Viscount Townshend, Bishop of London, the Lords Sommers and Hallifax, Thomas Coke Vice-Chamberlain, James Stanhope Secretary of State, Sir Thomas Parker Chief-Justice, Thomas Erle Lieutenant-

(3) On the 14th of Sept. the Regency had advice from Dublin, that, upon the removal of Sir Constantine Phipps and the Archbishop of Armagh, from being Lords-Justices of Ireland, there was an universal joy among all the friends of his Majesty's Succession; and that some of the populace, who were filled with resentment against Sir Constantine, went to his house, in order to insult him; but he had beforehand retired to the Castle.

(4) Some time after the following creations were made in Ireland.

George Cholmondeley, Esq; Baron Newburgh.
Alan Broderick, Esq; Baron Broderick.
Sir George St George, Baron St George.
Sir Arthur Cole, Baron Ranelagh.
Sir John Percival, Baron Percival.
Richard Fitz-Patrick, Esq; Baron Gerran.
George Evans, Esq; Baron Carbery.

(1) The

1714. Master, he would not fail to sacrifice them to his own, and the resentment of the Allies, whose projects they had disappointed, and whose hopes they had confounded. It was therefore natural to think, they had taken measures to prevent any danger from him. A thousand circumstances supported these conjectures: The dowry paid to King James's Queen: The small reward offered for taking the Pretender: The conniving at the lifting of men in his service: The suffering the Revolution to be publicly talked and preached against, and doctrines to be vented, destructive of the principles on which it was built: The little care to have an eye to Scotland, to redress the grievances complained of by that Nation, and which were capable of driving them to extremities: England unprovided of troops, as well as Scotland and Ireland, whilst under frivolous pretences several regiments were kept in Flanders: All this amounted to a sort of demonstration, that the Queen's death alone had prevented the defeating of the Protestant Succession, and the destroying all that had been done for above twenty years to secure and justify the exclusion of King James and his pretended Heir. Now can there be to a Prince attacked in so important a point, any room for pardon or dissimulation?

Besides, there was a kind of necessity to espouse one of the two parties, who had by turns prevailed under King William and Queen Anne. By that means he would be freed from the continual trouble of managing and keeping the balance even between them, and perhaps from the danger of having both turn against him. The Whigs were really enemies of France and the Pretender, and could not be otherwise; they had constantly declared for the Protestant Succession, and though, in some of their proceedings, the spirit of party no less appeared than a true zeal, yet they might be depended upon. To the Whigs the Court of Hanover was indebted, for obliging the French King and the Duke of Lorraine not to suffer the Pretender in their Dominions, and for the advices of what was contriving against the interests of the Protestant Successor. This being the case, there was no room to deliberate which party to chuse. King William, accustomed from his youth to dissimulation, might have deliberated, or seemed to have done so: But the Elector of Hanover, absolute Master in his German Dominions, and consequently unused to faction and party, was hardly capable of that dissimulation, so requisite in a Government like that of England.

Notwithstanding all the changes and the disgrace of so many persons, no ill effects followed. Addresses from the Universities, the Counties, Cities, Boroughs, and Corporations, expressed the public joy and satisfaction at the King's Accession, though in a very different stile; for some insinuated that the Protestant Succession had not been in danger, whilst others spoke of the late Ministry in very severe terms, and mentioned the utmost dread of their measures (1).

The first time the King was present at the Privy-Council, after he had taken the oath relating to the security of the Church of Scotland, he made the following declaration:

'Having, in my answers to addresses of both Houses of Parliament, fully expressed my resolution to defend the religious and civil rights of all my subjects, there remains very little for me to say upon this occasion.

Yet having been willing to omit no opportunity of giving all possible assurances to a people, who have already deserved so well of me; I take this occasion also to express to you my firm purpose, to do all that is in my power for

The King's declaration in Council. Sept. 22.

(1) The address of the University of Cambridge, after condoling the Queen's death, and congratulating the King's Accession, proceeds as follows:

'It would be unpardonable folly and downright insatiation, if any of your Majesty's Protestant subjects should turn their eyes to a Popish Pretender, who can never reign over us but to the certain loss of every thing, that ought to be dear to us, either as we are Britons or Protestants. But then your Majesty's most loyal University must be utterly incapable of a thought, so destructive to our most holy Faith, so opposite to our happy Constitution both in Church and State, so full of ingratitude to God, and of injustice to your Majesty, who, by the death of our late Sovereign, hath now alone the rightful and undoubted title to the Imperial Crown of these Realms, which receives a new lustre by your Majesty's happy Accession to it.

Out of a deep sense of these things, and in obedience to the just and wholesome laws of the Realm, and in a conscientious regard to our repeated oaths, we most humbly presume to assure your Majesty, that as our own studies and endeavours shall always be employed in the defence of your Majesty's sacred Person and Government, and your just and rightful title to our allegiance against the Pretender, and all other your Majesty's enemies and opposers whatsoever; so shall it be likewise our especial care, that all those, who are educated amongst us, be instructed in the same true principles of loyalty and duty to your Majesty.'

The address of the University of Oxford was in a different stile:

'The inexpressible loss, we have sustained by the death of our late Sovereign of blessed memory, would No. 83. VOL. IV.

have been insupportable, had not God, in his great goodness to this Nation, supplied it to us by your Majesty's happy and quiet Accession to the Throne. With the prospect of this blessing we comforted ourselves, as often as we apprehended that precious life to be in danger; for, knowing the sincerity of our hearts, we never suspected, that any persons would be so regardless of their duty and of their interest, as not to support, with the utmost zeal, that Succession, to which they were bound by the most solemn oaths, and on which the preservation of our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, did next, under God, so manifestly depend. Our expectations, our wishes, and our prayers, have been answered by that unanimity, with which your subjects have recognized your Majesty's undoubted right, that impatience they have expressed to see your Royal person in the actual possession of your Throne, and themselves happy under the influence of your Government.'

The addresses of Oxford and Gloucester were very remarkable. In the Oxford address was this passage:

'We hope, that the universal approbation, with which your Majesty entered your Reign, will be an happy omen of unanimity among us: All the insinuations, as if the Protestant Succession was in danger, must now appear (as they were) groundless, and only a contrivance of designing men to divide us. We can now have no strife, but who shall shew the greatest zeal for your sacred Majesty, for our admirable Church and happy Constitution, in opposition to your Majesty's enemies, to Popery and Schism, and to all Anti-monarchical and Republican principles.'

1714. for the supporting and maintaining the Churches of England and Scotland, as they are severally by law established; which I am of opinion may be effectually done, without the least impairing the Toleration allowed by law to Protestant Dissenters, so agreeable to Christian charity, and so necessary to the trade and riches of this Kingdom. The good effects of making property secure are no where so clearly seen, and to so great a degree, as in this happy Kingdom; and I assure you, that there is not any among you shall more earnestly endeavour the prefervation of it than myself.

At the same time the Prince Royal was declared Prince of Wales, and took his seat at the upper end of the Board, at the King's right-hand. Soon after the Treasury was put in Commission, and also the Admiralty. The Commissioners of the Treasury were the Lord Halifax, Sir Richard Onslow Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir William St Quintin, Edward Wortley Montague, and Paul Meibum. Those of the Admiralty were the Earl of Orford, Sir George Byng, George Dodington, Sir John Jennings, Sir Charles Turner, Abraham Stanyan, and George Baile. John Aislabie was made Treasurer of the Navy, and the Earl of Cholmondeley was appointed Treasurer, Hugh Boscawen Comptroller, and Edmund Dunch Master of the King's Household. Dr Samuel Garth was knighted, who had lately published a Latin Dedication, which he intended to prefix to an edition of Lucretius three years before; but it was not then thought seasonable.

On the 9th of October N. S. the two eldest Princesses of Great-Britain, Anne and Amelia, set out from Hanover, to go, by easy journeys, to the Hague; the youngest Princess Caroline being left at Hanover, on account of a late indisposition. Three days after, the Princess of Wales set out for Holland, attended by the Countess of Pickenburgh; and, on the 17th, arrived at the Hague, with the two eldest Princesses her Daughters. The next morning she received the compliments of the States-General, by Deputies nominated for that purpose; and, the weather being fair, she appeared in the afternoon in the Voorhout, attended by a very numerous train of coaches; and, in the evening, kept a drawing-room, at which all the Ladies and Persons of distinction of that place were present. The next day she received visits from the French Ambassador, and other foreign Ministers. The Earl of Berkeley and Sir John Walter of the Green Cloth were come thither five days before, having left the squadron of men of war at Helvoet-Sluis, with orders for the yachts to come up to Rotterdam. The Princess being informed by the Earl, that the wind was easterly, on the 20th of October, N. S. she went on board a yacht of the States of Holland, accompanied by the Earl of Albemarle, and the rest of the Deputies of that Province; by the Count of Hannau, and the Counts, her Sister, Prince William of Hesse, and the Prince of Anhalt. The Earl of Strafford accompanied her also part of her way to Rotterdam, where being arrived, she embarked on board the Mary yacht, and with the two Princesses and their retinue, landed at Margate, October 11, O. S. and the next evening arrived at Rochester. The Prince of Wales, having early that day received the news of her arrival, set out about seven o'clock in the morning, accompanied by the Dukes of Somerset and Argyle, and the Earl of Bridgewater, Lord Chamberlain to their Royal Highnesses. The Prince met the Princess beyond Rochester, where she was attended by the Countesses of Dorset and Berkeley, who had been named two of the Ladies of the Bed-chamber. Their Royal Highnesses passed through the City of London in a chariot with six horses, followed by another, in which were the two young Princesses, and came to St James's on the 13th of October (1).

The day appointed for the Coronation drawing near, the King, as usual on such occasions, advanced some of the Peers to higher titles, and created some new ones (2). Five days after, the Coronation, Oct. 20.

In that of Gloucester were these words:

'Her late Majesty at last by a happy peace (which God continue to us and our children) secured your Majesty's quiet Succession, which she had always at heart, and was careful of through her whole Reign. Your Majesty succeeds in our hearts: No time, no accident, can make us otherwise than truly loyal. It is our principle to obey your Majesty without reserve, for we think you accountable to none upon earth: And the same principles will embolden us unanimously to resist your Majesty's enemies, and, with all that is dear to us, to defend your Majesty's just title to the Crown you wear, against all persons whatsoever. And these our inclinations and principles we owe to our steady adherence to the Established Church of England, the glory of the Reformation, truly Ancient, truly Apostolical, for her submission and obedience to Kings and Governors, for her mild behaviour to those, who have formerly torn out her very bowels. No Church upon earth can then so antient a Charter, so unlimited Obedience, so universal Charity: No Church can boast so great a Defender. May your love to each other find no bounds. May it please your Majesty, we here speak the sense of all your people, who are truly loyal, and are assured they are vastly more numerous than those, who are but occasionally so; and therefore doubt not to send your Majesty Members of Parliament, who are not of those, whose principles are to obey no longer than they are pleased.'

On the contrary, in the address from Nottingham, presented by their Member Mr Plumtree, it is said:

'With pleasure we now look back upon our past dangers, with joy we see those intrigues and stratagems disappointed, which were so artfully contrived by some ill designing men to effect our ruin, and from that dreadful storm which lately threatened us, and which, by divine Providence, and the wise conduct of your Majesty, is blown over, we cannot but address ourselves to your sacred Person, as our second Great Deliverer, from a slavish yoke, and a Popish Impostor.'

In the address from the County of Hereford is this paragraph:

'We are the more sensible of the inestimable blessing of your Majesty's Accession to the Throne, because we had very lately so much reason to apprehend, we were in danger of being deprived of it, by the designs of ambitious men, who, if God had not prevented them, to raise themselves to power and riches, had sacrificed their country to tyranny and superstition.'

There never was so great an appearance of Lords Spiritual and Temporal, as on this occasion, no less than seventeen Archbishops and Bishops, though two Sees were then vacant; all the Dukes in or about London, except the Duke of Buckingham; seventy Earls and Viscounts, and amongst them the Earl of Oxford and Viscount Bolingbroke; and as many Barons. The demonstrations of joy throughout the Kingdom on the Coronation-day seemed to be general, and were in proportion as splendid as at London, some few places excepted, where the rabble shewed their hatred to the Protestant Succession, by riots and outrages (2). The University of Oxford (who, the day before, had presented to the King by Dr Gardiner, their Vice-Chancellor, a book of verses on the death of Queen Anne, and the Accession of his Majesty to the Throne) on the Coronation-day, conferred unanimously, in a full Convocation, the degree of Doctor of Civil Law on Sir Constantine Phipps, with all imaginable marks of honour and esteem.

(1) The forms were much the same as in former Coronations; what was particular in this was as follows:

The procession of the Officers, and then the Peers, from Westminster-Hall to the Abbey-Church, being closed by two persons representing the Dukes of Aquitain and Normandy, the Lords, who bore the Regalia, came in turn. The Earl of Salisbury, with St Edward's staff; the Lord Viscount Longueville, with the spurs; the Earl of Dorset, with the scepter and cross; the Earls of Sunderland, Pembroke, and Lincoln, with the three swords. Then Garter's Deputy, with his coronet between the Usher of the Black-Rod, and the Lord-Mayor of London; then the Lord Great-Chamberlain single; then the Prince of Wales in his robes of State of crimson velvet furred with ermin; his coronet, with precious stones, and cap borne by the Earl of Hertford on a crimson velvet-cushion, and wearing a cap of crimson velvet turned up with ermin, by his Majesty's permission; his train supported by Adolphus Oughton, and another Groom of his Bed-chamber, assisted by Henry Killigrew, Gentleman of his Royal Highness's Robes. Then the Earl of Derby, with the sword of State, between the Duke of Mountrague, Lord High-Constable for that day, and the Earl of Suffolk and Bindon, as Earl-Marshal of England; the Duke of Grafton, Lord High-Steward on that occasion, with the Crown, between the Duke of Argyle, bearing the scepter with the Dove, and the Duke of Somerfet with the orb; the Bishop of Salisbury with the bible, and the Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry with the patten, and the Bishop of Bangor with the chalice. Then the KING in his Royal robes of crimson velvet, furred with ermin, and bordered with a rich broad gold lace, wearing the collar of the order of St George, and on his head a cap of State of crimson velvet, turned up with ermin, adorned with a circle of gold, enriched with diamonds, supported by the Bishops of Durham and Bath and Wells, under a canopy borne by the Barons of the Cinque-Ports. The Litany was sung by the Bishops of Litchfield and Coventry and Norwich, and the Sermon preached by Dr William Talbot, Bishop of Oxford, Father to the late Lord Chancellor. The Bishop observes in his Sermon, 'Queen Anne not only passed laws for the further establishment of the Protestant Succession, but by her Arms, and those of her Allies, had, in human appearance, placed it almost out of danger, having, in eight campaigns, so glorious in the conduct, and so astonishing in the success of them, as not to be paralleled in history, so far reduced the only power, that could interrupt it, that there was little more wanting to have completed our security. But whether it was to correct us for some sins, whereby we had provoked God to anger, or to chastise our confidence, which, it may be, we placed too much in the arm of flesh; or to convince us, that his Providence, which alone began, should alone have the glory of finishing this great work; he was pleased to suffer us to fall into a condition, from which nothing else could have relieved us. Our enemy, who had set up a Pretender to this Throne, raised from a state of asking Peace, to a condition of giving Peace and Princes too to Europe; our Allies, some divided from us, others miserably disjoined; and we ourselves not only unguarded, but wretchedly broken into parties and factions at home. The friends of the Pretender thought these circumstances so encouraging, that they openly avowed his title in writing and discourse, and his Agents as boldly enlisted soldiers to assert it with the sword. And he must have been very sanguine, who, in this view of things, could have thought, that the Pretender, whom our Queen's repeated instances could not remove from a situation, which her Parliament thought too near us, would not, upon her Majesty's demise, have brought a foreign army to join his friends here, before the Protestant Heir, who was at a much greater distance, could have arrived, to have maintained his own just right, or defended his faithful subjects. But when that day was come, that was to put a period to that Royal life, on the continuance of which alone, this threatening danger seemed suspended; then was God pleased to mix so much mercy with the stroke, as by his Providence to order it, that the unsettled posture of affairs abroad would not permit the Pretender's foreign friends to send any forces to encourage an insurrection; and the unreadiness of his surprized abettors here would not permit them to appear in such a manner, as to invite an invasion; but our King was peaceably proclaimed, to the universal joy of his people.'

(2) Dr Sachverell was at that time at Sutton, near Birmingham in Warwickshire, where he preached on the 1714. of Utrecht, the demolition of Dunkirk; from whence the trade of England and Holland had been greatly incommoded during the late wars. Instead of executing this article, the French King had entirely evaded it; and therefore Mr Prior, who was still Resident at Paris, was ordered to present a memorial to him, pressing the performance of the 9th article of the treaty of Utrecht (1). The French King, who had used the distinction of the letter and spirit of treaties to justify his non-compliance with the treaty of Partition, adhered to the letter of this, and pretended he had fulfilled it in the utmost extent (2). His answer was not satisfactory; Prior was recalled, and the Earl of Stair sent in his room, who prosecuted the affair with great vigour. The Court of France would not yield, and declared in express terms, Mardyke was not Dunkirk, and that the treaty of Utrecht did not deprive the King of the natural right of a Sovereign, to make what works he should judge proper for the preservation of his subjects. The truth is, the Plenipotentiaries of Great-Britain had been too negligent in the affair. In stipulating the demolition of Dunkirk, it was doubtless their intention that another and better harbour should not be made on that coast;

but then it should have been so expressed; otherwise, in such articles all advantages will be taken by those on whom they are imposed.

The same fault had been committed in the treaty of Commerce with Spain. The advantages obtained in the body of the treaty were all explained away by the separate articles, and the result was, that the British goods and merchandizes paid seven per cent. more than had been paid before. King George applied himself also to redress this grievance. Spain, in imitation of France, adhered to the letter of the treaty, and would not agree that the terms should be explained according to the intentions of the Queen's Plenipotentiaries; and it was not till after much time and pains that this, and several other difficulties relating to the Assiento contract, were adjusted. So true is it, that a good Negotiator is as rare and as useful as a great General.

The Barrier Treaty, which was negotiating at Antwerp between the Emperor and the States-General, and which was of great consequence to the trade of England, drew also the attention of the new King. General Cadogan, intimate friend of the Duke of Marlborough, was sent as Plenipotentiary.

the Sunday before the Coronation; and above two hundred of the Birmingham people came so far to attend upon him, and the consequence of it appeared a day or two after. Several of the principal inhabitants of Birmingham having resolved in a suitable manner to express their joy on the day of the Coronation, an entertainment was prepared for them at the Coffee-Tavern. When the night came on, a tumultuous rabble got together, broke the windows of the house, and forced the company to remove: all the cry was Sacheverell for ever; and down with the Whigs. If any one in the street cried, God bless King George, he was in danger of his life. At Bristol also the mob broke the windows of Mr Whiting, the Under-Sheriff, who had offended them by prosecuting one guilty of perjury. They did the same at Mr Jeffrey's house; but fell in a still more furious manner on Mr Stevens's which they assaulted, entered, and plundered. One Mr Thomas, who persuaded them to withdraw, was murdered; and several Gentlemen insulted, hurt, and abused. At Chippenham in Wiltshire, the rabble armed with guns, pistols, and clubs, marched with beat of drum, and abused the Justices, Gentlemen, and Freemen, who were shewing their loyalty in solemnizing the King's Coronation. The same kind of disorders were committed at Norwich and Reading.

(1) The memorial was as follows:

The under-written Plenipotentiary, Minister of the King of Great-Britain, has orders from the King his Master to represent to your Majesty, that, having heard the report of the commissaries and engineers sent to view the state of the fortifications and port of Dunkirk, his Majesty is very much surprized to hear, that notwithstanding the instances and representations made on the part of Great-Britain, to press the execution of the 9th article of the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht, the said port is so little filled up, that there can still to this day as great ships as formerly pass by the old canal up to the hornwork of the town. So long as that canal remains, it cannot be denied, that there is still at Dunkirk a port of one thousand rods long, and consequently able to receive many hundred ships. The words of the treaty are, Portus Compleatur (that the haven shall be filled up) Aggeres aut moles diruantur (that the dykes which form the canal and the moles be destroyed). We appeal even to your Majesty's engineers, if the haven be filled up, and if the dykes be destroyed? The King his Master is very much persuaded that your Majesty, being fully informed of this fact, will give your strict orders, that at last that shall be accomplished, which, according to the words of the treaty, ought to have been done above a year ago. The same Minister has orders to represent to your Majesty, that the surprize of the King his Master has been still greater, when he was told, that notwithstanding the said 9th article, which says expressly, Ne dicta Munimenta, Portus, Moles, aut Aggeres denovo unquam reficiantur (that the said fortifications, port, or the dykes of Dunkirk shall never be rebuilt) that they are actually at work in making a new port, much larger than the old canal; which, as well as the old haven, goes up to the town of Dunkirk; and that the foundation of a sluice much greater than the former, which served to clean the old haven, is laid.

It cannot be imagined, that your Majesty will make use of the word Dicta, which is in that article, to maintain, that, since the same canal is not restored, the same materials are not made use of, and the same bastions and courtrains are not rebuilt, that your Majesty is at liberty to raise new works, and to make a new port better than the former. The Bona Fides, which ought to reign in all treaties, and which will be religiously observed by the King my Master, will not admit of such a supposition.

When ships can go into Dunkirk by the old canal, which is in the North, or by the new, which is on the West, Dunkirk will, in the same manner, be a port, and be equally incommodious and dangerous to the commerce of Great-Britain.

In either of these two cases the treaty will be equally violated. The King of Great-Britain is resolved, on his side, religiously to observe the treaty of Utrecht, and to maintain with your Majesty an amity so sincere, that he desires, above all things, to prevent all incidents, that may disturb that goodintelligence. And, as the hopes of seeing the entire execution of that 9th article has been to Great-Britain the principal motive for accepting the peace of Utrecht, he has ordered the under-written Minister to make the most pressing instances with your Majesty, that you will please to give order for the filling up the said canals, &c.

(2) His answer was as follows:

Pursuant to the 9th article of the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht, the harbour of Dunkirk, between the town and the citadel, is entirely filled up. Nevertheless, men are still at work, carrying into it the earth, that is produced by the demolishing of the Cavaliers of the citadel.

Seditious
Libels.The Pre-tender's manifesto.

In the mean time, the behaviour of the Jacobite and High-Church party occasioned the publishing a proclamation for suppressing of riots and tumults. Seditious libels were with great industry dispersed, jealousies infused into weak minds, and the groundless clamour of the danger of the Church revived (1). In November, the Dukes of Marlborough, Shrewsbury, and Argyle, the Earls of Nottingham and Sunderland, the Lord Townshend, the Marquis de Monteleone the Spanish Ambassador, the Count de Nostitz, and several other persons of distinction, received, by the mail from France, copies of a paper, printed in English, French, and Latin, signed at the top James R, and dated at Plombieres the 29th of August, 1714, N. S. being a kind of manifesto or declaration of the Preten-der, asserting his claim to the Crown of Great-Britain. He says, 'The Revolution ruined the English Monarchy, laid the foundation of a Republican Government, and devolved the Sovereign power on the people.' He observes, 'That when he found the treaty of peace was upon the point of being concluded, without any regard to him, he published, in April 1712, his protestation against it.' He then gives the reason of his sitting still for some time past, in these remarkable words: 'Yet, contrary to our expectations, upon the death of the Princess our Sister (of whose good intentions towards us, we could not for some time past well doubt: And this was the reason we then sat still, expecting the good effects thereof; which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death) we found, that

The words Portus completur can never be applied to the old canal, which is very different from the harbour; neither, to be sure, would the King ever have engaged entirely to destroy a canal of a thousand toises in length.

That would have been a work immoderately great, for the only time, men could have been employed therein, would have been at low water.

On the other hand, it would have been altogether needless, for the sea will soon carry away what remains of the dykes, that were made.

These dykes and jetties sink daily, and are washed away by the sea. But it having been lately demanded, on the part of the King of Great-Britain, that, to the end they might be carried off the sooner, the King would cause four coupures or outlets to be made therein, his Majesty gave orders accordingly; and, by means of this new work, the old canal will be so choaked up in a few days, that it will be level with the strand, and no shipping will be able to enter it. Nay, they will not be able to go up thither, even at high water, but as they do at all other places along the coast, quite from Newport to Calais.

The King has several times complained of the dilatoriness on the part of England, in point of executing the 9th article of the peace of Utrecht. It ought not therefore to be charged upon his Majesty. This is notorious.

It is well known too, that the fortifications of Dunkirk are demolished; and that the harbour is so filled up, that it would be impossible for the King to make it good again, did not his Majesty design (as he fully does) punctually to perform the treaty.

He has already several times answered the complaints, which for some time past he has received, about the work he was forced to make, to hinder a great track of land from being laid under water, which the ruining of the sluices of Dunkirk would have effected. However, he is willing to repeat once more the reasons he has given for that proceeding.

The waters of the canals of Furnes, La Moere, Wynoxberg, and Bourbourg, were discharged by the sluices of Dunkirk. This outlet was necessary to keep the castellanies of Bourbourg, Wynoxberg, and even some part of that of Furnes, from being overflowed, which, without it, they must infallibly have been. But the King, having promised utterly to destroy the sluices of Dunkirk, gave his orders for executing the treaty; and, in the mean while, caused a representation to be made to the Queen of Great-Britain, of the inconveniences, that would ensue upon this rigorous performance; desiring, at the same time, that she would suffer one of the three sluices, which were to be destroyed, to stand as it did.

This was denied by that Princess. So it became necessary to find out some other method for discharging the water of those four canals.

The English Commissioners and Engineers were witnesses of the several projects, that were formed for that purpose. They were full well acquainted with the design of the canal of Mardyke, and were of opinion, it was impossible to be executed. It is true, it was a very expensive one; and the King would gladly have saved that money, had it pleased the Queen of Great-Britain to leave one of the sluices of Dunkirk standing, only to discharge the waters from the country. But, upon her refusal, it was absolutely necessary to open this canal, to receive the waters of the four other canals.

These four old canals are navigable, and are together forty-eight toises broad; and consequently the new canal must needs have a sufficient breadth to receive all these waters, and discharge them into the sea.

The sluice also must necessarily be proportionable to the breadth of the canal, and to the quantity of waters it retains; for the point is, to hinder the tides getting into the country, and to keep in the waters of the four old canals at high tides.

The season pressed the finishing of that work; and, if the same had not been carried on with great diligence, what would not men have apprehended from the disorder, which the autumn-rains might occasion?

These are the motives, which obliged the King to cause the new canal of Mardyke to be opened, and to hasten the accomplishment of that work. His Majesty has no design, no intention to make a new harbour at Mardyke, to build a place there. He has already declared, and once more repeats it, that he is only willing to save a country, which would be laid under water, if this was not discharged into the sea.

For the rest, the King has given good proofs of his Bona Fides in the execution of the treaties. His Majesty has given particular marks thereof to the King of Great-Britain. He sees, with pleasure, the assurances which that Prince renews to him, that he will religiously observe the treaty of Utrecht, and maintain a sincere friendship with him.

In case of those happy dispositions, all incidents capable of disturbing this good understanding, may be easily avoided.

The King does not doubt but it will be perfect, when all suspicions on both sides shall be sincerely cleared up, and all suppositions vanished. It is for this end that his Majesty is pleased to repeat the reasons contained in this memorial, and that he again orders the Sieur d'Idreville, his Envoy Extraordinary, to give an account thereof to the King of Great-Britain. The 2d of November, 1714.

(1) Some of these libels were, Stand fast to the Church; Where are our Bishops now? The Religion of King George. No Presbyterian Government. The State-Gamster: Or, The Church of England's sorrowful Lamentation. Alop in Mourning. The Duke of Ormond's Vindication. The Lord Bolingbroke's Vindication. No Lord Protector: Or, The Duke of Marlborough's Design defeated. The Hawkers that cried these libels, and sung seditious ballads, were, by Sir William Humphreys, Lord-Mayor of London, taken up and sent to the House of Correction, for which he had the King's approbation, in a letter from Lord Townshend, Secretary of State.

that our people, instead of taking this favourable opportunity of retrieving the honour and true interest of their Country, by doing us and themselves justice, had immediately proclaimed for their King a foreign Prince, to our prejudice, contrary to the fundamental and incontestible laws of hereditary right, which their pretended acts of Settlement can never abrogate (1). The persons, who received this declaration, thought it their duty to deliver it into the hands of the Secretaries of State; upon which the Marquis de Lambert, the Duke of Lorraine's Minister, was forbid the Court, because such a thing could not be done at Plombieres without the countenance of his Master; and the following message was delivered to him by the Lord Townshend: 'That it was inconsistent with his Majesty's honour and dignity, as well as interest, to admit to audience the Minister of a Prince, who, at that very juncture, gave shelter and protection to a Pretender, and an open enemy to his Dominions.' The Marquis transmitted this message to the Duke of Lorraine, left London, and went to Oxford, to wait his Master's answer. This gave just cause of suspicion, that the Pretender and his Friends had formed a party in that University to advance his interest, as it afterwards appeared. The Marquis having received the Duke of Lorraine's answer, dated at Nancy, December the 6th, 1714, N. S. communicated it to the Lord Townshend. It was to this effect:

'I believe, Sir, you no ways doubt of my being extremely surprized to hear by the Courier, which came from you, that, when you applied to my Lord Townshend to obtain an audience, that Minister made answer, that, since the Chevalier de St George remained still in my Dominions, the King thought fit to forbid you the Court: In case his Majesty should continue in this disagreeable resolution with respect to me, I must submit to his pleasure, and you have nothing else to do, but to return hither as soon as you are able. However, you are first to apply to the Duke of Marlborough, and to the King's Ministers, desiring them to lay before his Majesty the unfortunate situation I am in, if, after having been so ready to let the King know the part I take in his accession to the Crown of England, and after having been one of the first to make my compliments, and show my zeal on this occasion, all Europe should be acquainted, that his Majesty had some reason to be dissatisfied with me. That I cannot conceive, whence this should proceed, since, as to the Chevalier de St George, the world knows, by what means he came into this County: That every one is informed of the situation of my territories, which are surrounded and cut through on all sides by France: That it is known how I had no share in his coming into my Country: That I neither invited him to come thither, nor could I force him to go away: That lately, upon the death of Queen Anne, I knew nothing of his leaving Bar, till twelve hours after he was gone from thence; and I knew nothing of his return to Bar, till after he was come back, as a traveller, that goes backwards and forwards in an open country, and intermixed with other Territories as mine is: As to the manifesto or declaration dated at Plombieres, which the Chevalier de St George had got printed, I knew nothing more of it, than that he gave me one after it had been published; but that really I am much concerned to hear from you, that it has been reported, that the same manifestoes have been spread abroad by you, or those of your retinue. I own to you, that I am extremely concerned at this, and that in some sort it seems to be a design to make me uneasy, to give out, that either

(1) Matthew Tindal, Doctor of Laws, published at London, 1715, in 8vo, Remarks on this Declaration, of both which it will be proper to give the following abstract:

The Pretender maintains, That the Revolution ruined the English Monarchy, laid the foundation of a Republican Government, and devolved the Sovereign power on the People; and that we are exposed to arbitrary power, and become a prey to Foreigners. This the Pretender, out of his hereditary courage and goodness, would have prevented, and therefore says, We parted from our ordinary residence, to put ourselves at the head of such of our loyal subjects, as were disposed to defend us and themselves from all foreign Invasion.

In answer to this, the Author of the Remarks observes, that the European Monarchies, founded on the Gothic Constitutions, were all at first Elective.

The Pretender, after having put the Nation in mind how he invaded Scotland, and boasted, that the miscarriage of that expedition could not be imputed to him, says, 'That, when he found the treaty of peace was upon the point of being concluded, without any regard to him, he published, April 1712, his protestation against it.'

Though the Princes of Europe have so often rejected all his pretensions, yet he thinks to cajole them, by saying, 'We hope, that all Christian Princes and Potentates, who are now in peace together, will reflect on the dangerous example here given them, and the formidable effects they are threatened with from such an united force, as that of England and Hanover; and that they will seriously consider, whether the exorbitant power, that now accrues to the House of Brunswick, be consistent with the balance of power they have been fighting for all this last war; and therefore we call on them for their assistance for the recovery of our Dominions, which their interest, as well as honour, engages them to grant us, as far as they are able.' Can any thing be more impolitic, than for this Popish Pretender, in the same declaration, in which he expects, that the Protestants of Great-Britain should rely on his word for the preservation of their Religion, to call on all Christian Princes to have no regard to their most solemn engagements, but to violate their faith, by breaking that peace, which they have so lately concluded? And nothing can be more ridiculous than his supposing, that France, as well as the rest of Europe, are in such immediate danger, by the exorbitant power of the House of Brunswick, that they are obliged, if they will preserve themselves, to fall upon it with their united forces. The Pretender, even while he is persuading the people of Great-Britain to take up arms against the King, cannot forbear telling them, that, by the Union of England and Hanover, they have got that balance of power, which all Europe has been so long fighting for; and representing their taking up arms as a most desperate attempt, by reason of that most exorbitant power, which, he says, is now in the House of Brunswick; and, as if he had a mind wholly to intimidate them, he affirms, that the Elector is a powerful Prince, supported by a good army of his own people, besides the assistance, which a neighbouring State (and he might have added the King of Prussia) is obliged to grant him upon demand; and many thousand of Aliens refused in England these thirty years past, who, having their dependence wholly upon him, will be ready to stand by him upon all occasions.

The Pretender labours to draw his loving subjects, as he 1714. either I or my servants meddled in such an affair.

These are the reasons which I have to offer, and which I would have you desire those Gentlemen to lay before the King, in hopes they will convince his Majesty of my most respectful adherence to him, and that his Majesty will be pleased to admit you to an audience.

But if, contrary to my expectation, the King will not grant you an audience, you are to come away, having desired the Ministers to let the King know the concern I am under; and that I hope his Majesty will please to accept of my good intentions, and the early care I took to shew him the inviolable zeal I have for him.

When the Marquis communicated this letter to the King's Ministers, he, at the same time, expressed his Master's 'deep concern at this unlucky affair, which obstructed the friendship and good understanding he had so early fought with his Britannic Majesty, for whom he ever entertained the highest esteem and veneration.' And he likewise expressed his own particular concern, and the great mortification it was to him, not to be admitted to a Court, which he had so great a desire to be made known to. He was answered, 'That it was not out of any prejudice to his person, nor even to the person of his Master, for whom the King had a great esteem. But that, as affairs stood at present, though his excuses were, in some measure, allowable, yet his Majesty was the best Judge of what was consistent with his own honour and dignity; and, as his Majesty was likewise sensible of the Duke's readiness to seek and cultivate a friendship with his Majesty, so the King wished, that the causes which obstructed the same at present, might be speedily removed.' The Marquis finding by this answer, that his Majesty insisted on the removal of the Pretender from the Dominions of Lorrain, before he would admit him to an audience, took his leave of the Lord Townshend, and, on the 13th of December, set out on his return home. In answer to that part of the Duke of Lorrain's letter, wherein he alledges, 'That his territories are surrounded and cut through on all sides by France; and that he neither invited the Chevalier de St George thither, nor could force him to go away;' a paper transmitted hither by Mr Prior, and delivered to him by the Marquis de Torcy, was said to be produced to the Marquis, whereby his most Christian Majesty declared, 'That he neither did, nor would, in any manner concern himself with the Chevalier de St George;' which declaration was directly contrary to the Duke of Lorrain's allegation.

When the Pretender's declaration came first into England, and was published in the foreign prints, the Jacobites and Tories insisted upon its being a contrivance of the Whigs, to reflect on the memory of the Queen, and to fix an odium upon the High-Church party, because in that declaration he said, That for some time past, he could not well doubt of his Sister's good intentions towards him. But they were much confounded by the Duke of Lorrain's letter, which owned the declaration to be genuine, and that the Pretender himself had given him one of them.

About the latter end of November, the King advanced the salaries of the Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, and of the Chief-Baron of the Exchequer, to the same sum, as was allowed the Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, being 2000*l.* a year, he calls them, into a civil war, by shewing them the mischief of such wars; and therefore says, What can our Subjects expect but endless wars and divisions, from subverting so sacred and fundamental a Constitution as that of hereditary right? Which has still prevailed against all usurpations, how successful, and how long time forever continued; the Government finding still no rest, till it returned again to its true center. But if what he calls successful usurpations have continued for a long time, and we may add, a much longer than his hereditary right, How can that be the true center of Government? Especially, if, of the nineteen successive Kings since the Conquest, thirteen of them did not come to the Crown by proximity of blood; and there have been more of those few, that did so succeed, deposed, than of the many, who did not, who were all of them not only looked on to have a competent authority during their lives, but their proceedings (upon the validity of which most of the titles to our estates depend) have been esteemed good in all ages.

He threatens us with other Popish Pretenders, and says, How can our Subjects be ignorant of the just pretence of so many other Princes, that are before the House of Hanover, whose right, after us, will be as undoubted as our own; who want neither will nor power to assert it in their turns; and to entail a perpetual war upon our Kingdoms, with a civil war in our own bowels, which their divisions will make unavoidable? The late Ministry must have reduced the Nation to a low condition indeed, if they dare not stand by their own settlement of the Crown, lest it offend the Popish House of Savoy, or any other Popish Pretender. But have not all these Popish Pretenders owned the right and title, not only of King William and Queen Mary, but of his Majesty, and consequently acknowledged, that the Parliament has a right to dispose of the Crown?

The Pretender says, We shall not think ourselves answerable before God and Man for the pernicious consequences, which this new usurpation of our Crowns may draw on our Subjects and all Christendom. Which is in effect saying, We have regard to nothing but our own private interest; and, for the sake of that, we care not what pernicious consequences we draw on these Nations and all Christendom. If it be lawful, after the Succession of four Kings or Queens, on pretence of a former indefeasible title, to disturb the peace of a Kingdom; it must be lawful (since no time can destroy such a title) after the Succession of four thousand; and then what Kingdom can promise itself the least peace or quiet?

Though the Pretender threatens a fatal war, yet he would have those, whom he calls his loving Subjects, think he has an unspeakable kindness for them; and, therefore tells them, It is not our interest alone we are concerned for; our natural and unalterable love for our People is such, that as we could not see without grief their blood and treasure lavished in the last war, in opposition to our undoubted right; so we cannot now with less sorrow see them exposed to be subjected to an arbitrary power, and become a prey to Foreigners. If indeed he had a natural and unalterable love for these Nations, he would, since he slipped the opportunity of making use of the good intentions of the Princess his Sister, rather quit his pretensions, than disturb the peace, and involve them in endless wars: Or, if he had any sense of honour, he would never endeavour to impose upon them by notorious falsehoods: And what can be more so, than this part of his declaration, which, though dated before the King came over, or had done any one act of Government, yet most maliciously charges him with designing to enslave the people, and make them become a prey to foreigners, who, by the laws, of which our

the Union.

About this time addresses were set on foot in Scotland, for dissolving the Union; and it was also proposed, that none should be elected Members of Parliament there, but such as would promise to use their endeavours for that purpose. Many well-meaning people seemed at first inclinable to fall in with those measures; but when they found, that the Jacobites were the most zealous in pushing this affair, in order to raise confusion and discord betwixt the two Nations, they refused to concur, and referred their grievances by the Union to be considered, when the Nation should be better settled. But there was a quite different spirit among the High-Church party in England, who excited riots and tumults in many parts of the Kingdom, to which they had been encouraged by the Pretender's declaration. To prevent these disorders, a proclamation was published on the 6th of December. 1714.

Religious disputes were at this time also at a great height. Dr Samuel Clarke having, before the Queen's death, published his Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity, the Lower-House of Convocation had complained of his book, as containing assertions contrary to the Catholic Faith. This complaint being laid before the Bishops, they desired an extract to be made of such passages, as gave greatest offence, and were most liable to censure. Accordingly, the Lower-House made an extract, and having sent it up to the Bishops, Dr Clarke, whilst it was under consideration, wrote a reply to it, which was presented to some of the Bishops, but was not laid before the House. After this, there appeared in almost the whole Upper-House a great disposition to prevent dissensions and divisions, by coming to a temper in this matter, and Dr Clarke our King has shewn himself a most religious observer, are excluded from all places of trust and profit?

Did not the Pretender, bred up in the politics of France, think every one, that could enslave a nation, would certainly do it, he would not talk at this rate, nor think to terrify us by saying, The Elector is a powerful Prince, and absolute in his own country, where he has never met with the least contradiction from his own subjects. It is so far true, the Elector never met with the least contradiction from his subjects; but then it is as true, he never required any thing of them, but what was for their good; and subjects will never think a Prince's power too great, when he is always contriving how to employ it most for their service; and thinks his greatest happiness consists in making them happy.

The Pretender says, The Elector is a foreigner, ignorant of our laws, customs, manners, and language; but for himself, We are the only born Englishman left of the Royal Family. Though the Pretender was born in England, yet, since he was carried into France in his cradle, this could not qualify him to understand our laws, customs, and manners; and he, who seems to understand nothing but the ridiculous trumperies of the Romish Church, must be an utter stranger to the laws and customs of the Nation; nor can he have a notion of any Constitution, but one as arbitrary as that of France. Merely being born in a country cannot create in a man the least kindness for it: The place indeed, where one is bred (usually the same where he is born) and the persons with whom he is bred, generally prejudice a man in their favour; and consequently the Pretender ought to be accounted by the people of Great-Britain as much a Frenchman, as if he had been born there: And 'tis all grimace and French banter to talk of his natural and unalterable love for the English.

Though he would have it thought, that King George's being a foreigner renders him unfit to govern this Nation; yet he will not allow it to be any manner of objection to himself, or any other Pretender of the Popish line.

Was not King James II. born and bred among us, and under the greatest obligations to the Church of England, and bound by the most solemn engagements to preserve our laws and religion? And yet that did not hinder him, as soon as he got into the Throne, from attempting the subversion of both. And did not we owe the preservation of both to a foreigner?

Was not the Pretender, though born here, educated among the enemies of our country and religion? Who, from the first moment he was capable of understanding any thing, could hear nothing from those disappointed persons about him, but reviling the English Nation. And has not this early aversion been daily improved by the French, who bear an hereditary hatred to the English? And can it be thought that the Italian Princes, who call herself his mother, as well as the Priests and

Jesuits (to whose interest he is entirely devoted) have not used all arts to create in him a mortal aversion to those they call heretics and rebels?

Add to this, that his morose, sullen, and revengeful temper makes him apt to receive the worst impressions: So that nature, education, religion, (not to mention want of understanding) have rendered him, of all mankind, the most unfit, notwithstanding his being born here, to govern Protestants and Free born Britons.

Could we suppose the Pretender, though a Papist, no Persecutor of Protestants, and with his French education no hater of the English; yet, as he must be wholly in the power of those foreign popish forces, with which he designs to invade the Dominions of so powerful a King; so he could not hinder them, if they got the better, from treating the people with the utmost cruelty. All Churchmen then, whether high or low, would, as at the Irish massacre, be involved in one common ruin. Then all that the Nation is worth, could not satisfy the demands of France, for what they had expended in behalf of the abdicated family. In a word, concludes the author of the Remarks, since there is no scene of cruelty, that even the reading of the Popish massacres can suggest, but what the Protestants of these Nations had reason to apprehend, if faithless and blood-thirsty men had prevailed; ought we not, every day of our lives, to pour out our thanks to the Father of all mercies, for having to wonderfully brought about this great deliverance; and to take the utmost care to avoid all such divisions, as may encourage any more attempts from this Popish Pretender? Which nothing can more effectually hinder, than the chusing such men to represent us in the next Parliament, who no ways abetted the execrable designs of the late Ministry, but are truly and heartily in the interest of their King and Country. This, and this only, can put us upon a happy and lasting establishment.

(1) Sir Peter King, Recorder of London, was appointed Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, in the room of the Lord Trevor; and Samuel Dodd was made Chief-Baron of the Exchequer; Sir James Montague, a Baron of that Court, in the room of Serjeant Banister; Serjeant Pratt, a Judge of the King's Bench, in the room of Sir Thomas Paines; Nicholas Lechmere, Solicitor-General, in the room of Sir Robert Raymond; Spencer Cowper, Attorney-General; and John Fortescue Aland, Solicitor-General to his Royal Highness. About the same time it was made public, that the Duchesses of Bolton, the Duchesses of St Alban's, the Duchesses of Mountague, the Countesses of Dorset, the Countesses of Berkeley, and the Lady Cowper, were made Ladies of the Bed-Chamber to the Princesses of Wales; and Mrs Selwyn, Mrs Pollexfen, Mrs Howard, and Mrs Clayton, Bed-chamber women to her Royal Highness.

It

1714. Clarke was prevailed upon to lay before them a paper, in order to put an end to the affair (1). Dr Clarke being apprehensive, that, if his paper should be published separately without a true account of the preceding and following circumstances, it might be liable to be misunderstood in several particulars, caused, three days after, an explanation to be delivered to the Bishop of London (2). The same day, the Upper House came to a resolution to enter the paper and explanation in the acts of the House, to communicate the same to the Lower-House, and to proceed no farther upon the extract. But the Lower-House were of a different opinion, and resolved, that the paper was no recantation of his heretical assertions, nor did give such satisfaction for the great scandal occasioned by his writings, as ought to put a stop to any further examination.

Thus stood the affair at the Queen's death, and, the disputes about the Trinity increasing, on the 11th of December were published directions to the Archbishops and Bishops, for the preserving unity in the Church, and the purity of the Christian Faith, concerning the Holy Trinity; and also for preserving the peace and quiet of the State.

These directions were:

I. That no Preacher whatsoever, in his Sermon or Lecture, do presume to deliver any other doctrine concerning the blessed Trinity, than what is contained in the holy Scriptures, and is agreeable to the three Creeds, and the thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

II. That, in the explication of this doctrine, they carefully avoid all new terms, and confine themselves to such ways of expression, as have been commonly used in the Church.

III. That care be taken, in this matter, especially to observe the fifty-third Canon of this Church, which forbids public opposition between Preachers, because (as that Canon expresses it) there groweth thereby much offence and disquietness unto the people: And that, above all things, they abstain from bitter invectives and scurrilous language against all persons whatsoever.

IV. That none of the Clergy, in their Sermons and Lectures, presume to intermeddle in any affairs of State or Government, or the Constitution of the Realm, save only on such special feasts and fasts, as are or shall be appointed by public authority; and then no farther than the occasion of such days shall strictly require. Provided always, that nothing in this direction shall be understood to discharge any person from preaching in defence of the Regal Supremacy established by law, as often, and in such manner, as the first Canon of the Church doth require.

V. That

It was generally reported and believed, that Robert Price, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, would be laid aside upon the demise of the Queen, he having always shewn an indifference with respect to the Protestant Succession: But he was continued, and it was thought he owed his continuance to his readiness to go down to Bristol, with Sir Littletton Pown and Robert Tracy, two other Judges, and to try those, who had been guilty of the riot there, on the day of the King's Coronation. The cry of these rioters was Sacheverell and Ormond: Damn all foreign Governments. On the 27th of November, seven of the chief rioters were brought to their trials for assaulting and plundering Mr Stephen's house, and murdering Mr Thomas. During the trials Mr Hart, a Tobacco-Merchant, who had been made a Justice of the Peace by the last Ministry, behaved himself with such insolence, that he was ordered to quit the Bench. Another reflected so scandalously upon the Grand-Jury, that he was ordered to the bar, and bound over to answer for his offence. Six of the prisoners were found guilty of the riot; and one of them, upon whom Mr Stephen's wearing apparel had been found, was convicted of Felony and Burglary to the value of ten-pence only. All the criminals convicted of the riot were fined each twenty nobles only, to be imprisoned three months, and give security for twelve months for their good behaviour. As the proofs against them were plain, a house being plundered, and a man murdered by them, it was thought surprizing, that not one of them suffered capitally for these crimes. The Grand-Jury for the City and County of Bristol drew up an address to the King, in which they returned their unfeigned thanks for his great goodness in sending a special commission to that City, not only to protect his good subjects, but to prevent for the future such riotous assemblies, which for these four last years that before happy place had been exposed to. And they were sorry to say, that these assemblies had been encouraged and abetted by some of their own Fellow-Citizens, who had from time to time notoriously espoused their cause, and, as far as in them lay, had screened them from justice.

(1) The paper was as follows:

1. My opinion is, that the Son of God was eternal. No. 84. VOL. IV.

nally begotten by the eternal incomprehensible power and will of the Father; and that the Holy Spirit was likewise eternally derived from the Father, by or through the Son, according to the eternal incomprehensible power and will of the Father.

2. Before my book, intitled, The Scripture Doctrine, &c. was published, I did indeed preach two or three sermons upon this subject; but, since the book was published, I have never preached upon this subject: And (because I think it not fair to propose particular opinions, where there is not liberty of answering) I am willing to promise (as indeed I intended) not to preach any more upon this subject.

3. I do not intend to write any more concerning the doctrine of the Trinity. But if I shall fall herein, and write any thing hereafter, upon this subject, contrary to the doctrine of the Church of England, I do hereby willingly submit myself to any such censure, as my superiors shall think fit to pass upon me.

4. And whereas it has been confidently reported, That the Athanasian Creed, and the third and fourth petitions in the Litany, have been omitted in my church by my direction, I do hereby declare, that the third and fourth petitions in the Litany have never been omitted at all, as far as I know; and that the Athanasian Creed was never omitted at eleven o'clock prayers, but at early prayers only, for brevity sake, at the discretion of the Curate, and not by my appointment.

5. As to my private conversation, I am not conscious to myself, that I have given any just occasion for those reports which have been spread concerning me, with relation to this controversy.

I am sorry that what I sincerely intended for the honour and glory of God, and so to explain this great mystery, as to avoid the heresies in both extremes, should have given any offence to this Synod, and particularly to my Lords the Bishops. I hope my behaviour for the time to come, with relation hereunto, will be such, as to prevent any future complaints against me.

(2) The explanation was thus:

Whereas the paper laid before your Lordships, on Friday last, was, through haste and want of time, not drawn up with sufficient exactness; some things therein

V. That the foregoing directions be also observed by those, who write any thing concerning the said subjects.

VI. Whereas also we are credibly informed, that it is the manner of some in every Diocese, before their Sermon, either to use a Collect and the Lord's Prayer, or the Lord's Prayer only (which the fifty-fifth Canon prescribes as the conclusion of the Prayer, and not the whole Prayer) or at least to leave out our titles, by the said Canon required to be declared and recognized: We do further direct, that you require your Clergy, in their Prayer before Sermon, that they do keep strictly to the form in the said Canon contained, or to the full effect thereof.

VII. And whereas we also understand, that divers persons, who are not of the Clergy, have of late presumed, not only to talk and to dispute against the Christian Faith concerning the blessed Trinity, but also to write and publish books and pamphlets against the same, and industriously spread them through the Kingdom, contrary to the known laws in that behalf made and enacted, and particularly to one act of Parliament made in the ninth year of King William the Third, intitled, An act for the more effectual suppressing of blasphemy and profaneness; we taking all the matters abovementioned into our Royal and serious consideration, and being desirous to do what in us lies, to put a stop to these disorders, do strictly charge and command you, together with all other means suitable to your holy profession, to make use of your authority according to law, for the suppressing and restraining of all such exorbitant practices. And, for your assistance, we will give charge to our Judges, and all other Civil Officers, to do their duty herein, in executing the said act, and all other laws, against all such persons as shall, by these means, give occasion of scandal, discord, and disturbance in our Church and Kingdom.

The Parliament called.

On the 5th of January, a proclamation was published for dissolving the Parliament, and, on the 15th, another was issued for calling a new one, in the following terms:

‘It having pleased Almighty God, by most remarkable steps of his Providence, to bring us safe to the Crown of this Kingdom, notwithstanding standing the designs of evil men, who shewed themselves disaffected to our Succession, and who have since, with the utmost degree of malice, misrepresented our firm resolutions and uniform endeavours to preserve and defend our most excellent Constitution both in Church and State, and attempted, by many false suggestions, to render us suspected to our people; we cannot omit, on this occasion of first summoning our Parliament of Great-Britain, in justice to ourselves, and that the miscarriages of others may not be imputed to us, at a time, when false impressions may do the greatest and irrecoverable hurt, before they can be cleared up, to signify to our whole Kingdom, that we were very much concerned, at our Accession to the Crown, to find the public affairs of our Kingdom under the greatest difficulties, as well in respect of our trade, and interruption of our navigation, as of the great debts of our Nation, which, we were surprized to observe, had been very much increased since the conclusion of the last war. We do not therefore doubt, that, if the ensuing elections should be made by our loving subjects with that safety and freedom, which by law they are intitled to, and we are firmly resolved to maintain to them, they will send up to Parliament the fittest persons to redress the present disorders, and to provide for the peace and happiness of our Kingdom, and the ease of our people for the future; and therein will have a particular regard to such as shewed a firmness to the Protestant Succession, when it was in danger.’

The late Ministry foreseeing, they should be called to an account for their conduct, had frequent consultations how to avoid the storm; and soon after a traitorous libel was published, under the title of, English advice to the freeholders of Great-Britain. Nothing could be more full of malice and falsehood against the King's person and family; as well as against the Whigs in general, and the present Ministry; and it was artfully contrived to raise discontents among the people against the Government, and to possess them with an opinion, that the Church was in danger by his Majesty's Administration. It was carefully dispersed through the Country, and great numbers of them were intercepted in the City being not so fully expressed as they might have been; and others expressed in such a manner as may be liable to be misunderstood, as not explaining with sufficient clearness and distinctness my whole thoughts to your Lordships upon the subject therein contained: And whereas, if my present meaning in any part of it, should now be misunderstood, I may hereafter be thought not to have fully and sincerely opened myself to your Lordships; I do humbly and with all submission beg leave to take this immediate opportunity of representing to your Lordships, that I think myself indispensably obliged, in conscience, to lay before your Lordships the following explanations of the aforesaid paper, viz.

That whereas I declared in that paper my opinion to be, that ‘the Son was eternally begotten, by the eternal incomprehensible power and will of the Father; and that the Holy Spirit, &c.’ I did not mean thereby to retract any thing I had written; but to declare that the opinion set forth at large in the book intitled, The Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity, and in the Defences of it, is, that the Son was eternally begotten, by the eternal incomprehensible power and will, &c. Which words, (the eternal incomprehensible power and will of the Father) I desire may be so understood, as to signify that God the Father alone is, and is to be honoured as being, ὁ αὐτὸς and παρ’ αὐτοῦ, the original of all, himself without original.

And whereas I declared I did not intend to write any more concerning the doctrine of the Trinity: But if I should fail herein, and write any thing hereafter, &c. I desire it may be so understood, as not to preclude myself in point of conscience from a liberty of making any inoffensive corrections in my former books, if they shall come to another edition: Or from vindicating myself from any misrepresentations or aspersions, which may possibly hereafter be cast upon me on the occasion of this controversy; but only to signify, that I have no present intention of writing any new book; and that, if hereafter I shall at any time write any thing which your Lordships shall judge worthy of censure, I shall readily submit to such censure.

1714-15. City of Exeter (1). Upon which the Government issued out a proclamation, promising a reward of one thousand pounds for the discovery of the Author of the libel, and five hundred pounds for the discovery of the Printer; But to no purpose (2).

The same day, the mismanagement of the late Ministry, with regard to Chelsea College, was made public by order of the Privy-Council; upon which, the Government of that Hospital was changed, and Brigadier Stanwick appointed Governor (3).

The Earl of Stratford's papers seized, Jan. 11.

The Earl of Stratford being returned to England, an order of Council was issued, that the Lord Townshend and Mr Stanhope, Secretaries of State, should go to him, and demand the original instructions and orders, and all letters he had received from the late Ministry, or any foreign Prince or Minister, and copies of all instructions, of which he had not the originals; and also of all letters writ by him to any person whatsoever, relating to his Negotiations, from the time of his first being at the Hague. The Earl delivered them two trunks, which, he said, contained what they desired; and orders were sent to seal up his papers, that were on ship-board, or at the Custom-House.

On the 20th of January, the day appointed for a public Thanksgiving for the King's peaceable Accession the Throne, his Majesty and their Royal Highnesses went to St Paul's, where an elegant Sermon was preached by Dr Richard Willis, Bishop of Gloucester.

Mr Prior, who had been deep in the measures of the late Ministry, was now ordered home, the Earl of Stair being arrived at Paris, where he had several Conferences with the Marquis de Torcy, and presented memorials about the canal and intended port at Mardyke, and signified to the Court of France, that he had orders not to take any character upon him, till he had a clear and positive answer to the memorials.

Elections for the new Parliament.

The elections for the new Parliament were now carrying on with great warmth by both parties, but with most success on the side of the Whigs. The Electors in some Counties and Cities drew up instructions for their Representatives, the most remarkable of which were those of the City of London, wherein was this passage: "We desire and expect, that you will inquire by whose counsel it was, that, after God had blessed the arms of her late Majesty, and her Allies, with a train of unparalleled successes, she was prevailed upon, contrary to the Grand Alliance, and her repeated promises from the Throne to both Houses, to send to, or receive managers from France, to treat separately of a peace, without the knowledge and consent of our Allies."

In Scotland the Tories published a circular letter, to dissuade the Scottish Lords from voting for the Whigs, or, as they pretended, for the sixteen Peers, of whom the Duke of Argyle had brought a list from England. But this letter made little impression, and the following Peers were elected, the Dukes of Roxburgh and Montrose; the Marquises of Tweeddale, Lothian, and Annamdale; the Earls of Sutherland, Rothes, Buchan, Loudon, Orkney, Stair, Bute, Deloraine, and Illy; and the Lords Ross and Belhaven. All these Lords were distinguished by their attachment to the Revolution, and had contributed to the Union to the utmost of their power. The Marquis of Annamdale, of the ancient family of Johnston, had openly declared for King William, though, shortly after indeed, he declared for King James. But he repented of that step, and for his faithful services was employed in places of trust. The Marquis of Lothian was a great promoter of the Revolution. He had in the reign of King James II. married a daughter of the Earl of Argyle, beheaded by that Prince, purely out of a principle of honour, and to shew his regard for a family unjustly persecuted, a certain proof that he would not favour the designs of the Pretender. The Earl of Sutherland, known at the time of the Revolution by the name of the Lord Strathnaver, was constantly attached to King William, and had followed him in all his Campaigns in Flanders, at the head of a Regiment. He had appeared very zealous for the privileges of the Scots; and did not think the Union detrimental thereto. The Earl of Stair was already employed by the new Government as well

(1) They were directed to Sir John Coriton, Sir Nicholas Morrice, Jonathan Elford, Philip Rushleigh, Francis Seabell, John Williams, Esquires; Mr Granville Piper, Mr Welchman, Mr William Cary, Mr Praufes, Mr Phillips, Mr Tonkin, Mr Cawcock Kendall, in Cornwall, and to the Reverend Mr Shute, the Reverend Mr Hughes, the Reverend Mr Collyer, and the Reverend Mr Bedford, in the same County, and to the Mayor of Wexler.

(2) This libel was supposed to be penned by Bishop Atherbury. The substance of it may be reduced to these five heads:

I. A declamation against the pretended arts and indirect practices of the Government, in order to procure a Whig House of Commons to be elected.

II. Pressing motives to the Tories, to whom the Author gives the title of the Church, to exert themselves at this critical juncture to get Churchmen chosen into the ensuing Parliament.

III. Articles of impeachment, or a large charge against the Whigs, for intended criminal designs against the Constitution in Church and State; such as abolishing Episcopacy; repealing the limitations in the act of Settlement, and act for Triennial Parliaments; renewing the war; setting up a standing army; and enslaving the Nation.

IV. Great sophistry and declamation to prove, that the Church was in danger.

V. Invectives against the Duke of Marlborough and his family; calumnies against the Ministry, and all the Nobility and Gentry in the King's interest; with treasonable reflections on his Majesty and his Royal Family.

This libel was answered in a pamphlet, intitled, Treason detected; and another, called, A Reply to a traitorous libel, intitled, English advice, &c.

(3) A new Commission passed the Great Seal, appointing Commissioners for the Government of that Hospital, the Lord-President of the Privy-Council, the Captain-General of his Majesty's forces, the first Lord Commissioner of the Treasury, the two Principal Secretaries of State for the time being, Lieutenant-General Earle, Lieutenant-General Lumley, the Secretary of War, the Comptroller of the Army, and the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor of the said Hospital for the time being.

(1) The

1711-15. well as the Dukes of Montrose and Roxburgh, and their attachment to it was not doubted. The only one that seemed exceptionable in the list was the Lord Belhaven. No man had so strenuously opposed the Union, and had his advice been followed, it would never have taken place. But, finding at length all opposition in vain, he gave way to the torrent. There was one thing capable of making amends for all his non-compliances, and that was his singly opposing, in the presence of the Duke of Tork, the Act of Succession passed by a majority of voices in favour of that Prince. He was also a good Speaker, which will be always a great recommendation.

The elections for the House of Commons were made with almost equal success, and the Whigs had the majority. Thus all seemed quiet in Scotland, though a storm was then gathering there, which broke out in less than a year. The design was conducted more regularly than in England, and was better concealed. It was begun with endeavours for a remonstrance against the Union; and the advice of the most famous Lawyers was asked upon it, who declared the Act of Union contained several nullities, and to be very defective. The opposite party, to prevent a remonstrance so disagreeable to the Court, were forced to consent there should be no address of congratulation: And that, presented by the Kirk, had suffered great debates about the manner, in which King William was mentioned, and had passed with much difficulty. The Highlanders were silent, and declared not themselves. It was only known, that they were making provision of powder and ball (1).

The Parliament met at Westminster; and, the Commons proceeding to the choice of a Speaker, the Earl of Hersford, son to the Duke of Somerset, said, 'That, according to his Majesty's pleasure, they were immediately to proceed to the choice of a Speaker: That, in order thereto, they ought, in the first place, to consider, that scarce any Parliament ever met in a more critical juncture than this, when matters of the highest importance were like to be laid before the House: That therefore they ought to fix their choice upon a person of known parts and abilities; and that, in his opinion, none was ever better qualified for so great an office than Mr Spencer Compton.' He was seconded by the Lord Finch, eldest son of the Earl of Nottingham, who enlarged on Mr Compton's abilities; upon which Mr Compton stood up, and modestly excused himself; but, his excuses not being admitted, he was led to the Chair by the Earl of Hersford and Lord Finch. The King approved him on the 21st of March, and then declared from the Throne, he had ordered the Lord-Chancellor to shew the causes of calling this Parliament. Accordingly, the Lord-Chancellor read to both Houses the following speech, delivered into his hands by the King:

Mr Compton chosen Speaker.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'THIS being the first opportunity, that I have had of meeting my people in Parliament, since it pleased Almighty God of his good Providence to call me to the Throne of my Ancestors, I most gladly make use of it, to thank my faithful and loving subjects for that zeal and firmness, that hath been shewn in defence of the Protestant Succession, against all the open and secret practices, that have been used to defeat it: And I shall never forget the obligations I have to those, who have distinguished themselves upon this occasion.

'It were to be wished, that the unparalleled successes of a war, which was so wisely and cheerfully supported by this Nation, in order to procure a good peace, had been attended with a suitable conclusion. But it is with concern I must tell you, that some conditions, even of this peace, essential to the security and trade of Great-Britain, are not yet duly executed; and the performance of the whole may be looked upon as precarious, until we shall have formed defensive Alliances to guarantee the present treaties.

'The Pretender, who still resides in Lorraine, threatens to disturb us, and boasts of the assistance, which he still expects here to repair his former disappointments.

'A great part of our trade is rendered impracticable. This, if not retrieved, must destroy our manufactures, and ruin our navigation.

'The public debts are very great, and surprisingly increased, even since the fatal cessation of arms. My first care was to prevent a further increase of those debts, by paying off forthwith a great number of ships, which had been kept in pay, when there was no occasion for continuing such an expence.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

'I rely upon you for such Supplies, as the present circumstances of our affairs require for this year's service, and for the support of the public faith. The estimates shall be laid before you, that you may consider of them; and what you shall judge necessary for your safety, I shall think sufficient for mine.

'I doubt not but you will concur with me in opinion, that nothing can contribute more to the support of the credit of the Nation, than a strict observance of all Parliamentary engagements.

'The branches of the revenue, formerly granted for the support of the civil Government, are so far incumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds, which remain and have been granted to me, will fall much short of what was at first designed, for maintaining the honour and dignity of the Crown. And

(1) The King having given orders for a new Commission of Chancery, as they call it in Scotland, the following persons were appointed to be of it: The Marquis of Tweeddale, Lord President; the Earls of Sutherland, Buchan, Marbmont, Bute, and Deloraine; Mr Charles Arskine, Mr Kennedy, and Mr Hadden. Some time after Charles Warrander, of Lechend, Provost of Edinburgh, was created a Baronet.

1714-15. ' And since it is my happiness (as I am confident you think it yours) to see a Prince of Wales, who may, in due time, succeed me on the Throne, and to see him blessed with many children, the best and most valuable pledges of our care and concern for your posterity; this must occasion an expence, to which the Nation has not of many years been accustomed, but such, as surely no man will grudge; and therefore I do not doubt, but you will think of it with that affection, which I have reason to hope from you.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

' The eyes of all Europe are upon you, waiting the issue of this first Session. Let no unhappy divisions of parties here at home divert you from pursuing the common interest of your Country. Let no wicked insinuations disquiet the minds of my subjects. The established Constitution in Church and State shall be the rule of my Government; the happiness, ease, and prosperity of my people shall be the chief care of my life. Those, who assist me in carrying on these measures, I shall always esteem my best friends; and I doubt not but that I shall be able, with your assistance, to disappoint the designs of those, who would deprive me of that blessing, which I most value, the affection of my people.'

The Lords address.

The addresses of the two Houses were agreeable to the King's speech. The Lords thanked him for his very affectionate expressions towards his people, for his assurances, that the established Constitution in Church and State should be the rule of his Government, and for his just concern for their not having obtained all the advantages promised by so successful a war; they expressed their wonder, that the Pretender should be yet permitted to reside so near his Dominions; and owning themselves sensible, that trade in its most valuable branches was rendered impracticable, they added:

' These and other difficulties your Majesty hath met with on your Accession to the Crown (and which we must observe, in justice to your wisdom and foresight, would have been prevented, had your opinion been followed) we must confess, are very great and discouraging. However, we do not doubt, but that your Majesty, assisted by this Parliament, zealous for your Government, and the safety and honour of their Country, may be able to take such further measures, as will secure what is due to us by treaties, ease our debts, preserve the public credit, restore our trade, extinguish the very hopes of the Pretender, and recover the reputation of this Kingdom in foreign parts; the loss of which, we hope to convince the world by our actions, is by no means to be imputed to the Nation in general.'

Debate about the address.

When the address was read, there arose a great debate in the House, chiefly about the last expressions in the foregoing paragraph. The Lord Trevor, the Lord Bolingbroke, the Duke of Bucks, the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Anglesey, the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of London and Bristol, and some other Peers, excepted against that clause, alledging, among other things, ' That it was injurious to the late Queen's memory, and clashed with that part of his Majesty's speech, which recommended to both Houses the avoiding the unhappy divisions of parties: And that it was unjust to condemn persons, without first hearing them.' The Lord Bolingbroke in particular was very warm on the subject, and moved, that the words recover, &c. might be softened into maintain the reputation of this Kingdom; and that the rest of the paragraph might be left out. The Earl of Strafford likewise excepted against the clause, because it would expose the honour of the Nation abroad, which he was sure had suffered no diminution during his Negotiations. These and other arguments, urged on that side, were answered by the Marquis of Wharton, the Lord-Chancellor; the Earl of Nottingham, the Earl of Aylesford, the Duke of Devonshire, and other Peers. The Lord-Chancellor particularly confuted the objections raised by the Lord Bolingbroke, saying, ' That the address did not condemn any particular persons, but only the peace in general, because they felt the ill consequences of it. That they, who advised and made such a peace, deserved indeed to be censured; but that, the words in the address being general, no private person was affected by them: And that the alteration of the word recover into that of maintain would signify no more towards the justification of the guilty, than the word recovered towards the condemnation of the innocent.' After this debate, the address was approved and presented by the Lords in a body to the King.

The Commons address.

The Commons in their address, after having thanked the King for his assurances, and expressed their sense of the reproach brought upon the Nation by the unsuitable conclusion of the war, added: ' We are under astonishment to find, that any conditions of the late peace, essential to the security and trade of Great-Britain, should not yet be duly executed; and that care was not taken to form such Alliances, as might have rendered that peace not precarious. And as no care shall be wanting in your loyal Commons to inquire into these fatal miscarriages; so we intirely rely on your Majesty's wisdom, to enter into such Alliances, as you shall judge necessary to preserve the peace of Europe; and we faithfully promise to inable your Majesty to make good all such engagements.

It is with just resentment we observe, that the Pretender still resides in Lorrain; and that he has the presumption, by declarations from thence, to stir up your Majesty's subjects to Rebellion. But that, which raises the utmost indignation of your Commons, is, that it appears therein, that his hopes were built upon the measures, that had been taken for some time past in Great-Britain. It shall be our business to trace out those measures, whereon he placed his hopes, and to bring the Authors of them to condign punishment. Then, taking notice of the ill situation of trade, they concluded with assuring, that they would inable his Majesty to support the dignity of the Crown, and make an honourable provision for the Royal Family.'

When this address was reported to the House, it occasioned a warm debate, like that in the House of Lords on the same occasion. Mr. Bromley, Sir William Wyndham, General Ross, Mr. Cesar, Mr. Ward, Sir William Whitelocke, Mr. Hungerford, Mr. Shippen, and some others, raised several objections to it, which were answered 1714-15. answered by Mr Robert Walpole, Mr Secretary Stanhope, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, and Mr Pulleyn. General Rejs insisted, 'That the condemning the Peace, and censuring the late Ministers, was a reflection on the late Queen, whose act the Peace was; and that the reflecting on the late Queen could not be agreeable to his present Majesty.' He was answered by Mr Walpole and Mr Stanhope, 'That nothing was further from their intentions than to asperse the late Queen: That they rather designed to vindicate her memory, by exposing and punishing those evil Counsellors, who had deluded her into pernicious measures; whereas the opposite party endeavoured to screen and justify those Counsellors, by throwing on the memory of her late Majesty all the odium of their evil counsels.' As to what was objected, that the censuring the late Ministers without a hearing, and condemning the Peace without examining into particulars, was unjust and unprecedented, it was answered, 'That they must distinguish between censuring Ministers, and condemning the peace in general, and condemning particular persons. That they might, in equity and justice, do the first, because the whole Nation is sensible, that their honour and true interest were given up by the late peace. That, in due time, they would call them to an account, who made and advised such a peace; but God forbid they should ever condemn any person unheard.' On this occasion Mr Stanhope took notice of a report industriously spread about, 'That the present Ministers never designed to call the late Managers to an account, but only to censure them in general terms. But he assured the House, that notwithstanding all the endeavours, which had been used to prevent a discovery of the late mismanagements, by conveying away several papers from the Secretaries Offices; yet the Government had sufficient evidence left, to prove the late Ministry the most corrupt, that ever set at the Helm. That those matters would soon be laid before the House; and that it would appear, that a certain English General had acted in concert with, if not received orders from Marshal de Villars.' Sir William Wyndham endeavoured to prove, that the peace had been very beneficial to this Kingdom, and offered to produce a list of goods, by which it appeared, that the customs had increased near 100,000 l. per annum. But he was answered by Sir Gilbert Heathcote, who readily owned, that Sir William might indeed produce a list of vast imports from France; but desired him to shew, that our exports thither, particularly of our woollen manufactures, had increased since the peace. He added, that imports, being only our consumption, rather prove our loss than our gain; and that the Nation gets only by exports, which keep up our manufactures, employ our poor, and bring in returns of money. Sir William Wyndham made no reply; but Sir William Whitelocke having suggested, that the Whigs designed to involve the Nation in a new war, and lay six shillings in the pound, he was answered by Mr Walpole, that none in the present Ministry were for a war, if the same could any ways be avoided; and that he doubted not but two shillings in the pound would be sufficient towards this year's service.

After these and some other speeches, the address was carried by a majority of two hundred and forty-four votes against a hundred and thirty-eight.

The conduct of the Earl of Oxford and the Lord Bolingbroke, the two chiefs of the late Ministry, was at this time very remarkable. The Earl skulked about sometimes in town, and sometimes in the country; affecting to appear very unconcerned, professing his innocence, and boasting what great things he had done for securing the Hanover Succession. The other affected to act a more open part, appeared every where, and spoke in Parliament with such boldness, as if he had not the least sense of guilt, or dread of punishment. This was said to be owing to the advice of the Lord Trevor, who represented to him, 'how much their cause would suffer, if he, whose chief interest it was to support it to the last, should meanly throw it up, by absenting himself. He assured him, no hold could be taken of his person till he was impeached; which he could not be, till the papers relating to the part of the Administration, in which he was concerned, were examined.' However, it was observed, that the Earl of Oxford sold out all the stock he had in his own name in the South-Sea Company; and the Lord Bolingbroke's heart began to fail him, as soon as he heard, that Mr Prior was landed at Dover, and had promised to reveal all he knew; which however he did not make good, though he was favourably received by the King, to whom he was introduced by the Earl of Dorset; and, the same day, was entertained at dinner by the Lord Townshend, together with the Duke of Roxburgh, Mr Secretary Stanhope, the Earl of Dorset, and the Lord Lamley. That evening the Lord Bolingbroke, who had the night before appeared at the Play-house in Drury-Lane, and bespoke another play for the next night, and subscribed to a new Opera, that was to be acted some time after, went off to Dover in disguise, as a servant to La Vigne, one of the French King's Messengers; and there William Morgan, who had been a Captain in Major-General Holo's regiment of Marines, hired a vessel and carried him over to Calais, where the Governor attended him in a coach, and carried him to his house, as appeared by Morgan's examination. The next day after it was publicly known, that he was gone to France, there was handed about in writings, and afterwards in print, the following letter, laid to be writ by him:

'My Lord,

Dover, March 27.

'I left the town so abruptly, that I had not time to take leave of you, or any of my friends. You will excuse me, when you know, that I had certain and repeated informations from some, who are in the secret of affairs, that a resolution was taken by those, who have power to execute it, to pursue me to the scaffold. My blood was to have been the cement of a new Alliance; nor could my innocence be any security, after it had been once demanded from abroad, and resolved on at home, that it was necessary to cut me off. Had there been the least reason to hope for a fair and open trial, after having been already prejudged, unheard by the two Houses of Parliament, I should not have declined the strictest examination. I challenge the most inveterate of my enemies to produce any one in-

If my zeal for the honour and dignity of my Royal Mistress, and the true interest of my Country, has any where transported me to let slip a warm or unguarded expression, I hope the most favourable interpretation will be put upon it. It is a comfort, that will remain with me in all misfortunes, that I served her Majesty faithfully and dutifully, in that especially, which she had most at heart, relieving her people from a bloody and expensive war; and that I have always been too much an Englishman, to sacrifice the interest of my Country to any foreign Ally whatsoever. And it is for this crime only, that I am now driven from thence.

You will hear more at large from me shortly.

Yours, &c.

Some maintained this letter to be supposititious, but the generality of the Tories owned it to be true. And it plainly appeared afterwards that he had just reasons to leave the Kingdom.

Addresses in favour of the late Ministry.

Notwithstanding all the demonstrations of the ill conduct of the late Ministry, many of their friends ventured to justify them; of which the address from the Corporation of Wigan, in Lancashire, presented by Sir Roger Bradshaigh, was a remarkable instance; in which, after stiling the peace of Utrecht a general, solid, and beneficial peace for the people, they proceed thus: 'We take this opportunity to return our thanks for your Majesty's gracious assurance of protecting the Episcopal Church of England. This, with your being in full communion with that Church, must make you dear to all the members thereof. We cannot but please ourselves with the hopes, that, by the establishment of your family amongst us, the favourable conjuncture (which has been so long wished for) is now come, to extend the Episcopal Government to the Reformed Churches abroad; which, as we believe, is the only foundation possible to unite the Christian World upon (if ever it must be so happy) so it must render you, above all things, glorious to the whole Reformation, by being the happy instrument of so universal a benefit.'

About this time died Dr Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, in the 72d year of his age. He was taken ill of a violent cold, which soon turned to a pleuritic fever. He was attended by his friend and relation Dr Cbeysne. But the distemper growing to a height, which seemed to baffle all remedies, the assistance of Sir Hans Sloane and Dr Mead was called for, who quickly found his case desperate. He bore the notice of the danger his life was in, with that calm resignation which had always supported him under the severest trials. As he perceived his senses to the last, he employed the remnant of life in acts of devotion, and in giving the best advice to his family; of whom he took leave, in a manner, that shewed the utmost tenderness, accompanied with the firmest constancy of mind. And whilst he was so little sensible of the terrors of death, as to embrace its approach with joy; he could not but express a concern, for the grief he saw it caused in others (1). He was succeeded by Dr Talbot, Bishop of Oxford, whose successor was Dr John Potter, Regius Professor, the present Archbishop of Canterbury.

Mar. 17.

What precaution soever had been taken, about a third part of the Commons were Tories. This appeared as soon as the Parliament met. Sir William Whitelock, Member for the University of Oxford, upon a motion in the House of Commons, to take into consideration the King's proclamation of the 15th of January, for calling a new Parliament, made exceptions to the proclamation as unprecedented and unwarrantable; and was called upon by some Members to explain himself; upon which he made an excuse for what he had said. Notwithstanding this, Sir William Wyndham rose up and said, that the proclamation was not only unprecedented and unwarrantable, but even of dangerous consequence to the very being of Parliaments. He was called upon to justify his charge, which he declined, but said, 'That, as he thought some expressions in the proclamation of dangerous consequence, so he believed every Member was free to speak his thoughts.' He was answered by Lord Finch, 'That no doubt every Member had that liberty, freedom of speech being one of their

(1) His character was thus drawn by the Marquis of Halifax:

'Dr Burnet is like all men, who are above the ordinary level, seldom spoke of in a mean, he must either be railled at or admired; he has a swiftness of imagination, that no other man comes up to; and as our nature hardly allows us to have enough of any thing, without having too much, he cannot at all times so hold in his thoughts, but that at some time they may run away with him; as it is hard for a vessel, that is brim-full, when in motion, not to run over; and therefore the variety of matter, that he ever carries about him, may throw out more, than an unkind critic would allow. His first thoughts may sometimes require more digestion, not from a defect in his judgment, but from the abundance of his fancy, which furnishes too fast for him. His friends love him too well, to see small faults; or, if they do, think that his greater talents give him a privilege of straying from the strict rules of caution, and exempt him from the ordinary rules of censure. He produces so fast, that what is well in his writings calls for admiration, and what is incorrect deserves an excuse; he may in some things require grains of allowance, which those only can deny him, who are unknown or unjust to him. He is not quicker in discerning other men's faults, than he is in forgiving them; so ready, or rather glad to acknowledge his own, that from blemishes they become ornaments. All the repeated provocations of his indecent adversaries have had no other effect, than the setting his good-nature in so much a better light; since his anger never yet went farther than to pity them. That heat, which in most other men raises sharpness and satire, in him glows into warmth for his friends, and compassion for those in want and misery. As dull men have quick eyes, in discerning the smaller faults of those, that nature has made superior to them, they do not miss one blot he makes; and, being beholden only to their barrenness for their discretion, they fall upon the errors, which arise out of his abundance; and by a mistake, into which their malice betrays them, they think that, by finding a mote in his eye, they hide the beams, that are in their own. His quickness makes writing so easy a thing to him, that his spirits are neither wasted nor soured by it: The soil is not forced, every thing grows, and brings forth without pangs; which distinguishes as much what he does, from that which smells of the lamp, as a good palate will discern between their essential privileges. But that the House, at the same time, had both liberty and power to censure and punish such Members, as transgress the rules of decency, trespass upon the respect due to the Crown, and so abuse the privilege of the House within doors, as to render it contemptible without.' Sir William being again called upon to explain himself, and still refusing, some members cried, The Tower, the Tower. But Mr Robert Walpole spoke to this effect: 'Mr Speaker, I am not for gratifying the desire, which the Member, who occasions this debate, shews, of being sent to the Tower. It would make him too considerable. But as he is one, who sets up for a warm champion of the late Ministry, and was in all their secrets, I would have him be in the House, when we come to inquire into the conduct of his friends, both that he may have an opportunity to defend them, and be a witness of the fairness, with which we shall proceed against those Gentlemen; and that it may not be said, that we take advantage against them.' After several other speeches, which prolonged this debate above four hours, a motion was made, and the question proposed, 'That Sir William Wyndham, having reflected upon his Majesty's proclamation, and having refused to justify his charge, altho' often called upon so to do, is guilty of a great indignity to his Majesty, and of a breach of the privilege of this House.' This motion occasioned a fresh debate. The House still insisted, that Sir William should justify his charge; and he as obstinately declined to do it, saying, 'He was ready to undergo whatever a majority would inflict upon him.' At last, the question being put, that he should withdraw, it was carried in the affirmative by two hundred and eight voices against one hundred and twenty-nine: Whereupon he withdrew, as did all the hundred and twenty-nine Members, who had been for the negative. Then the House unanimously resolved, That Sir William should be reprimanded by the Speaker. This was done by the Speaker in the following manner:

'Sir William Wyndham,

I am to acquaint you, that the House has come to this resolution, that you be reprimanded in your place by me.

You have presumed to reflect on his Majesty's proclamation, and made an unwarrantable use of the freedom of speech granted by his Majesty.

This House has made their moderation appear, and shewn their lenity, by laying the mildest censure your offence was capable of. I am ordered to reprimand you, and do reprimand you accordingly.¹

between fruit, which comes from a rich mould, and that which tastes of the uncleanly pains, that have been bestowed upon it. He makes many enemies, by setting an ill-natured example of living, which they are not inclined to follow. His indifference for preferment, his contempt not only of splendor, but of all unnecessary plenty, his degrading himself into the lowest and most painful duties of his calling; are such unprelatical qualities, that, let him be ever so orthodox in other things, in these he must be a Dissenter. Virtues of such a stamp are so many heresies, in the opinion of those Divines, who have softened the primitive

To which Sir William replied:

S I R,

'I return you my thanks for what you have done by the duty of your office in so candid and so Gentleman-like a manner. As I am a member of this House, I very well know I must acquiesce in the determination of this House. But I am not conscious of any indignity to his Majesty, or any breach of the privilege of this House; and therefore I have no thanks to give those Gentlemen, who, under pretence of lenity, have brought this censure upon me (1).²

Three days after the Commons entered upon what they said in their address of thanks should be their business, the inquiry into the conduct of the late Ministry. General Stanhope presented to the House, in fourteen volumes, all the papers relating to the late Negotiations of peace and commerce, and to the cessation of arms, telling them, 'That nothing had been omitted, that might either answer the desire they had expressed of being thoroughly informed of what had passed in those important Negotiations, or satisfy the whole world, that the present Ministry acted with the utmost fairness and candour, and designed to take no manner of advantage over the late Managers in the intended inquiries. That indeed the papers now laid before the House were only copies; but that the originals would be produced, if occasion required: Concluding, that, those papers being too many and too voluminous to be perused and examined by all the Members, he therefore moved, that they might be referred to a select Committee of twenty persons, who should digest the substance of them under proper heads, and report the same, with their observations, to the House.'³

The Earl of Oxford being come to town the night before, his brother Mr Edward Harley, a Member of the House, said, 'That it was easy to see, that one of his nearest relations was principally aimed at in these intended inquiries; but he might assure the House, that the said person, notwithstanding the various reports, which had been spread concerning him, would neither fly his country, nor conceal himself, but be forth-coming whenever he should be called upon to justify his conduct. That he hoped he would be able, upon the severest trial, to make his innocence appear to all the world; but, if he should be so unhappy, as to have been guilty of the crimes, that were laid to his charge, he would think all his blood too small a satisfaction to atone for them.' No body opposed Mr Stanhope's motion; only Mr Hungerford excepted against the number of twenty, and injunctions, so as to make them suit better with the present frailty of mankind. No wonder then, if they are angry, since it is in their own defence, or that from a principle of self-preservation they should endeavour to suppress a man, whose parts are a shame, and whose life is a scandal to them.⁴

(1) The Tories took advantage of this moderation, and some of their Writers secretly dispersed, not many days after, a libel intitled, The honour and partiality of the House of Commons, set forth in the case of Sir William Wyndham; containing bitter invectives against the well-affected. Annals.

The Committee of Secrecy met that evening; and chose Mr Robert Walpole for their Chairman. But, he being the next day taken ill, the Committee chose Mr Stanhope to supply his place; and, for dispatch, subdivided themselves into three Committees, to each of which a certain number of books and papers were allotted. They made such dispatch, that their report was ready in two months.

The Earl of Oxford takes his seat in the House. On the 11th of April the Earl of Oxford went to the Parliament, and took his seat in the House of Peers.

About this time the Earl of Peterborough suddenly returned from his late travels to Italy and France, having met with Lord Boltingbroke on the road between Paris and Calais; but it was said, he did not speak to him. The next day after his arrival, the Earl appeared at St James's, but, whatever was the occasion, two days after the Lord Townshend signified to him an order forbidding him the Court.

Death of Lord Wharton. On the 12th of April the Marquis of Wharton, Lord Privy-Seal, died at his House in Dover-Street, after an indisposition of twelve days, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. His name will be ever endeared to the friends of liberty, and to all who have a true concern for the Protestant interest.

His character. Could the services, which he performed for this Nation and the present Royal Family be duly enumerated, they would appear beyond the best skill and abilities of any single man.

King Charles II. admitted him to great familiarities, and had him for a companion in many of his debauches, with a design to make him wholly his own. With regard to private vices, the success was notorious; but, in what related to the Public and Court, he absolutely disappointed the King. He saw and heard the designs of a Prince, to whose indolence and luxury the Nation was obliged for its preservation. This gave him a just contempt for such a Governor, and an abhorrence of all his views. King William was duly sensible of his services before and at the Revolution. In that Reign he attained to no higher a station than being Comptroller of the Household; which must be ascribed to the unhappy influence of those, who hated him, and his Royal Master. He received however the utmost proofs of confidence and respect, and had the King's most intimate designs communicated to him. His probity and good affection in what concerned the Government was so well assured, that it gave him great and constant interest. Many important measures were ascribed to his secret advice. His great vigour and happy address in serving the good cause, which he had ever in view, cannot fully be described. His labours were infinite with men of all ranks, and on all proper occasions. He knew how to accommodate himself to every temper and inclination. What to others would have been great pain and trouble, afforded him great pleasure and satisfaction. The merit of his conduct in the Country, at Court, and in the Senate, was equally admirable. His enemies, who were only so on the account of his public zeal and usefulness, have greatly aggravated his immoralities, and loaded him with crimes, from which he was wholly free. But, did he not learn the rudiments of vice under their favourite King Charles? Have not the private lives of most of their leaders been equally faulty? Are they excusable for pretending to the name and noise of Religion? Lord Wharton's defects oblige us the more to admire his excellencies. In a life spent in a libertine manner, useful knowledge and learning were neglected. But an infinite fund of good sense and great natural abilities supplied whatever was wanting. On every emergency he discovered what was proper; and was never at a loss how to act. There was not only a readiness, and propriety in his speeches, but they were weighty and important. Nothing can be imagined more excellent than his skill and sagacity in the management of a debate. In these public appearances he was greatly assisted, by never engaging in the support of what he did not believe to have truth and justice on its side. He lived to see the success of a cause, for which he had laboured with zeal and integrity. But his enjoyment of the blessing of the Succession was very short. A misfortune in his family is supposed to have produced the fatal effect. His son possessed some of his parts and abilities; but his very different use and application of them are well known.

On the 22d of April was the famous eclipse of the sun, to observe which the Chevalier de Louville and Monsieur de Montmaur, two French Mathematicians, came from Paris, by the direction of the Royal Academy of Sciences, and were civilly entertained by the Members of the Royal Society, with whom they joined in making their observations.

The day following, being the Anniversary of the late Queen's Coronation, great disorders were committed in the City of London, by the lower sort of people; as was likewise done on the 29th of April, being the Duke of Ormond's birth-day.

The General assembly of the Church of Scotland met on the 4th of May; the Earl of Rothes, Lord High-Admiral of that Kingdom, being the King's Commissioner; and the most remarkable of their acts was the confirming the suspension of two Ministers, Mr James Maitland, of Inverkeithing, and Mr John Maitland, of Fergus, his Brother, who had been suspended by the 1715. the Synod of Aberdeen, for not observing the 20th of January, the thanksgiving-day for his Majesty's accession to the Crowns, and not praying for King George by name. These Ministers refusing to answer any questions for removing the suspicion, which they lay under, of disaffection to the King, the Assembly, by another vote, deposed them from the office of the Ministry, and appointed their Churches to be declared vacant.

The Assembly had a difficult part to act in this nice juncture; for several of the Presbyterians had given injunctions to their Deputies, to move for an address to the King, that he would be pleased to use his endeavours, that the Church of Scotland might be delivered from the hardships brought upon her in the late Reign, by the unlimited Toleration granted to the Episcopal Preachers, and the act for restoring Lay Patronages, which were both contrary to the treaty of Union. They had also some difficulty to avoid Remonstrances against the Union's being continued. But they managed their affairs with so much prudence, as to prevent any heats about those matters in the Assembly, and used their endeavours with success to keep the honest part of the Nation from pushing those things, so that they were willing to refer the redress of those grievances to a more proper season, when the King and the Parliament might do it without interrupting the great affairs, which then lay before them. Thus the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland ended quietly, and another was appointed to meet the first Thursday of May, 1716, according to custom. This was a great mortification to the Jacobite party in both Nations, who flattered themselves with creating divisions in the Church of Scotland, by those popular topics; but the Presbyterians refused to give into their measures.

The Committee of the House taking the Civil List into consideration, several papers relating to former establishments were read; and then the question was offered, 'That it appears to this Committee, that the sum of 700,000 l. per Ann. was settled upon King William during his life, for the support of his Household, and other his necessary occasions; and at the time of his demise, after the deduction of 3700 l. a week, which was applied to the public uses, was the produce of the Civil List Revenues, that were continued and settled upon Queen Anne, during her life.' Those, who proposed this question, had two things principally in view; to vindicate the present Ministry from the aspersions cast upon them, and industriously spread about, by the emissaries of the late Managers, that the Whigs designed to give the King a larger revenue than his Predecessors had enjoyed: And to make good the branches of the Civil List Revenue, which had been alienated or abridged; so that the whole neat produce might amount to 700,000 l. per Ann. The leading men among the Tories being sensible of the first, and pretending to be ignorant of the consequence of this preliminary question, insisted a long while, 'That it was ensnaring. That what had been done by former Parliaments, ought not to be a standing rule for the subsequent: That, supposing the Parliament had given King William a Revenue of 700,000 l. per Ann. for the Civil List, they ought to consider, that he was to pay out of it

50,000 l. per Ann. to the late Queen, then 1715. Princess of Denmark; 15 or 20,000 l. per Ann. for the late Duke of Glocester; and 40,000 l. for the dowry of King James's Queen. That, after the late Queen's Accession to the Throne, the Parliament taking notice, that the produce of the Civil List Revenues exceeded what they had been given for, the sum of 3700 l. per week (that is, 192,400 l. per Annum) was taken out of them, and applied to other uses; notwithstanding which deduction, the late Queen had honourably maintained her Family, and supported the dignity of the Crown: However, if the present Revenues of the Civil List were not sufficient, they were ready to consent to an addition.' It was answered, 'That the question before them was founded upon facts, which, if denied, they were ready to prove by the records of the House.' But Sir William Wyndham still urging, that the question was ensnaring, Mr Secretary Stanhope answered, 'That he would be very plain with them, and own, that, as it was notorious, that great endeavours had been used to alienate the affection of the people from the King and his Government, by false suggestions, that they designed to plunge the Nation into extraordinary expences, they thought it highly necessary to clear his Majesty and his Ministers from that malicious aspersions.' To this Lord Guersey replied, 'That the disaffection of the people, if any, did not proceed from his Majesty, but from the hardships his Ministers put on the Tory party.' To this it was returned, 'That, as soon as it would be made known to the world, how the late Ministry had used, not only the Whigs, but the whole Nation, nothing, that could be done against them, would then be thought a hardship; but, however, that neither that noble Member, nor any of his Family, had reason to complain of hardships.' After some other speeches, the Tories endeavoured to drop the question, by moving, that the Speaker might resume the Chair; which being rejected, the question was carried in the affirmative, and a motion made that 700,000 l. clear should be granted yearly for the Civil List. The question being put upon this motion, occasioned another great debate. Sir Thomas Hanmer, Mr Bromley, Sir William Wyndham, Mr Ceslar, Mr Hungerford, and some other leading Tories, did not at first directly oppose the Question, but insinuated, 'That, before they came to that resolution, it would be proper, that a particular of the King's expence should be laid before the House.' Mr Walpole, Mr Secretary Stanhope, Mr Lechmere, and others, having exploded that proposal, as altogether inconsistent with the King's honour, to have all the private expences of his Family and Household looked into, as if he had need of a Guardian; the Tories then moved, that the sum of 600,000 l. per Annum, be given to his Majesty, and 100,000 l. per Annum settled on the Prince of Wales. The Court-party perceiving, that the proposal of giving the Prince of Wales a separate Revenue was only a design to divide the Royal Family, by lessening the dependance of the next Heir, opposed it, and, the question being put on that motion, it was carried in the negative by a great majority. The Tories having lost these two points, some of that party more openly opposed the main question. Among the rest, 1715. Sir William Wyndham said, he had the honour to serve her late Majesty, and had the opportunity to look both into her revenue and her expence; and he could assure the House, that about 500,000 l. per Annum was sufficient for the support of her Family and Civil List; tho' she relieved about 50,000 l. a year for the late King James's Consort. The Court-party were glad of this confession; and Mr Secretary Stanhope desired the Committee to take notice of what that Gentleman had advanced, because it would serve to confirm some matters, which the Committee of Secrecy had found in the papers, that were laid before them. The question being put, it was carried without dividing, that 700,000 l. a year clear should be granted for the Civil List during the King's life.

There was another warm debate a few days after, upon a motion for an address against pensions. The leading Tories and others exclaimed against the pensions given by the Crown to several persons of quality (some of whom they named) who had no occasion for them. Mr Robert Walpole urged, 'That they ought not to stint the King's beneficence, nor debar him from the exercise of the most glorious branch of his prerogative, which is to bestow his favours on such, as distinguish themselves in his service.' He was seconded by Mr Hampden, who observed, That all the pensions, about which so much noise was made, did not amount to above 25,000 l. and then moved, That the Chairman should leave the Chair; which being put to the vote, passed in the affirmative by three voices only, a hundred and ninety-one against a hundred and eighty-eight.

On the 30th of May, the House of Peers, in a Grand Committee, considered of the bill for regulating the land-forces; when there arose a great debate about a clause, for confining the several regiments to those parts of his Majesty's Dominions, for which they were allotted; for instance, the twelve thousand men, that were on the Irish Establishment, to Ireland. The Duke of Bucks, the Lord Trevor, the Lord Norb and Grey, the Bishop of Rochester, and some others of that party, spoke for the clause. But the Duke of Marlborough and some other Lords shewed the fatal consequences, with which it might be attended, in case of an invasion from abroad, or an insurrection at home, by a number of enemies, foreign or domestic, superior to the number of forces actually on the spot, where either of them should happen. It was further urged, 'That his Majesty having trusted his Person and Family entirely in the hands of the Nation, and at the opening of this Session told the Parliament, That what they should judge necessary for their safety, he should think sufficient for his own; the least they could do for him, was to leave to his wisdom and discretion the disposal of the few troops, that were kept on foot.' Some Tory Lords moved, that the foreign Officers might be excluded from that number: But the Duke of Marlborough spoke in their favour, and argued, 'That to exclude Officers, who, like the French Refugees, had, for above five and twenty years, served England with distinguished zeal and untainted fidelity, would be a piece of injustice unprecedented in the most barbarous Nations. After some other speeches, the question was put, whether the clause should be inserted; and it was carried in the negative by eighty-one voices against thirty-five. The next day, the Lords read the bill the third time, which, with some amendments, was approved, and sent down to the Commons (1).

On the 18th of May, Sir John Norris, with a Squadron of twenty men of war, and a fleet of Merchant-ships under his convoy, sailed from the Nore to the Baltic, in order to protect the trade of his Majesty's subjects in those seas. The violent proceedings of the King of Sweden in rejecting the treaty of Neutrality concerted by England and Holland, and other Members of the Grand Alliance, for preserving the remains of his army under General Crassau, and for the security of his German Dominions, and in causing the ships of all Nations whatsoever, without distinction, trading to the Baltic, to be seized and confiscated, even some years before King George's Accession to the Throne, obliged, at last, the King and the States-General, after having made proper instances for redress to no purpose, to use their fleets for the protection of their subjects in their navigation and commerce to those parts. The British and Dutch Ministers had jointly, or separately, made these instances in the most earnest manner, by variety of memorials delivered yearly to the King or Senate of Sweden, so long as from the year 1710, without being able to obtain the least satisfaction. The last memorial of Mr Jackson, the English Resident at the Court of Sweden, before the English Squadron was sent, was presented to the Senate at Stockholm, January 14, 1714-15, complaining, that the loss of the English Merchants from the Swedish cruisers amounted to 65,449 l. sterling. The Swedish Regency returned an answer on the 8th of February, N. S. by which they referred him to the King of Sweden himself, who was then at Stralsund. In short, tho' the Dutch, as well as the British Ministers, made repeated complaints of those seizures, the King of Sweden was so far from regarding them, that he issued out new orders to his men of war and privateers, to seize and confiscate all ships, that traded with any place conquered by his enemies; and these orders were so very strict, and clogged with such terms on all Merchant-ships, as in a manner rendered the trade of the Baltic impracticable, without a sufficient force to convoy the Merchant-ships, that traded thither (2).

(1) About this time there was a petition presented to the Lords by Mrs Mary Forrester, Maid of Honour to the late Queen, and now to the Princess of Wales, setting forth, that about thirteen years ago, when she was but twelve years of age, she had been married to Sir George Downing, then about fifteen. That, Sir George going then to travel, he did, upon his return, shew his dislike to the match, which had prevented their cohabitation: And therefore they prayed, that they might be separated, and at liberty to marry again. Several of the Lords, and particularly the Bishops spoke against allowing a Divorce; and, the matter being put off till the third of May, it was, upon debate, carried by fifty against forty-eight, to reject the petition, the Bishops being against the Divorce, lest it should weaken the obligations of Marriage.

Death and character
of the
Hallifax.

On the 19th of May died Charles Earl of Halifax. He was descended from a younger branch of the Manchester family, and came into the world without any advantages of fortune. By useful parts, and several lucky opportunities of producing them, soon gave him a figure in life. He had the reputation of a fine taste, and of being master of polite literature. His projects and his poetry have been ascribed to others, who submissively bestowed on him their thoughts and labours. It is not worth controverting, whether he was the Author or the Adopter of schemes for the service of the Government; since his merit, in the proper application of them, is undeniable. Receiving the Money, and Exchequer bills, delivered the Nation from distresses, which seemed to be attended with unavoidable ruin. Many, who envied a young man the natural reputation of such performances, and many others, who were enemies to the Government, encumbered him with all imaginable difficulties.

His skill as a Speaker and Manager must be unquestionable, which enabled him to execute such great designs. But, when his and the Nation's enemies, aided by the perverseness of the times, had gained the ascendant, his vigour and spirit totally failed; and he implored in abject terms their mercy, whose rage and insolence were confirmed by his applications.

When the Staff was taken from the Duke of Strawbury, he was placed at the head of the Treasury, and had the garter, and an addition of title, but not the satisfaction, which might naturally have been expected from so many happy events. Not finding himself possessed of the fulness of power, and the post of High-Treasurer, which he imagined to be his due, he entered into measures with the authors of the fatal cessation of arms, and the destructive peace. And though it would have confirmed the disgusts of our Allies, and been the highest indignity to the King's affectionate and sincere friends, had he succeeded, yet he pursued his designs of removing those, who had been fellow-labourers and fellow-sufferers with him. The perpetual enmity of his new friends to King William, who had raised him from the lowest to the highest station in life, the ignominy of an impeachment, and the censures and reproaches, with which they had pursued him for many years, were all forgotten. Such are the effects of boundless pride and ambition! But a violent distemper speedily put an end to his life, and all his devices.

He left behind him the fame of being an encourager of men of parts and learning; and is said to have shewn himself such in an agreeable and liberal manner. His performances in poetry have had their full praise. A poetical turn infected his prose. Far from simplicity and purity and strength of Lord Sommers's compositions, we have in many of his a perpetual affectation of figurative ornaments.

The Commissioners, appointed for building the fifty new Churches, presented an address to the King, wherein they set forth, that, several Chapels and Churches being almost ready, they found themselves under a difficulty how to proceed for want of a due maintenance for the Ministers, without which no Bishop could regularly consecrate a Church, nor any Patron be effectually treated with. The King told them he should readily comply with their desire, being resolved to embrace all opportunities of encouraging a work in which the honour of the Church of England was so much concerned.

This answer is one, among many other instances of the King's care for the Church of England, though the danger of it under his Administration was made a principal topic to excite the people to rebel, and to raise mobs and tumults almost on every public day ; for the prevention of which, the Justices of the Peace of Westminster and Middlesex published an excellent order, but with so little effect, that, on the King's May 28. Birth-Day, the mob insulted the Citizens, who shewed their joy by bonfires, and illuminations. The care of the Magistrates in both London and the Administrator of Holstein-Gottorp, by which it was agreed, that the towns of Stetin and Wismar should be sequestrated into the hands of the King of Prussia, and the Administrator to secure them as well as the rest of the Sveedish Pomerania, from the Northern Allies, the Poles and Muscovites. Count Morfeldt, Governor of Pomerania, refusing to comply with this treaty, the Northern Allies marched into Sveedish Pomerania, took the towns of Rügen, and little Stettin in 1715; upon this Morfeldt accepted the sequestration, which the King of Prussia was prevailed upon to take upon himself. As the Muscovites and Poles demanded the expences of the siege of Stetin, the King of Prussia paid them for the King of Sweden 400,000 Rixdollars. The King of Sweden, after his return from Turkey, refused to comply with the treaty of Sequestration, and insisted, that Stetin should be forthwith restored to him without the repayment of the 400,000 Rixdollars, nor would he depart from his design of invading Poland and Saxony, but was resolved (as he said in himself) to chastise his false friends, as well as his open enemies. This was in effect a declaration of war against all who would not assist him in procuring a restitution of what he had lost, or would not enter into a war against the States, then engaged in war against Sweden. King George, having certain information that the King of Sweden would not fail, upon the first opportunity, to invade his Electorate of Brunswick, resolved to act in concert with the Kings of Denmark and Prussia, for securing the peace of the Empire, and oppose the designs of the Suedes. To this end a treaty was concluded between the Kings of Great-Britain and Denmark, by the third article of which it was agreed, that the Duchies of Bremen and Lunden should be made over to his Britannick Majesty, his Heirs and Posterity, for ever, with this proviso, that he should, the moment he took possession of them, declare war against Sweden. This treaty was ratified and exchanged the 17th of July, 1715, and the Duchies were delivered up the 15th of October following, on which day a declaration of war was published by King George, in his German Dominions. Presently after 6000 Hannovarian marched into Pomerania, to join the Danes and Prussians, who, after having taken the Isles of Rügen and Uken, were then attacking Wismar and Straßburg. The King of Sweden was himself at Straßburg, and, finding it impossible to hinder the town from being taken, he went on board a vessel, and arrived at Stettin, on the 26th of December, after having been almost fifteen years absent from his ancient dominions. Upon his arrival, he assembled what troops he could, in order to pass the Sound over the ice, and attack Copenhagen, but was disappointed by a sudden thaw. Notwithstanding the earnest intreaties of his friends, the King of Sweden, he declined going to Stockholm, and returned to Stettin. Thus he died, on the 29th of January, 1718, after a reign of 49 years, 10 months, and 12 days. His son, King Charles, returned out of Turkey.

(1) The

1715. and Westminster, and the orders that had been given the Horse-guards, kept them in some awe on that day. But the next, being the Anniversary of the Restoration of King Charles II., they made greater illuminations, and more bonfires, than were seen the day before, especially in the City of London, where they broke the windows of such houses, as were not illuminated, and amongst them those of the Lord-Mayor. They insulted four Life-guards, who were patrolling, and obliged them to cry out, as they did, High-Church and Ormond. In Smithfield they burnt a print of King William. This riot being unexpected, there was not force enough at hand to suppress it immediately; but, at last, some Citizens and Constables dispersed them, when they came to Cheapside, and about thirty of the mutineers were secured and committed to prison. The same evening one Bournois, a French or Irish School-master, was by Sir Charles Peers sent to Newgate, for High-Treason, having proclaimed in the street, that King George had no right to the Crown. He was afterwards tried for it, and whipped through the City, according to sentence; and, his constitution being destroyed by the venereal disease, he died in a few days after. It appeared, he was a Popish Priest, and taught French for a colour.

During these commotions the following accident happened, which was made use of to increase the popular ferment. On the King's Birth-Day, new clothing was delivered to the first Regiment of foot-guards; but, so particularly coarse were the shirts, that the soldiers were much offended at it. There being a great number of Irish Papists, and other disaffected persons, than in the Guards, their discontent was easily improved by the enemies of the Government; so that some of the soldiers had the insolence to throw their shirts into the King's and Duke of Marlborough's Gardens at St James's; as a detachment marched from Whitehall, through the City, to relieve the guard in the Tower, the soldiers pulled out their shirts, and shewed them to all Shopkeepers and Passengers, crying out, These are the Hanover shirts, &c. The Court being informed of what had passed, and foreseeing the consequences, orders were immediately sent to the guard at

About the middle of May, there was an intercepted letter returned from Ireland, written by Captain Wight, a reformed Officer of Windsor's regiment, to his friend in that Country, and, by a mistake, carried to a person of the same name, in which were these expressions, 'The Duke of Ormond has got the better of all his enemies; and I hope we shall be able, in a little time, to send George home to his country again.' A warrant was issued from the Secretary's Office for apprehending Captain Wight, who absconding, a reward of 50*l.* was offered by the Government to any, who should discover him. Not many days after, Mr George Jeffreys was seized at Dublin, upon his arrival there from England; and, being examined before the Lords Justices, a packet was found about him, directed to Dr Jonathan Swift, Dean of St Patrick's. This packet Jeffreys owned he had received from the Duke of Ormond's Chaplain; and, several treasonable papers being found in it, they were transmitted to England. Jeffreys was obliged to give bail for his appearance; of which Dr Swift having notice, and that search was made after him, he thought fit to abscond.

The bill for regulating the forces having been sent down to the Commons by the Lords, the amendments made to it were, after a debate, agreed to. Mr Shippen, formerly a Commissioner of public accounts, having, on this occasion, reflected on the Ministry, as if they designed to set up a Standing Army, and insinuated, as if, after all the clamour, that had been raised, their Secret Committee would end in smoke; Mr Boscawen, the late Lord Falmouth, replied, 'That he could not forbear taking notice of the insolence of a set of men, who, having committed the blackest crimes, had yet the assurance to dare the justice of the Nation: But he hoped those crimes would not long remain unpunished. That the Committee of Secrecy were ready to make their Report, and had directed their Chairman to move the House, that a day might be appointed for receiving it; and, in the mean time, he might venture to assure the House, that they had found sufficient matter to impeach of High-Treason several Lords, and some Commons.' Mr Robert Walpole likewise said,

(1) The Duke of Marlborough's enemies laying hold of this occasion to reflect on him, as if he were to bear the blame of the injustice done to the soldiers of his regiment, the following advertisement was made public in the news-papers: 'His Grace the Duke of Marlborough being informed, that the Undertakers for the first regiment of Foot-guards had delivered to the several Companies their cloathing, no way answerable to the pattern agreed for; his Grace, therefore, ordered the said cloathing to be visited, who finding the soldiers very much abused in their shirting, his Grace immediately directed the shirts to be burnt, as well to punish as to deter such Undertakers from committing the like abuses for the future; which was done accordingly, and the rest of the cloathing has been compared with the pattern, that the soldiers may have justice done in all the other particulars. In the mean time his Grace ordered two shirts to be made of good linen cloth for each soldier, in lieu of one, as likewise new waistcoats, instead of the waistcoats made by the Undertakers of their old coats, and the old cloathing to remain to each soldier's own use.' And when the Duke reviewed the first regiment of Guards, on the 2d of June, he made them a speech, expressing his concern for their just complaints, and his being entirely innocent of the grievance: Adding, 'I have had the honour to serve with you a great many campaigns, and believe you will do me the justice to tell the world, that I never willingly wronged any of you; and, if I can be serviceable to any of you, you may very readily command it, and shall be glad of an opportunity for that purpose. I hope I shall now leave you good subjects to the best of Kings, and every way entirely satisfied.' Upon which, the soldiers, with great acclamation, expressed their satisfaction.

Mr William Churchill, the Contractor for the cloathing, laid the blame upon Mr Breakbank, the Woollen-draper, who threw it on Mr Heron the Linen-draper, by whom an advertisement was also published in his own defence.

said, 'That he wanted words to express the villainy of the last Frenchified Ministry;' and Mr Secretary Stanhope added, 'He wondered, that men, who were guilty of such enormous crimes, had still the audaciousness to appear in public.'

Debate about the Conspiracy against King William.

Pr. H. L.

The same day there was a debate in the House of Lords about a Bill for continuing the imprisonment of the Conspirators against the life of the late King William (1). A petition having been offered in their behalf, the Lord North and Grey moved, that a day might be appointed to consider of it; and was seconded by the Lord Trevor. They were opposed by the Lord Townshend, who said, he wondered any Members of that August Assembly would speak in favour of such execrable wretches, who designed to have imbrued their hands in the blood of their Sovereign; and moved, that their petition be rejected. The Lord Delaware represented, 'That, after the death of King William, the Parliament left to the discretion of the late Queen either the continuing in prison, or enlarging of these criminals. That no body doubted her late Majesty's being a Princess of great clemency; but, at the same time, she had such a respect for the memory of King William, such a regard to the safety of crowned heads, and such an abhorrence for the crimes, with which these prisoners stood charged, that she did not think fit to release them from their confinement. That all these reasons and considerations were now enforced by the open disaffection, which some people shewed to his Majesty's Person and Government; and that they ought to be so tender of the preservation of so precious a life as his Majesty's, that, in his opinion, it were necessary to make the act in question absolute, and not leave the confinement of the criminals to his Majesty's discretion, lest his natural clemency should make him overlook his own security.' He concluded with seconding the Lord Townshend's motion for rejecting the petition, which was carried without dividing.

The Report of the Committee of Secrecy.

Pr. H. C.

The Committee of Secrecy having finished their Report which was drawn up with indelible pains by Mr Walpole, that Gentleman, as Chairman, on the 9th of June, acquainted the House, 'That he had a Report to present, according to their order, but was commanded by the Committee to make a motion before he read it. That there were in the Report matters of the highest importance. That, although the Committee had power to send for persons, papers, and records, they did not think fit to make use thereof, believing it to be necessary, in order to bring offenders to justice, that some persons should be secure, before it is possible they should know what they are to be examined to; and lest they should have notice, from what should be read, to make their escape. He was commanded, according to former precedents, to move, that a warrant may be issued by Mr Speaker to apprehend certain persons, who should be named to him by the Chairman of the Committee; and that no Members may be permitted to go out of the House.' The warrant being ordered, and the doors locked, several persons were named to the Speaker by Mr Walpole; particularly Mr Matthew Prior and Mr Thomas Harley, who were taken into custody of the Sergeant at Arms. Then Mr Walpole read the Report, which lasted from one o'clock till about six in the afternoon, when, a motion being made by the friends of the late Ministry, that the further consideration of it should be adjourned till the next morning, it was carried in the negative by two hundred and eighty-two voices against one hundred and seventy-one; and ordered, that the Report be now read: Upon which, the Clerk of the House having read till half an hour past eight, the further consideration of it was adjourned to the next day. The Report consisted of,

1. The clandestine Negotiations with Monsieur Mesinger, which produced two sets of Preliminary Articles; the one private and special for Great-Britain only; the other general for all the Allies.
2. The extraordinary measures pursued to form the Congress at Utrecht.
3. The Trifling, and amusements of the French Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, by the connivance of the British Ministers.
4. The Negotiations about the renunciation of the Spanish Monarchy.
5. The fatal Suspension of Arms.
6. The seizure of Ghent and Bruges, in order to distress the Allies, and favour the French.
7. The Duke of Ormond's acting in concert with the French General.
8. The Lord Bolingbroke's journey to France to negotiate a separate peace.
9. Mr Prior's and the Duke of Shrewsbury's Negotiations in France.
10. The precipitate conclusion of the peace at Utrecht.

The Committee also offered to the House what they found material in the papers referred to them concerning the Catalans and the Pretender, and a letter from the Earl of Oxford to the Queen, with an account of public affairs from August the 8th, 1710, to June the 9th, 1714; and they concluded with taking notice of several glaring inconsistencies, which are obvious by comparing the late Queen's declarations with the measures, which her Ministers presumed to take in carrying on those important Negotiations.

The reading of this Report by the Clerk of the House of Commons took up the remainder of that day, and all the next, till about four in the afternoon, when Sir Thomas Hanmer moved, That the consideration of it be adjourned till Monday se'nnight, and was seconded by the leading men among the Tories, who moved also, That the Report should be printed, in order to be perused by all the Members of the House. Upon which Mr Walpole said, 'He could not but wonder, that those Gentlemen, who had shewed so great impatience to have the Report laid before the House, should now press for adjourning the consideration of it. As for the Committee of Secrecy, as they had not yet

(1) These were Blackburn, Cassils, Bernardi, Mel-drum, and Chambers, committed in 1696 for conspiring against King William. Several acts had passed from time to time for continuing their imprisonment, but all of them expired at the Queen's death.

1715. yet gone through all the branches of their inquiry, they could have wished, that some longer time had been allowed them to peruse and digest several important papers. In order to that, they would have deferred, three weeks or a month, the laying their Report before the House, but, that some Gentlemen having reflected on the pretended slowness of the Committee, since the Report was now before them, they must then go through with it.* Mr Stanhope added, 'That for his own part, he would readily agree to give those Gentlemen all the time they could desire to consider of the Report; but that, since themselves had precipitated this affair, he was of opinion, they ought to prosecute it with vigour, lest, by stopping on a sudden, they should fortify the notion, which the friends of the late Ministry had, with great industry, propagated among the people, that the Report of the Committee of Secrecy would vanish into smoke; the rather, because these malicious insinuations had raised the spirits and insolence of the dissatisfied, and were the principal cause of the present ferment among the giddy multitude. That he agreed with the Member, who had moved the printing of the Report, that not only the House, but the whole world might be convinced of the fairness and impartiality of their proceedings. But that the crimes of some persons named in the Report were so obvious to every body, that they ought, in his opinion, immediately to proceed to the impeaching of them.' The Tories still endeavoured to put it off, and some proposed the adjourning of the debate till that day se'nnight; and others would have been contented to defer it for three days only. But the Whigs were firm against all delays; and the question being put about seven o'clock in the evening on the motion made by Sir Thomas Hanmer, it was carried in the negative by two hundred and eighty against one hundred and sixty. This point being gained, Mr Walpole said, 'That he made no question, that, after the Report had been twice read, the whole House was fully convinced, that Henry Lord Viscount Bolingbroke was guilty of High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors. That therefore he impeached him of those crimes. But, if any Member had any thing to say in his behalf, he doubted not but the House was ready to hear him.' After a silence of some minutes, Mr Hungerford rose up and said, 'That, in his opinion, nothing was mentioned in the Report in relation to the Lord Bolingbroke, that amounted to High-Treason.' And General Rofs added, 'He wondered no body spoke in favour of my Lord Bolingbroke: That, for his own part, he had nothing to say at present, but reserved to himself to speak in a proper time.' The resolution for the impeachment then passed; and, candles being brought in, according to order, the Lord Coningsby stood up, and said, 'The worthy Chairman of this Committee has impeached the Hand, but I impeach the Head: He has impeached the Clerk, and I the Justice: He has impeached the Scholar, and I the Master. * I impeach Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer of High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors.' Mr Auditor Harley, Brother to the Earl, made a long speech, wherein he endeavoured to justify his Brother, as having done nothing but by the immediate commands of the late Queen; urging, that the peace was a good one, and approved as such by two Parliaments; concluding, that the facts mentioned in the Report, and which were charged on the Earl, could not be construed to amount to High-Treason, but only, in strict rigour, to Misdemeanors.^{1715.} He was supported by Mr Auditor Foley, the Earl's Brother-in-law, who complained of the hardship put upon that Nobleman, in charging him with High-Treason, before they had examined the Report. But what was yet more favourable for the Earl, was spoke by Sir Joseph Jekyll, one of the Committee of Secrecy, who said, 'That as to the Lord Bolingbroke, they had more than sufficient evidence to convict him of High-Treason. But, as to the Earl of Oxford, he doubted whether they had either sufficient matter or evidence to impeach him of Treason.' But another Member of the Committee of Secrecy having assured the House, That, besides what had appeared before them, and was mentioned in the Report, they had other evidence, viva voce, it was likewise resolved to impeach him without a division. After which the further consideration of the Report was adjourned to that day se'nnight; and the Report with the Appendix were ordered to be printed, and copies to be sent to the Sheriffs and returning Officers of every City and Borough.

The next morning the Earl of Oxford went to the House of Peers, and at first appeared undisturbed; but, finding that most Members avoided sitting near him, and that even Earl Poulet was shy of exchanging a few words with him, he retired out of the House.

It was moved by Mr Walpole, from the Committee, that the persons taken into custody Harley should be examined in the most solemn manner. Accordingly, Mr Prior and Mr Harley were ordered to be examined by such of the Committee as were Justices of the Peace for Middlesex; and, two days after, Mr Walpole told the House, that, during a long examination, there appeared matters of such importance, that he was directed to move the House for Mr Prior's being closely confined, and no person suffered to come to him; which was agreed to.

This order occasioned various reports: Some affirmed, that the Earl of Oxford, or some of his friends, had been in close conference with Mr Prior, and so effectually tampered with him, that he was more reserved in answering questions than he had been before. However that be, it is certain, Mr Prior did prevaricate.

After these impeachments, that of the Duke of Ormond became the principal subject of discourse. The High-Church party made his name the signal for their tumults, threatening the Government and Parliament too, if they proceeded against him. His zeal for the Church was their chief topic to excite the mobs to appear for him; and his noble birth, and the services of his ancestors, and of himself in Flanders during King William's Reign, were insisted upon. Nor was his generosity, or rather profuse way of living, omitted, to prepossess the people in his favour; but all signified nothing; for though the King, at his first arrival, shewed more lenity and respect to him, than his conduct deserved, and seemed willing to pass by his miscarriages, while General, as far as possible, the behaviour of the Duke and his Friends was such, as made it impracticable; for instead of discouraging the mobs, and also the Earl of Oxford.

Behaviour of the Duke of Ormond.

1715. mobs, who were taught to cry out, An Ormond, in opposition to King George, he plainly countenanced them, and took a great deal of pride to be the idol of the rabble. He affected to have people of Quality appear at his levee, and frequent his house; and, instead of behaving himself submissively, had the vanity to justify his conduct in a printed piece, which in reality exposed him more to censure. About the middle of June, the following advertisement was dispersed with great industry: 'On Tuesday, the 7th of this month, her Grace the Duchess of Ormond, in her return from Richmond, was stopped in her coach by three persons, well mounted, and well armed, in disguise, who inquired, if the Duke was in the coach, and seemed to have a design upon his life, if he had been there. It has been observed, that many persons, armed and disguised in like manner, have been watching by day and by night upon that road, on each side of the water, and it is not to be doubted, with a design to assassinate him.'

He is impeached.
Fr. H. C.

This being evidently calculated to excite the fury of the populace against the Duke's supposed enemies, the rest of his conduct could not but alarm the Government, and perhaps provoked the House of Commons to proceed against him sooner, and with more vigour, than they would otherwise have done. On the 21st of June, the day appointed for the further consideration of the Report, Mr Secretary Stanhope stood up, and said, 'He wished he were not obliged to break silence on that occasion; but, as a Member of the Secret Committee, and of that great Assembly, which ought to do the Nation justice, he thought it his duty to impeach James Duke of Ormond of High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors.' He was seconded by Mr Boswell, but Mr Archibald Hutchinson, one of the Commissioners of Trade, made a long speech in behalf of the Duke, wherein he set forth his noble birth and qualifications, and the great services, which both he and his ancestors had performed to the Crown and Nation; urged, that in the whole course of his late conduct he had but obeyed the late Queen's commands; and concluded, that, if all, that was alledged against him in the Report, could be made out, it would, in the rigour of the law, amount to no more than High Misdemeanors. This speech made a great impression on the House; and Mr Hutchinson was seconded by General Lumley, who said, among other things, 'that the Duke of Ormond had, on all occasions, given signal proofs both of his affection and love for his Country, and of his personal bravery and courage, particularly at the battle of Landen, where he was wounded and taken prisoner; and that the late King William was extremely satisfied with his gallant behaviour. That he had generously expended the best part of his estate in the wars, living in a most noble and splendid manner, for the honour of his Country. That therefore, in consideration both of his great services, and his illustrious relations, if he had of late been so unfortunate, as to fail in any part of his conduct, they ought not to proceed against him with the utmost rigour of the law; the rather, because he ever meant well, and was drawn into ill measures by crafty Ministers.' Sir Joseph Jekyll spoke likewise in his favour: He said, 'That if there was room for mercy, he hoped it would be shewn to that noble, generous, and courageous Peer, who, for many years, had exerted those great accomplishments for the good and honour of his Country. That, if of late he had the misfortune to deviate from his former conduct, the blame ought not, in justice and equity, to be laid to him, but to them principally, who, abusing his affection, loyalty, and zeal for the service of his Royal Mistress, had drawn him into pernicious counsels. That therefore, as the statute of 25 Edw. III. on which the charge of High-Treason against him was to be grounded, had been mitigated by subsequent acts, the House ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act against the Duke, but only impeach him of High Crimes and Misdemeanors.' Sir Joseph added, in the course of this debate, 'That some persons endeavoured to aggravate the Duke of Ormond's faults, by charging upon him the riots and tumults, which the populace committed daily in many places: But that he durst aver, that he did no ways countenance those disorders; and if the disaffected made use of his name, unknown to him, he ought not to suffer for it.' General Rofs laid great stress upon Sir Joseph Jekyll's opinion, and said all he could in his commendation, and the Duke's defence. Sir William Wyndham, Mr Onslow, Mr Ward, Mr Hungerford, and some other Members of both parties, spoke also on the same side. But Mr Lydall, Mr Hampden, and Mr Thompson, Recorder of London, strongly supported Mr Stanhope's motion; answered all that had been said in the Duke's favour; and, among other things, represented, 'That his Grace ever affected popularity: That he could not be ignorant of the tumults and riots, of which his name was the signal; and that since he did not publicly disown them, who made use of his name, his silence was a tacit approbation of their proceedings, and seemed to summon the people to a general insurrection.' Sir Edward Northey, Attorney-General, did not disown, but that in the Report of the Committee of Secrecy there were some matters, on which an impeachment of High-Treason might be grounded against the Duke of Ormond; but did not think it proper to explain himself further on that occasion.

Mr Lechmere, Solicitor-General, spoke plainer, and mentioned a case parallel to the Duke's, which had been adjudged Treason. The debate lasted till about half an hour after ten, when the question was put, and resolved by a majority of two hundred and thirty-four voices against one hundred and eighty-seven, 'That this House will impeach James Duke of Ormond of High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors.'

It was the general opinion, that the rash unadvised behaviour of the Duke's pretended friends, of whom Bishop Atterbury was chief, greatly promoted this vote. It was said upon very good grounds, that a relation of the Duke's had prevailed upon him at that time to write a submissive letter to the King, desiring a favourable interpretation of his former actions, and imploring his Majesty's clemency; which had so good an effect, that he was to have been privately admitted to the King in his closet, to confirm what he had written. But, before The Duke the time came, Bishop Atterbury had been with James out of England, and the consequence was, that he left England.

The Earl of Strafford impeached, June 22. Pr. H. C.

The Commons refusing the consideration of the Report, Mr Aislaby took notice 'of the general concern, that had appeared the day before in the House, for the noble person, who was impeached, because they were persuaded, it was rather through weakness than malice, that he had followed pernicious counsels. But that, in his opinion, few, if any, would speak in favour of another Lord, whom he was to impeach. That the person he meant was Thomas Earl of Strafford, one of the Plenipotentiaries of Great-Britain at the Congress at Utrecht, whose conduct had been vastly different from that of his Colleague, the present Bishop of London. That this good and pious Prelate seemed to have been put at the head of that Negotiation, only to palliate the iniquity of it under the sacredness of his character; but was little more than a cypher in the absence of the Earl of Strafford. That the Bishop, not being in the secret, had acted with reserve and caution, and would do nothing without the Queen's special commands; whereas the Earl of Strafford not only was forward to venture and undertake any thing (as he expresses himself in one of his letters) to be the tool of a Frenchified Ministry, but in many instances had gone beyond his instructions, and advised the most pernicious measures. That, having impartially weighed the different conduct of these two Ministers, he was glad, that nothing could be charged upon the Bishop, which gave them an opportunity to convince the world, that the Church is not in danger; but moved, that Thomas Earl of Strafford be impeached of High Crimes and Misdemeanors. Mr Aislaby enlarged upon this charge, which he reduced to three principal heads, '1. The Earl of Strafford's advising the fatal Suspension of Arms; which was soon after attended with several misfortunes, that befel the Allies, and at last forced them to the necessity of submitting to the terms of an unsafe dishonourable peace. 2. Advising the seizing of Ghent and Bruges, in order to distress the Allies, and favour the enemy. And, 3. The insolence and contempt, with which he had treated the most serene House of Hanover, and their Generals and Ministers.' Mr Baillie of Jerviswood having seconded Mr Aislaby, Sir William Wyndham endeavoured to justify the Earl of Strafford, as to the first head, by saying, 'That the peace, which was but the sequel and necessary consequence of the Suspension of Arms, had been approved as such by two successive Parliaments, and declared advantageous, safe, and honourable.' Mr Shippen, Mr Ward, and Mr Snell spoke also in favour of the Earl of Strafford, as did likewise Mr Hungerford, who, among other things, said, 'That, though the Bishop of London had an equal share with the Earl of Strafford in the Negotiation of peace, he was, it seems, to have the benefit of the Clergy.' General Ross having likewise said something to excuse the suspension of arms, General Cadogan answered him, and shewed, 'That, considering the situation of both armies, the Confederates lost the fairest opportunity they ever had in Flanders to destroy the enemy's army, and to penetrate into the very heart of France.' But added, 'That nothing less could be expected from a Princess and a Ministry, who had entirely delivered themselves into the hands of France.' Sir James Campbell spoke also against the Earl of Strafford; but the Member, who distinguished himself most in this debate, was Sir James Dalrymple, who, with great clearness and solidity, summed up what had been said on both sides; and having illustrated the present case by parallel instances, and proper observations, shewed, that, both by the civil and statute laws, the Earl of Strafford was, at least, guilty of High Crimes and Misdemeanors. Upon this the question was put, and, by two hundred and sixty-eight against a hundred, it was resolved, 'That Thomas Earl of Strafford be impeached of High Crimes and Misdemeanors'

The articles of impeachment against the Earl of Oxford being prepared by the Committee of Secrecy, they were read, on the 8th of July, before the House of Commons, and the first ten were upon the question severally agreed to (1). The eleventh article, which was voted High-Treason, was to this effect:

Whereas the States-General were, in September or October 1712, in possession of Tournay, and the French King had (during the private, separate, and traitorous Negotiation between the Earl of Oxford and others, and the Ministers of France) signified his consent that Tournay should remain to the States as part of their Barrier: And whereas the Queen, in her instructions of Dec. 23, 1711, to her

(1) The substance of the articles was: 1. He had entered into a Negotiation with France without the Allies, and agreed it should be kept secret. 2. He had advised the Queen to permit the coming of Mesnager, treated with him, and assumed, without authority, the Royal power. 3. He had prepared Preliminaries signed by Mesnager, and sent them to Holland, when a private treaty was by his advice concluded with France. 4. He had not regarded the representations of Buix, the Dutch Minister, but declared the Queen had made no such treaty, nor would do so without the consent of the States. 5. He had ordered the Bishop of London to insist upon Spain, though, by the Preliminaries, the Duke of Anjou was acknowledged as King, and though he had persuaded the Queen not to insist upon the restitution of Spain. 6. He had not procured satisfaction for the Allies, but acted in concert with France. 7. He had advised the Queen to accept the Duke of Anjou's renunciation, though Torci had declared it to be null and void by the fundamental laws of France. 8. He had with others advised, that the Duke of Ormond should be ordered to engage in no battle or siege to the ruin of the affairs of the Allies, and afterwards sent an order to the Bishop of London, to declare, that the Queen looked upon herself to be then under no obligations whatsoever to the States. 9. He had advised that the Duke of Ormond, with all the troops in the Queen's pay, should separate themselves from the army of the Allies, and not to pay the arrears due to those that refused. 10. He had advised the fatal Suspension of Arms, and the sending of Lord Bolingbroke to France to settle the terms. 11. He had treacherously advised the enemy how to gain Tournay. 12. He had advised and assisted in giving up Spain and the West-Indies to the Duke of Anjou. 13. He had treacherously advised the 9th article of the treaty of Commerce with France, and the giving to the French the liberty of fishing, and drying fish on Newfoundland. 14. He had taken Sicily from the House of Austria, and given it the Duke of Savoy, without any application from the Duke. 15. He had caused the Queen to make several speeches and declarations to the Parlia-

article.

A great debate arose upon the question, Whether this article was High-Treason? Sir Robert Raymond, formerly Solicitor-General, Mr Bromley, Sir William Wyndham, the Auditors Harley and Foley, Mr Ward and Mr Hungerford (who had already spoke in favour of the Earl of Oxford) maintained the negative, and were strongly supported by Sir Joseph Jekyll. Sir Joseph said, among other things: 'That it was ever his principle to do justice to every body from the highest to the lowest, being persuaded, that it was the duty of an honest man never to act by a spirit of party. That he hoped he might pretend to have some knowledge of the laws of the Kingdom; and as, in the Committee of Secrecy, he had taken the liberty to differ from his Colleagues, he would not scruple to declare now to the whole House, that, in his judgment, the charge in question did not amount to High-Treason.' Most of the other Members of the Committee of Secrecy were offended at this speech, which both revealed and censured their proceedings; and Mr Walpole answered with some warmth, 'That there were both in and out of the Committee of Secrecy several persons, who did not in the least yield to the Member, that spoke last, in point of honesty; and who, without derogating from his merit, were superior to him in the knowledge of the laws; but who, at the same time, were satisfied, that the charge specified in the eleventh article amounted to Treason.' Mr Walpole was seconded by Mr Stanhope, the Lord Coningsby, General Cadogan, Mr Boscawen, and Mr Aylshy: And, the article being amended, was agreed to by a majority of two hundred and forty-seven votes against one hundred and twenty-seven. Mr Auditor Harley endeavoured to justify his Brother, first, by urging, that he ever acted by the late Queen's positive commands; to prove which he offered to produce two letters from her: And, secondly, the necessity of making a peace; and he having upon this occasion advanced, that the Dutch prolonged the war, and that their Deputies in the army had often prevented the giving the enemy a decisive blow; General Cadogan answered him with great force, and shewed, 'that the Dutch were more concerned than any Prince or State in the Grand Alliance to put an end to the war; and undertook to prove, that there had not been any campaign in Flanders, except that, in which the Duke of Ormond commanded, that was not marked and famous to all posterity for some signal and glorious event, to the advantage of the common cause.' The rest of the articles being agreed to, the Lord Coningsby, attended by most of the Members who voted for the impeachment, went up to the Lords, and at the Bar of the House impeached the Earl of Oxford of High-Treason, &c. The Commons, at the end of the articles, prayed and demanded, that he might be sequestered from Parliament, and committed to safe custody.

As soon as Lord Coningsby and the Members were withdrawn, a Tory Lord moved for adjourning the consideration of the articles, and was seconded by several of the Peers of that party, particularly by the Bishop of Rocheſter, who urged, 'That this accusation was of so extraordinary a nature, and so very important, both in itself and its consequences, that the House ought to proceed on it with the utmost caution and deliberation.' But he was answered by the Duke of Argyle, who, among other things, said, 'It was well known, that the Prelate, who spoke last, had of late studied Politics more than Divinity, and was thoroughly acquainted with the subject-matter of the articles, that lay before them; and therefore he did not doubt, but his Lordship was now as ready to speak to them, as he could ever be, if he had more time to consider of them.' After a debate of about an hour and a half, the articles were voted to be read by a majority of eighty-six against fifty-four; which being done, a motion was made for consulting the Judges, whether the charge amounted to High-Treason. The Lords Trevor and Harcourt, the Dukes of Shrewsbury and Leeds, Earl Poulet, the Lord North and Grey, the Bishop of Rocheſter, and some other Peers of the same side, were for consulting the Judges; but the Lord-Chancellor, the Dukes of Argyle and Montrose, the Earls of Nottingham, Sunderland, Dorset, and Illy; the Lord Viscount Townshend, and some other Lords spoke against it. The Lord Trevor having gone so far, as to declare his opinion, That none of the articles amounted to High-Treason, he was answered by the Lord Cowper, who shewed the contrary, and challenged all the Lawyers in England to disprove his arguments. The other side still insisting on consulting the Judges, the Earl of Nottingham represented to them, 'That instead of favouring thereby the noble Person ment, wherein the terms of Peace and Commerce were falsely represented. 16. He had as far as in him lay destroyed the independency of the House of Lords, by causing the Queen to create twelve Peers at once to serve his ends. To these were afterwards added the six following articles. 17. He had not (as Prime Minister) advised the Queen against the destructive expedition to Canada. 18. He had procured a warrant for 13000*l.* for his own use. 19. He had procured a warrant for 5560*l.* to his relation Thomas Harley. 20. He had paid a large sum of money to King James's Queen. 21. He had received Patrick Lillo (alias) Lawless, an Irish Papist, as a foreign Minister, and caused several sums of money to be paid him. 22. He had with others caused the Catalans to be exposed to the fury of an enraged, revengeful Prince, against whom the late Queen had engaged then to take arms.

1715. who had the misfortune to be impeached, as undoubtedly they meant it, they might, on the contrary, do him a great prejudice. For if, upon consulting the Judges, they declared the charge to amount to Treason, he would stand prejudged, before he was brought to his trial.⁹ After some other speeches, the negative was carried by eighty-four voices against fifty-two. And then it was moved, that the Earl of Oxford should be committed to safe custody; which occasioned another debate; and the Earl himself made a speech, wherein he took notice of 'his having had the honour to be placed at the head of the late Ministry; and must now, it seems, be made accountable for all the measures, that were then pursued. But that it was a very great comfort to him under this misfortune, that he had the honour to be a member of that august Assembly, which always squares their proceedings and judgments by the rules of honour, justice, and equity, and is not to be biased by a spirit of party. That the whole accusation might be reduced to the Negotiation and Conclusion of the peace. That the Nation wanted a peace (says he) nobody will deny; and, I hope, it will be as easily made out, that the conditions of this peace are as good, as could be expected, considering the circumstances, wherein it was made, and the backwardness and reluctance, which some of the Allies shewed to come into the Queen's measures. This is certain, that this peace, as bad as it is now represented, was approved by two successive Parliaments. It is indeed suggested against this peace, that it was a separate one. But I hope, my Lords, it will be made appear, that it was general; and that it was France, and not Great-Britain, that made the first steps towards a Negotiation. And, my Lords, I will be bold to say, that, during my whole Administration, the Sovereign upon the Throne was loved at home, and feared abroad. As to the business of Townshay, which is made a capital charge, I can safely aver, that I had no manner of share in it; and that the same was wholly transacted by that unfortunate Nobleman, who thought fit to step aside. But I dare say in his behalf, that, if this charge could be proved, it would not amount to Treason. For my own part, as I always acted by the immediate directions and commands of the late Queen, and never offended against any known law, I am justified in my own conscience, and unconcerned for the life of an insignificant old man. But I cannot, without the highest ingratitude, be unconcerned for the best of Queens; a Queen, who heaped upon me honours and preferments, though I never asked for them; and therefore I think myself under an obligation to vindicate her memory, and the measures she pursued, to my dying breath. My Lords, if Ministers of State, acting by the immediate commands of their Sovereign, are afterwards to be made accountable for their proceedings, it may one day or other be the case of all the Members of this august Assembly. I do not doubt, therefore, that, out of regard to yourselves, your Lordships will give me an equitable hearing; and I hope, that, in the prosecution

tion of this inquiry, it will appear, that I have merited, not only the indulgence, but likewise the favour of this government. My Lords, I am now to take my leave of your Lordships, and of this honourable House, perhaps for ever! I shall lay down my life with pleasure, in a cause favoured by my late dear Royal Mistress. And when I consider, that I am to be judged by the justice, honour, and virtue of my Peers, I shall acquiesce, and retire with great content. And, my Lords, God's will be done.⁹

Before the question for committing him was put, the Duke of Shrewsbury acquainted the House, that the Earl was at present very much indisposed with the gravel; and therefore he hoped they would not immediately send him to the Tower, but suffer him to be two or three days in custody of the Black-Rod, at his own house; which met with no opposition.

When the Earl of Oxford went home, he was attended by a mob, that cried out, High Church Ormond, and Oxford for ever. However of twenty Bishops, who were in the House that day, six only were for him (1).

The Earl of Oxford being brought the next July 12th day to the Bar of the House, and having received a copy of the articles, he represented, 'That the ablest men in the Nation had been many weeks in drawing up those long articles against him; and therefore he hoped the House would allow him a proportionable time to answer them.' He took that occasion 'to thank them for their great humanity in not sending him to the Tower, and, as he still laboured under the same indisposition, he humbly desired them to permit him to continue some few days more at his own house, under the custody of the Black-Rod.' The Earl being withdrawn, the Lords resolved to allow him a month to answer the articles of impeachment; and Dr Mead, one of his Physicians, being consulted, and having made a kind of affidavit, 'That, if the Earl was sent to the Tower, his life would be in danger;' a motion was made, 'That he might continue in his house till the Monday following.' But this was opposed, and after a warm debate it was carried by eighty-one against fifty-five, that he should be sent to the Tower on Saturday the 16th of July.

During the course of this debate, the Earl of Anglesey having said, 'That it was to be feared, these violent measures would make the Scepter shake in the King's hands;' most of the Lords were offended at this suggestion, and some cried, to the Tower, and others only to Order. The Earl of Sutherland standing up said, 'He trembled with indignation to hear such words pronounced in that noble Assembly. That, if they had been spoke any where else, he would call the person, that spoke them, to an account. But all he could do there was to move, that he might explain himself.' The Earl of Sutherland was seconded by the Duke of Roxburgh, who, among other things, said, 'That the Scepter was so well riveted in the King's hand, that, instead of shaking, it would crush all his Majesty's enemies.' Upon these, and some other speeches, the Earl of Anglesey said, 'It was but

He had, on several occasions, given sufficient proofs of his zeal and affection for the Revolution and the Protestant Succession. What he had now advanced, was the result of the same zeal for the peace and prosperity of his Majesty's Reign. However, if he had been so unhappy, as by any ungarded or passionate expression to give offence to that August assembly, he was very sorry for it. Notwithstanding this apology, some Members were inclined to have him sent to the Tower; but, the very words, he had spoken, not having been taken down in writing his explanation was admitted. It is observable, that on this occasion, besides the six Bishops, before mentioned, those of Bath and Wells, and St David's voted for the Earl of Oxford; and that the Earl was by many blamed for putting off his going to the Tower, which, they said, did not correspond with that firmness he had hitherto shewn. It is certain, as he came in his own coach to the House of Lords, he might with as much ease have been carried to the Tower, either by water, or in a sedan, and have had there the same attendance of his friends and physicians. The House having met on Friday, the 15th of July, they adjourned to the Monday following, to avoid, as it was generally surmised, any fresh motion, which the Earl of Oxford's friends might make for deferring his being sent to the Tower, where he was carried by the Black-Rod on the day appointed about eight o'clock in the evening in his chariot, attended by two hackney-coaches, in which were his Lady, his Son the Lord Harley, and some other of the Earl's relations and servants. Though these three coaches went from his house near St James's-Palace up St James's-Street, and then through Piccadilly, Gerard-Street, Monmouth-Street, and Holbourn, with design to avoid a crowd, yet were they attended by a great many of the common people, whose numbers being much increased in their return from the Tower, they raised a tumult in the streets, with their cry of High Church, Ormond, and Oxford for ever, upon which three or four of the mutineers were by the Constables carried to the Round-house.

The Earl of Oxford carried to the Tower, July 16.
Address of the Commons about tumults.
Pr. H. C.

These riots and tumults were not confined to London, but were spread through the Kingdom. The day before the Earl of Oxford was sent to the Tower, the House of Commons received information of their tumultuous proceedings in Staffordshire, where several Meeting-Houses had been pulled down by the mob. Upon this the Commons unanimously resolved to address the King, that the laws might be put in a speedy and most vigorous execution against the Rioters, and an account be taken of such Justices, as failed in the discharge of their duty; and that the Sufferers, by these riots, may have a full compensation for their damages, which they would inable his Majesty to make good, out of the next aids granted by Parliament. The King, in his answer, promised an immediate compliance with their request, and hoped, by their reasonable assistance, to suppress the spirit of rebellion, and establish peace and prosperity.

For the more effectual prevention of riots, the King came to the House of Peers on the 20th of July, and, among others, gave the Royal assent to the Proclamation-act, as it is commonly called, by which act, if any persons, to the number of twelve, being unlawfully assembled, to the disturbance of the peace, and being required by a Justice of Peace or other Officer, by proclamation in the King's name, to disperse themselves, shall riotously continue together one hour after the proclamation, it shall be felony without benefit of the Clergy (1). After passing this and the rest of the acts, the Chancellor read the following speech, delivered into his hands by the King:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THE zeal you have shewn for preserving the peace of my Kingdoms, and your wisdom in providing so good a law to prevent all riotous and tumultuous proceedings, give me great satisfaction. But I am sorry to find, that such a spirit of Rebellion has discovered itself, as leaves no room to doubt, but these disorders are set on foot and encouraged by persons disaffected to my Government, in expectation of being supported from abroad.

The preservation of our excellent Constitution, and the security of our holy Religion, has been, and always shall be, my chief care; and I cannot question but your concern for these invaluable blessings is so great, as not to let them be exposed to such attempts, as I have certain advice are preparing by the Pretender from abroad, and carrying on at home by a restless party in his favour.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

In these circumstances I think it proper to ask your assistance, and make no doubt but you will so far consult your own security, as not to leave the Nation under a Rebellion actually begun at home, and threatened with an Invasion from abroad, in a defenceless condition. And I shall look upon the provision you shall make for the safety of my people, as the best mark of your affection to me.

The

(1) The proclamation must be in these words: Our Sovereign Lord the King chargeth and commandeth all persons, being assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the act made in the first year of King George, for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies. This act is to be read at every Sessions and Leet.

Other acts passed at this time were: 1. For continuing the imprisonment of the Conspirators against King William. 2. For the Quakers affirmation instead of their oath. 3. An act for regulating the forces. 4. The malt-tax. Lastly, An act to explain the act of 12 Will. III, for the further limitation of the Crown, &c.

(1) When

1715. The King, as appears by this speech, had received some intelligence of the Rebellion forming against him. Though the disaffected in England vented their fury in riots, and tumults, in breaking windows, and demolishing Meeting-Houses, the case was very different in Scotland, where the designs of the Jacobites were carried on with more secrecy and order, and very probably would have succeeded, had they been supported by their friends in England as will hereafter appear.

The Commons in their address of thanks assure the King, that they will, with their lives and fortunes, stand by and support him against all his open and secret enemies; and desire him immediately to give directions for fitting out such a number of ships, as may effectually guard the coasts, and to issue out Commissions for augmenting his forces by land; promising, without loss of time, effectually to enable him to raise and maintain such a number of forces, both by sea and land, as shall be necessary for the defence of his sacred Person, and for the security of his Kingdoms (1).²

Addresses from the Lords and the Convocation.
An address with the offer of their lives and fortunes was also presented by the Lords. The same day the Convocation waited on the King with an address, wherein, having thanked him for his message to the Commons, about the maintenance for the Ministers of the fifty new Churches, they proceed: 'After all the declarations your Majesty has been pleased to make in favour of our established Church, and the real proofs you have given for the concern of its interest; we hope, that none will be found so unjust, as to doubt of your affection to it. And we do most humbly assure your Majesty, that we will take all opportunities to infuse into those, who are under our care, the same grateful sense, that we ourselves have of your Majesty's goodness; and that at this time more especially, when the quiet of your Realms is disturbed by Insurrections at home, and the Nation threatened with an Invasion from abroad, we will put them in mind of those strict obligations of conscience, whereby they are engaged to defend and support your Majesty's Government; and will earnestly exhort them to exemplify, by a suitable practice, those principles of obedience and loyalty, which the Church of England has always thought it her duty to profess.' All these addresses met with a very gracious reception.

Precaution against the Rebellion.
The Parliament passed an act to empower the King to secure suspected persons, and to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in that time of danger. A clause was added to a Money-Bill for the reward of 100,000 l. to such as should seize the Pretender dead or alive. Upon a motion of Mr Walpole, the Commons ordered an address for giving full pay to such half-pay Officers as were not provided for. Sir George Byng set out for the Downs to take upon him the command of the fleet, and General Erle went to his Government of Portsmouth to put that place in a posture of defence. General Cadogan marked out a camp in Hyde-Park for the Foot-guards. Lord Irwin was made Governor of Hull, in the room of Brigadier Sutton, who with the Generals Ross, Webb, and Stewart, the Lord Windsor, Colonel Descanay, and other officers were either dismissed the service or ordered to sell.

Pursuant to the Commons address, the King ordered thirteen regiments of dragoons, consisting of three thousand men, and eight of foot, consisting of four thousand, to be raised. He left the nomination of the Officers to the Dukes of Marlborough and Argyle, and the Generals Stanhope and Cadogan (2). The Trained-bands were also ordered to be in a readiness to suppress riots and tumults. Upon this, the several bodies concerned in these orders came to Court with addresses, expressing their abhorrence of all seditious and tumultuous assemblies, and their resolution to do their duty in preserving the publick peace, and to stand by and assist his Majesty with their persons and estates. These addresses were from the Common-Council of the City of London (3), from the Lieutenantcy of the same City, and from the Earl of Clare, who was Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Middlesex, with the Deputy-Lieutenants and Justices of the Peace. These were followed by several others, particularly from the Bishop of London and his Clergy; the University of Cambridge, the Dissenting Ministers of London and Westminster, the Commission of the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, and the University of Oxford; but the Members of that University, when they presented their address, were told, 'That, as they had shewn an open disrespect to his Majesty's Person and Government in their late conduct, his Majesty expected they should satisfy him better of their loyalty by their future behaviour, before they attempted it by words.' Nor was it a small part of the reason of the public displeasure, and of the repulse, which the University of Oxford met with on that occasion, that at the very time it was to be presented, an account came to Court by express, that some of the King's Officers, who, were beating up for Volunteers for a new regiment of dragoons, were attacked by some of the Scholars, and hardly escaped being killed.

the articles against the Duke of Ormond.
Aug. 5.

Whilst these things passed, the Commons added six articles more against the Earl of Oxford; and, two days after, the articles of impeachment against the Lord Bolingbroke were agreed to, and delivered by Mr Walpole at the bar of the House of Lords, where he impeached him. The next day, the articles against the Duke of Ormond being read, there arose a warm debate, in which several remarkable speeches were made. Among the rest, a Member of a considerable estate, and who had all along voted with the Tories, said, That the Report of the Committee of Secrecy had begun to open his eyes; and that the Duke of Ormond's flight had fully convinced him, that the heads of the Tory party were a set of knaves and villains, who designed to have ruined their Country, and made it a province to France. The Lord Stanhope, the eldest son of the Earl of Chesterfield, who spoke for the first time on this occasion, said, 'He never wished to spill the blood of any of his Countrymen, much less of any Nobleman; but that he was persuaded, that the safety of his Country required, that examples should be made of those, who betrayed it in so infamous a manner.' The Lord Finch, eldest son of the Earl of Nottingham, spoke also on the same side; and, after some other speeches, the first article was agreed to by a majority of a hundred and seventy-seven voices against seventy-eight; and then the other articles also were severally agreed to by the House. The first article charged the Duke with corresponding with Marshal Villars, the French General, while he commanded the British army in Flanders. The second, That he wickedly promised and engaged, that he would not attack the French army, nor engage in any siege against France. The third, That he did falsely, maliciously, wickedly, and traitorously adhere to the French King; and, in pursuance of a wicked promise he had secretly made with the Marshal de Villars, he endeavoured to persuade the Generals of the Confederate army to raise the siege of Quenoy; and, when he could not prevail, marched off with the Queen's troops, and gave the enemy's General advice of it. The other articles are in effect his conduct in Flanders reduced into a charge. And, both he and the Lord Bolingbroke having fled from justice, bills were brought in to summon them to render themselves by the 10th of September, and, in default thereof, to attain them of High-Treason; which passed both Houses, and received the Royal assent.

On the 8th of August, the House of Commons was called over, and among several absent Members, who were not excused, Sir Michael Wharton, Mr Corbet Kynaston, and Mr Lewis Pryse were ordered into custody. The two former were immediately discharged; but Mr Pryse declining to take the oaths, and having never attended the House, for that and other reasons, and being not found by the Messengers, was afterwards expelled.

On the 31st of August the articles against the Earl of Strafford were agreed to by the Commons, and carried by Mr Aylmer to the Lords. The articles being read in the House of Lords, the Earl of Strafford made a long speech, wherein, among other things, he complained of the hardships which had been put upon him by seizing his papers in an unprecedented manner: That he designed to have drawn up and printed an account of all his Negotiations; whereby he did not doubt he should have made it appear to all the world, that he had done nothing but in discharge of his duty, and of the trust reposed in him. That if, either in his letters or discourses, while he had the honour to represent the Crown of Great-Britain, he had dropped any unguarded expressions against some foreign Ministers, he hoped the same would not be accounted a crime by a British House of Peers. He concluded with desiring, that a competent time might be allowed him to answer the articles now brought against him; and that he might have duplicates of all the papers, that either had been laid before the Committee of Secrecy, or were still in the hands of the Government, which might be for his justification. The Lord Townshend said, 'That his complaint about the taking his papers from him was altogether groundless and unjust: That infinite instances of the like proceedings might be produced: That no State could be safe without it; and, in short, that extraordinary cases justify extraordinary methods. As to the Earl's demand to have duplicates of all the papers, that had been laid before the Commons, he (the Lord Townshend) thought it unreasonable, and made with no other design than to gain time, and make the Commons lose the opportunity of bringing him to his trial. That those papers were so voluminous (consisting of thirteen or fourteen volumes in folio) that they could not be copied out in many weeks; and as the Earl might have had access to them, ever since they were laid before the Parliament, so he was still at liberty to peruse them, and extract out of them what he thought proper for his own defence.' The Duke of Devonshire and the Lord Chancellor Cowper seconded the Lord Townshend; on the other hand, the late Lord Chancellor Harcourt and the Bishop of Rochester spoke for the Earl of Strafford; but what availed the latter most, was said by the Earl of Illy, who represented, 'That, in all civilized Nations, all Courts of judicature, except the Inquisition, allowed the persons arraigned all that was necessary for their justification; and that the House of Peers of Great-Britain ought not, in this case, to do any thing contrary to that honour and equity, for which they are so justly renowned throughout all Europe.' Upon this it was resolved, 'That the Earl of Strafford should have copies of all such papers, as were in the Secretary's and other offices, which he should think proper for his defence: That he should have free access to the papers, that had been laid before the Commons: And that a month's time be allowed him, to answer the articles of impeachment against him.'

On the 3d of September the Earl of Oxford Debate on the Earl of Oxford's answer. Pr. H. C. caused his answer to the Commons impeachment to be delivered to the House of Lords, who transmitted it to the Commons, where it occasioned a small debate. Mr Walpole, among other things, said, 'he had not yet had time to examine that answer; but he now heard it read with a great deal of attention, and in his opinion, it contained little more than what had been suggested in vindication of the late measures, in a pamphlet intitled, The conduct of the Allies, and repeated over and over in the papers called the Examiner. That the main drift of this answer seemed to prove these two assertions: First, that the Earl of Oxford had no share

1715. share in the advising and managing the matters mentioned in the articles against him; but that the late Queen did every thing: And, secondly, that the late Queen was a wife, good, and pious Princess. That, if the second proposition were not better grounded than the first, the reputation of that excellent Princess would be very precarious; but as every body must own her to have been a good and pious Queen; so it was notorious, that the Earl of Oxford, as prime Minister, was the chief adviser, promoter, and manager of the matters charged upon him in the articles. And therefore his answer was a false and malicious libel, laying upon his Royal Mistress the blame of all the pernicious measures he had led her into, against her own honour, and the good of his country. That he hoped the Earl's endeavouring to screen himself behind the Queen's name would avail him nothing: That it is indeed a fundamental maxim of our Constitution, That Kings can do no wrong; but, at the same time, it is no less certain, That Ministers of State are accountable for their actions: Otherwise a Parliament would be but an empty name; the Commons would have no business in that place; and the Government would be absolute and arbitrary. That though the Earl had the assurance to aver, that he had no share in the management of affairs, that were transacted, while he was at the helm, yet he pretended to justify the late measures. And therefore, in that respect, his answer ought to be looked upon as a libel on the proceedings of the Commons, since he endeavoured to clear those persons, who had already confessed their guilt by flight.* Mr Shippen, a creature of the Earl of Oxford, said, It would not become him to defend the Earl's answer, since, as a Member of that honourable Assembly, he was become one of his accusers; but he could not forbear wishing, this prosecution might be dropped, and that the House would be satisfied with the two late acts of attainder. That this wish of his was the stronger, because one of the principal reasons, that induced the Commons to impeach the Earl of Oxford, subsisted no longer, the affairs of Europe having received a sudden turn from the death of the French King, whereby the Renunciation of King Philip began to take place in the advancement of the Duke of Orleans to the absolute regency of France.* Mr Aylmer answered, 'He hoped it was to little purpose, that the Gentleman, who spoke last, endeavoured to move the pity and compassion of the House, and persuade them to drop this prosecution. That this was not a proper time to examine and reply to the Earl of Oxford's answer; and therefore he would content himself with saying in general, that it was a contumacious of the shifts, evasions, and false representations contained in the three parts of the history of the White Staff. As to what had been suggested concerning the event, which seemed to have strengthened the Renunciation, he did not deny, there might be something in it, which was manifest from the great joy the well-affected to the Government had shewn on this occasion, and from the mortification and despair, that appeared in the faces of a certain party. But, after all, it could not yet be ascertained, that the Renunciation was in force: That there was a vast difference between the Regency and the Crown; that time only could decide that matter; but even supposing, that, by the concurrence of unforeseen events, King Philip's Renunciation should at last take place, yet the same would not justify the Ministers, who proposed and laid it as the foundation of the late peace, since they, with whom they treated, were so frank and so sincere as to tell them, that it could never be valid by the fundamental laws of France.* After some other speeches, it was ordered, 1. That the answer of Robert Earl of Oxford be referred to the Committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment, and prepare evidence against the impeached Lords. 2. That the Committee prepare a replication to the answer. Accordingly a replication was prepared, and being agreed to was sent to the Lords.

The next day, a Report from the same Committee, concerning the state and circumstances of Mr Prior's commitment, was made to the House in the following manner:

'That, in the perusal and examination of the several books and papers referred to the Committee of Secrecy, Mr Prior appeared, through the whole progress of the separate and pernicious Negotiations, carried on between the Ministers of Great-Britain and France, to have been principally concerned as an Agent and Instrument of those evil and traitorous Counsellors, some of which are already attainted, and others stand impeached of High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors: And the Committee conceiving there were matters contained in the first general Report, from which crimes of a very high nature ought to be justly charged and imputed to Mr Prior, whenever the House should think proper to enter into that consideration; as likewise that Mr Prior was able to give great lights into all those dark and secret transactions, when he should be called upon by the Great Council of the Nation, or any Committee appointed by them, to give an account of the Negotiations, in which he was concerned as a public Minister; the House, upon a motion from the Committee for that purpose, was pleased to order, before the Report was made, that Mr Prior should be taken into custody of the Serjeant at Arms, to prevent his making his escape, upon notice of what was contained in the Report.

That this method of confining Mr Prior is not only agreeable to former precedents upon the like occasions, but necessary and essential to that great duty and privilege of the House of Commons, of redressing grievances, and bringing great offenders to justice.

That the Committee did, some time after, pursuant to the powers given them by the House, proceed to examine Mr Prior concerning several matters, of which there can be no doubt but he was fully apprized and acquainted with; in which examination Mr Prior did behave himself with such contempt of the authority of Parliament, and prevaricate in so gross a manner, as most justly to deserve the highest displeasure of the House.

But finding at last, after an examination of several hours, that it was impossible for him to disguise or conceal some facts, that were before the Committee, he was induced to declare upon oath some truths, which will be very material evidence upon the trials of the impeached Lords.

And the Committee having notice, that Mr Prior had, during his first confinement, met and conferred 1715. conferred with the Earl of Oxford, and his nearest relations and dependants, which Mr Prior confessed to be true, thought it their duty to move the House, that Mr Prior might be committed to closer custody.

From this short state of the proceedings relating to Mr Prior, the Committee submits it to the wisdom of the House, Whether his behaviour has so far merited the favour and mercy of the House, as to make that confinement more easy to him, which his contempt of the Commons of Great-Britain, and his notorious prevarication, most justly brought him into. And it seems worthy of consideration, how far it may be thought advisable for the House of Commons to set at liberty a person in their custody, and committed according to the antient methods and practice of Parliament; who is a material evidence against high offenders, under prosecution of the Commons of Great-Britain, and who, there is reason to apprehend, would immediately withdraw himself, and, as far as in him lay, defeat the justice of the Nation.

After the reading of this Report, the Commons ordered, 'That the Committee be empowered to sit, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House.'

The time for the Duke of Ormond and the Lord Viscount Bolingbroke to render themselves being expired, the House of Lords ordered the Earl Marshal to raze out of the list of Peers their names and coats of arms. Inventories were likewise directed to be taken of their personal estates; and the achievement of the Duke, as Knight of the Garter, to be taken down from St George's Chapel at Windsor.

On the 30th of August, an act received the Royal assent, for encouraging loyalty in Scotland. By this act every vassal that holds lands of any superior guilty of High-Treason, by abetting the Pretender, and continues peaceable, shall be invested with the said lands in fee and heritage for ever. In like manner, if any subject of Great-Britain, holding lands of a superior in Scotland, shall be guilty of such High-Treason, his lands shall return into the hands of the superior, and be consolidated with the superior's. All entails and settlements of estates, since the 1st of August 1714, in favour of children, with a fraudulent intent to avoid the punishment of the law due to the offence of High-Treason, by abetting the Pretender, shall be null and void. Besides these and other particulars, this act had a clause in it, for summoning any suspected person in Scotland to appear at Edinburgh, or where it should be judged expedient, to find bail for his good behaviour, with certification, that, if they did not appear at the time appointed, they would be denounced Rebels. Pursuant to this clause, all the heads of the Jacobite Clans, and other suspected persons, were soon after summoned to appear at Edinburgh, and not obeying the summons, they were declared Rebels.

By this time the Court had received certain information, that an open Rebellion was broke out in Scotland, under the direction of the Earl of Mar, which was to be supported by a great Conspiracy in England. The Earl of Mar, at the death of Queen Anne, was Secretary of State for Scotland, and had been one of the first who made professions of their loyalty and affection to King George, as appears by a letter he wrote the King before his arrival (1). The Earl had also taken the oaths of allegiance and abjuration. But, not meeting the encouragement he expected, The Earl, about the 8th of August 1715, embarked with Major-General Hamilton, Colonel Hay, and two servants, at Gravesend, on board a collier, and, arriving at Newcastle, hired a vessel belonging to one Spence of Leith, which in eight days landed them at Elie in Fife. They immediately went to the house of John Bethune of Balfour, where they staid all night, and from thence rode to the Lord Kinnoul's. The next day they proceed to Craigie-Hall; and Colonel Hay conveyed the Earl of Mar about three miles, and went to the Lord Nairn's; and the Earl and General Hamilton proceeded to the Laird of Invercald's at the Brae of Mar. Colonel Hay, the Lord John Drummond, the Marquis of Tullibardine, Strouven Robertson, and several other Highland Gentlemen, and particularly the Lairds of Glenbucket, Glenderule, Abergeldy, Dalmere, Auchindrain, and John Paterson, who had been a Clerk in the Secretary's Office,

(1) The Earl of Mar's letter was as follows:

S I R,

Having the happiness to be your Majesty's subject, and also the honour of being one of your servants, as one of your Secretaries of State, I beg leave by this to kiss your Majesty's hand, and congratulate your happy Accession to the Throne; which I would have done myself the honour of doing sooner, had I not hoped to have had the honour of doing it personally ere now. I am afraid I may have had the misfortune of being misrepresented to your Majesty; and my reason for thinking so is, because I was, I believe, the only one of the late Queen's servants, whom your Ministers did not visit, which I mentioned to Mr Harley, and the Earl of Clarendon, when they went from hence to wait on your Majesty: And your Ministers carrying so to me was the occasion of my receiving such orders, as deprived me of the honour and satisfaction of waiting on them, and being known to them. I suppose, I had been misrepresented to them by some here upon account of party, or to ingratiate themselves by aspersing others, as our parties here too often occasion; but I hope your Majesty will be so just, as not to give credit to such misrepresentations. The Part I acted in the bringing about and making the Union, when the Succession of the Crown was settled for Scotland on your Majesty's Family, where I had the honour to serve as Secretary of State for that Kingdom, doth, I hope, put my sincerity and faithfulness to your Majesty out of dispute. My family hath had the honour, for a great tract of years, to be faithful servants to the Crown, and have had the care of the King's children (when Kings of Scotland) intrusted to them. A predecessor of mine was honoured with the care of your Majesty's Grandmother, when young, and she was pleased afterwards to express some concern for our family in letters, which I still have under her own hand. I have had the honour to serve her late Majesty, in one capacity or other, ever since her Accession to the Crown. I was happy in a good Mistress, and she was pleased to have some confidence in me, and regard for my services. And since your Majesty's happy Accession to the Crown, I hope, you will find, that I have not been wanting in my duty, in being instrumental in keeping things quiet and peaceable in the Country, to which I belong, and have some interest in. Your Majesty shall ever find me as faithful and dutiful a subject and

The Earl of Mar, the Marquis of Tullibardine, General Hamilton, and Mr Paterfon returned to Invercald, where they staid about eight days; during which the Earl sent several letters, and received others; and in that time there were gathered together about five hundred of his own men, three hundred of whom, being well armed, went to Castletown with him and General Hamilton; and Innerey (who came to Invercald the day before) and the remaining two hundred went away, till they should be provided with better arms, and then were to follow under the command of Innerey. At Castletown they proclaimed the Pretender; whose Standard was set up by the Earl of Mar at Bras-Mar, on the 6th of September.

Upon the news of the Earl's being in the Higblands, and the report of his having drawn together a body of men, orders were immediately dispatched to Edinburgh, for apprehending several suspected persons; pursuant to which, the Earls of Hume, Wigtoun, and Kinnoul, and the Lord Desford, Mr Lockhart of Carnwath, and Mr Hume of Whitefield, were committed prisoners to the Castle. Orders were also sent to Major-General Wobesam, Commander in chief in Scotland, forthwith to march with all the regular troops, that could be spared, to form a camp near Sterling, to secure the bridge over the Forth, and to quarter the half-pay Officers in such a manner, that they might be in a readiness to command the militia. About this time, the Court received intelligence of several vessels ready to sail for Scotland, from the Port of Havre de Grace, laden with arms and ammunition for the use of the Pretender: And, notwithstanding all the precautions used by the Government, on the 29th of August, the Lord Justice Clerk had advice from Montrose, that one of those ships was arrived at Arbois in the North, where she was immediately unladen by the Higblanders, sent thither for that purpose, who carried the arms and ammunition to the Country of Bras-Mar. A few days after, another ship landed several Officers, who went to join the Earl of Mar, and gave him, and the Lords with him, assurances, that the Pretender would soon be in person amongst them. But the news of the death of Lewis XIV of France, on the 1st of September, N. S. so alarmed the Rebels, and struck such a general damp upon their spirits, that their Chiefs held a consultation, whether they should stand out any longer, in expectation of the Pretender's coming according to his promise, or whether they should give over their enterprize. They divided upon the question; some were for going home, and not stirring till the Pretender landed; but the majority, depending upon a general insurrection in England, were for persisting, at least, till they had news from the Pretender; to whom they all agreed to send Messengers immediately, to press his coming over. Pursuant to this resolution, the Earl of Mar assumed the title of Lieutenant-General of the Pretender's forces, and as such published a declaration, which he sent, with a letter, to the Baillie of Kildrummie, to exhort the people to take arms (1). A few days after, a manifesto was also published, setting

And I beg your Majesty may be so good not to believe any misrepresentation of me, which nothing but party hatred, and my zeal for the interest of the Crown doth occasion; and I hope I may presume to lay claim to your Royal favour and protection. As your Accession to the Crown hath been quiet and peaceable, may your Majesty's Reign be long and prosperous, and that your people may soon have the happiness and satisfaction of your presence among them, is the earnest and fervent wishes of him, who is, with the humblest duty and respect, Whitehall, Aug.

(1) The declaration ran thus:

* Our rightful and natural King James VIII, by the Grace of God, who is now coming to relieve us from our oppressions, having been pleased to intrust me with the direction of his affairs, and the command of his forces in this his antient Kingdom of Scotland; and some of his faithful subjects and servants met at Aboyne, viz. the Lord Huntley; the Lord Tullibardine, the Earl Maribail, the Earl of Southesk, Glengary from the Clans, Glenderule from the Earl of Broadalbin, and Gentlemen of Argyleshire, Mr Patrick Lyon of

No. 85, Vol. IV.

Auchterhouse, the Laird of Auldair, Lieutenant-General George Hamilton, Major-General Gordon, and myself, having taken into our consideration his Majesty's last and late orders to us, that as this is now the time, that he ordered us to appear openly in arms for him; so it seems to us absolutely necessary for his Majesty's service, and the relieving of our native Country from all its hardships, that all his faithful and loving subjects and lovers of their Country, should, with all possible speed, put themselves into arms.

These are therefore, in his Majesty's name and authority, and by virtue of the power aforesaid, and by the King's special order to me thereunto, to require and empower you forthwith to raise your fencible men, with their best arms; and you are immediately to march them to join me, and some other of the King's forces at the Inver of Bras-Mar, on Monday next, in order to proceed in our march to attend the King's Standard, with his other forces.

The King intending, that his forces shall be paid from the time of their setting out, he expects, as he positively orders, that they behave themselves civilly, and commit no plundering, nor other disorders, upon the highest penalties, and his displeasure; which it is expected you will see observed.

Now is the time for all good men to shew their zeal for his Majesty's service, whose cause is so deeply concerned, and the relief of our native Country from oppression, and a foreign yoke too heavy for us and our posterity to bear; and to endeavour the restoring, not only of our rightful and native King, but also our Country to its antient, free, and independent constitution under him; whose ancestors have reigned over us for so many generations.

Besides these measures, a Conspiracy was formed at Edinburgh to surprize the Castle, on the 8th of September, between eleven and twelve at night; which, by the care and vigilance of Sir Adam Cockburn, the Lord Justice Clerk, who had early notice of it, was prevented. The design was to mount the wall by the West-side of the Castle, by rope-ladders provided for that purpose, which were to be pulled up by lines let down from within by some soldiers belonging to the garrison, who had been corrupted. The Conspirators came to the Castle-wall at the time appointed; and a rope was let down and fixed to one of the ladders. But, the Lord Justice Clerk having sent intimation of this design to Colonel Stuart, Lieutenant-Governor of the Castle, he ordered the Officers under him to double their guards, and to make diligent rounds. As Lieutenant Lindsay was going the round in obedience to these orders, he found one of the soldiers, who had been corrupted, drawing up the ladder, in order to fix it to the top of the wall; and commanded the sentinel next him to fire, which giving the alarm, the Conspirators dispersed. But a party of the Town-guard, which, at the request of the Lord Justice Clerk, the Provost had sent out to patrol, with some resolute Volunteers, coming up, found Captain Maclean, formerly an Officer under the Lord Dundee, lying on the ground, bruised with a fall from the wall, whom they secured, with three others of his Accomplices. They likewise found the ladders, and about a dozen of firelocks and carbines, which the Conspirators had left behind. One Serjeant, one Corporal, and two private Soldiers of the garrison were also secured; and, by the confessions of the persons seized, it appeared, that the numbers engaged in this attempt were about eighty, of whom one half were Highlanders: That one Mr Arribar, formerly an Ensign in the Caille, engaged the soldiers in this Conspiracy, by promising the Serjeant a Lieutenant's Commission; the Corporal an Ensign's; and by giving one of the soldiers eight guineas, and the other four: That the Lord Drummond was to be Governor of the Castle, as being the Contriver of the design: And that, upon the success of it, the Conspirators were to fire three rounds of the artillery in the Castle; which, by the communication of fires to be kindled at convenient distances, was to be a signal to the Earl of Mar, immediately to march towards Edinburgh with his forces, to improve the confederation, and heighten the terror, which such an accident would have caused in the City.

The Duke of Argyle, being appointed Commander in Chief of the forces in Scotland, set out on the 9th of September for that Kingdom; and, about the same time, the Earl of Sutherland offered his service to go and raise the Highland Clans in the most northern Counties of Scotland, which was readily accepted; and the Queenborough man of war was appointed to transport him thither. Several other Scots Peers, particularly the Duke of Roxburgh, the Marquises of Annandale and Tweeddale, the Earls of Sekirk, Loudoun, Rothes, Haddington, and Forfar, the Lords Torricen and Belhaven, &c. readily embraced this opportunity to shew their loyalty to King George, and their zeal for their Country.

By this time a dangerous Conspiracy was discovered and prevented in England. On the 2d of September, Lieutenant-Colonel Paul, who had

The Earl's letter to the Baillie was in these terms:

Jackie, Invercald, Sept. 9. at night, 1715.

'Ye was in the right not to come with the hundred men ye sent up to night, when I expected four times the number. It is a pretty thing, when all the Highlands of Scotland are now rising upon their King and Country's account, as I have accounts from them since they were with me, and the Gentlemen in most of our neighbouring Lowlands expecting us down to join them, that my men should be only refractory. Is not this the thing we are now about, which they have been wishing these six and twenty years? And now when it is come, and the King and Country's cause at stake, will they for ever sit still, and see all perish? I have used gentle means too long, and so I shall be forced to put other orders I have in execution. I have sent you inclosed an order for the Lordship of Kildrummie, which you are immediately to intimate to all my vassals. If they give ready obedience, it will make some amends; and if not, ye may tell them from me, that it will not be in my power to save them (were I willing) from being treated as enemies by those, who are ready soon to join me: And they may depend on it, that I will be the first to propose and order their being so. Particularly, let my own tenants in Kildrummie know, that, if they come not forth with their best arms, I will send a party immediately to burn what they shall miss taking from them: And they may believe this not only a threat, but by all that is sacred I will put it in execution, let my loss be what it will that it may be an example to others. You are to tell the Gentlemen, that I will expect them in their best accoutrements on horse-back, and no excuse to be accepted of. Go about this with all diligence, and come yourself, and let me know your having done so. All this is not only as you will be answerable to me, but to your King and Country.

Your assured friend and servant,

To John Forbes of Invercald, Baillie of Kildrum-

(1) Manifesto and Declaration by the Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, who dutifully appear at this time in asserting the undoubted right of their lawful Sovereign James the VIIIth, by the Grace of God, King of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. and for relieving this his ancient Kingdom of Scotland from the oppression and grievances it lies under. His Majesty's right of blood to the Crown of these Realms is undoubted, and has never been disputed nor arraigned by the least circumstance of authority whatsoever.

By

1715. a Company in the first regiment of Foot-guards, was secured, and the next day committed prisoner to the Gate-House, being charged with instilling men for the Pretender's service, and other treasonable practices. The titular Duke of Powis, a Roman Catholic, was committed to the Tower for High-Treason; and the Lords Lansdown and Dupplin were also taken into custody; and a warrant issued out to apprehend the Earl of Jersey. At the same time, Mr Secretary Stanhope acquainted the Commons, 'That he was commanded by the King to communicate to them, that his Majesty, having just cause to suspect, that Sir William Wyndham, Sir John Packington, Mr Edward Harvey, Sent of Combe, Mr Thomas Forster, Junr. Mr John Anstis, and Mr Corbet Kyneston, were engaged in a design to support the intended Invasion of this Kingdom, had given orders for apprehending them: And desired the consent of the House, to his causing them to be committed and detained, if he should judge it necessary so to do;' which was unanimously agreed to by an address to that purpose.

Upon this, warrants were issued out for apprehending the six Members, two of whom, Harvey and Anstis, happening to be in town, were immediately secured. Mr Harvey stabbed himself some few days after with a knife, in two or three places of his breast; but the wounds proved not mortal. As to the rest, Mr Forster stood out in defiance of Justice, and with two Romish Lords raised a Rebellion in Northumberland. Sir John Packington was brought up to London from his house in Worcestershire, and being examined before the Council, and nothing appearing against him, was honourably discharged. Mr Kyneston made his escape, and Colonel Hyske, a Captain in the Foot-guards, was sent down with a Messenger to apprehend

Sir William Wyndham, at his house in Somersetshire, where they arrived between four and five in the morning. The door being opened, they appeared to be in haste to see Sir William; but the porter told them, he was in bed, and could not yet be spoke with. The Colonel told him, he came Express, and the person with him had a packet of letters of such consequence, that his Master must needs be immediately informed of it. This convinced the man, and Sir William presently leaped out of bed, and came in his gown to the Colonel, who told him he was his prisoner, the Messenger, at the same time, shewing the badge of his office. Sir William said, he readily submitted, but desired no noise might be made to frighten his Lady, who was with child. Then they entered a chamber, where the Colonel seeing Sir William's coat and waistcoat lie, told him, he had orders to seize all his papers; and that he must take leave to search his pockets, wherein he found a bundle of papers, which he secured. Sir William would have diverted him, by offering him very frankly the keys of his escrutoire, to search; but the Colonel happened to secure the most important papers, as he had reason to guess, by the great disorder and confusion in Sir William's looks, when he took the bundle out of his waistcoat pocket. Sir William desired the Colonel to stay till seven o'clock, and he would order his own coach and six horses to be ready, which would carry them all; telling the Colonel, he would only go in, and put on his cloaths, and take leave of his Lady, and then would wait on him. Out of deference to that Lady's noble relations, who, besides their high rank, had deserved it by their zeal and affection for the present Government, the Colonel had particular directions to use him with decorum, and readily complied with his request, looking on it as his parole to return:

But

By the laws of God, by the ancient constitution of these Nations, and by the positive unrevoked laws of the land, we are bound to pay his Majesty the duty of faithful subjects. Nothing can absolve us from this our duty of subjection and obedience. The laws of God require our allegiance to our rightful King: The laws of the land secure our religion, and other interests; and his Majesty, giving up himself to the support of his Protestant subjects, puts the means of securing to us our concerns religious and civil into our own hands.

Our fundamental Constitution has been entirely altered and sunk amidst the various shocks of unstable faction, which, in searching out new experiments pretended for our security, has produced nothing but daily disappointments, and has brought us and our posterity under a precarious dependence upon foreign counsels and interests, and the power of foreign troops.

The late unhappy Union, which was brought about by the mistaken notions of some, and by the ruinous and selfish designs of others, has proved so far from lessening and healing the differences betwixt his Majesty's subjects of Scotland, and England, that it has widened and increased them; and appears by experience to be inconsistent with the rights, interests, and privileges of us, and our good neighbours and fellow-subjects of England, that the continuance of it must inevitably ruin us, and hurt them: Nor can any way be found to relieve us, and restore our antient independent Constitution, but by restoring our rightful and natural King, who has the only undoubted right to reign over us. Neither can we hope that that party, who chiefly contributed to bring us into bondage, will at any time endeavour to work our relief, since it is known how strenuously they opposed in two late instances the efforts, that were made by all Scotsmen but themselves, and supported by the best and wisest of the English, towards so desirable an end, as they will not adventure openly to disown a dissolution of the Union to be.

Our substance has been wasted in the late ruinous wars; and we see an unavoidable prospect of having wars continued on us and our posterity, so long as the possession of the Crown is not in the right line.

The hereditary rights of the subjects, though confirmed by Conventions and Parliaments, are now treated as of no value nor force; and past services to the Crown and Royal Family are now looked upon as grounds of suspicion.

A packed Assembly, who call themselves a British Parliament, have, so far as in them lies, inhumanly murdered their own and our Sovereign, by promising a great sum of money as the reward of so execrable a crime. They have proscribed, by unaccountable and groundless impeachments and attainders, the worthiest Patriots of England; for their honourable and successful endeavours to restore trade, plenty, and peace to these Nations. They have broke in upon the sacred laws of both Countries, by which the liberties of our persons were secured. They have impowered a foreign Prince (who, notwithstanding his expectations of the Crown for fifteen years, is still unacquainted with our manners, customs, and language) to make an absolute conquest, if not timely prevented, of the three Kingdoms, by investing him with an unlimited power, not only of raising unnecessary forces at home, but also of calling in foreign troops, ready to promote his uncontrollable designs. Nor can we be very hopeful of its being 1715. But he soon found himself mistaken in the person, whose honour he had trusted to; for, tho' the Colonel had caused two doors of Sir William's bed-chamber to be secured, yet, there being a third, he made his escape through it. The Colonel, having directed the Messenger to stay at the house till further orders, returned with speed to London, to acquaint the Government with what had passed; whereupon the King in Council thought fit to sign a proclamation, with a reward of a thousand pounds, for apprehending Sir William.

One of the papers found in Sir William's pocket was said to be a list of the principal persons, who had joined in an Association to favour an Invasion, and to advance the Pretender to the Throne; which Association was transmitted to him by the Lord Lansdown. Be that as it will, it is certain a great many notorious Jacobites, who by this time had got together at Bath, in order to head the intended Insurrection in Somersetshire, were extremely alarmed at the coming down of the King's Messengers, and left that place with great precipitation, in a very stormy night. Sir William Wyndham, being pursued by the proclamation, and several Messengers, thought a Clergyman's habit the best disguise, and ordered one of his servants to write a letter to a Gentleman in Surrey, desiring him to give his Master refuge in his house; or, if he would not venture so far, to get him a lodging in the Minister's house, where he would come in a habit, that would bespeak him respect from a Clergyman. This letter being brought to the Gentleman's house while he was abroad, his Lady opened it; and being frightened with the thought of the danger, which her husband might incur in harbouring a person charged with Treason, she thought fit to send it to the Earl of Aylesford, who failed not immediately to communicate it to the Government. Sir William rightly judging, by the miscarriage of the letter, that he could hardly escape, thought it prudent to surrender himself. In order to which, having crossed the Thames near Twissleworth, he went first to Sion-House belonging to the Duke of Somerset, his father-in-law, and, coming from thence to London the 3d of October, he put himself into the hands of the Earl of Hertford, his brother-in-law, Captain of one of the troops of Life-guards; who having given notice of it to Mr Secretary Stanhope, a Messenger was sent to take Sir William into custody. Three days after, he was examined at the Council board, where he flatly denied he knew any thing of a plot. However, an order was made for his commitment to the Tower. It was then strongly reported, the Duke of Somerset offered to be his bail; which the Council did not think fit to accept. But whether the Duke bore this denial impatiently, and expressed some resentment upon it too warmly, it is certain, he was removed from his place of Master of the Horse.

While these things were transacting, the King came, on the 21st of September, to the House of Lords, and, having passed the bills that were ready, ordered the Lord-Chancellor to being otherwise, in the way it is in at present, for these generations to come; and the consequences of these unexampled proceedings has been already so fatal to great numbers of our kinsmen, friends, and fellow-subjects of both Kingdoms, that they have been constrained to abandon their Country, Houses, Wives, and Children, or to give themselves up prisoners, and perhaps victims to be sacrificed at the pleasure of foreigners, and a few hot-headed men of a restless faction, whom they employ. Our troops abroad, notwithstanding their long and remarkable good services, have been treated since the peace with neglect and contempt; as particularly in Holland: And it is not now the Officers long service, merit, and blood they have lost, but money and favour, by which they can obtain justice in their preferments.

So that it is evident, that the safety of his Majesty's person and loyal subjects, the rights of his people, and independency of his Kingdoms call loudly for immediate relief and defence.

The consideration of these unhappy circumstances, with the due regard we have to common justice, the peace and quiet of us and our posterity, our duty to his Majesty, and his commands, are the powerful motives, which have engaged us in our present undertaking, which we are firmly and heartily resolved to push to the utmost, and stand by one another to the last extremity, as the only solid and effectual means of putting an end to so dreadful a prospect, as by our present situation we have before our eyes, and with faithful hearts, true to our only rightful King, our Country, and our Neighbours. We earnestly beseech and expect (as his Majesty commands) the assistance of all our true fellow-subjects to second these our just attempts, declaring hereby our sincere intentions:

That we will promote and concur in all lawful means for settling a lasting peace to these lands under the auspicious Government of our native-born rightful Sovereign, the direction of our own domestic counsels, and the protection of our own native force and troops.

That we will in the same manner concur and endeavour to have our laws, liberties, and properties secured by free Parliaments of both Kingdoms.

That, by the wisdom of such Parliaments, we will endeavour to have such laws enacted, as shall give an absolute security to us, and future ages, for the true Protestant Religion, against all efforts of Arbitrary Power, Popery, and all its other enemies. Nor have we any reason to be distrustful of the goodness of God, the solidity of our Holy Religion, or the known excellency of his Majesty's judgment, as not to hope, that in due time, good example, and conversation with our learned Divines, will remove these prejudices, which we know that his education in a Popish Country has not riveted in his Royal discerning mind: And we are sure, that, as justice is a virtue of all religious professions, the doing of it to him will not lessen his good opinion of ours.

That, as the King is willing to give his Royal Indemnity for all that is past, so we will cheerfully concur in passing general acts of Oblivion, that our fellow-subjects, who have been misled, may have a fair opportunity of living with us in the same friendly manner we design to live with them.

That we will use our endeavours for redressing the bad usage of our troops abroad, and bringing the troops at home to be on the same foot and establishment of pay, as those in England.

The peace of these Nations being thus settled, and we thus freed from foreign dangers, we will use our endeavours to have the army reduced to the usual number of guards and garrisons, and will concur in such laws and methods, as shall relieve us of the heavy taxes and debts now lying upon us, and, at the same time, will support the public credit in all its parts.

And we hereby faithfully promise and engage, that every Officer, who joins with us in our King and Country's cause, shall not only enjoy the same post he now does, but shall be advanced and preferred according to his rank and station, and the number of men he brings off with him to us: And each foot soldier to 1715. to deliver the following speech to both Houses (1):

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's Speech. I AM persuaded you are all by this time very desirous of some recess, and that it cannot be deferred longer, without great inconvenience to your private affairs.

But, before I can part with you, I must return you my most sincere thanks, for your having finished, with so much wisdom and unanimity, what I recommended to your care; and particularly I thank you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, for the provision you have made, as well for the support of the honour and dignity of the Crown, as for the other necessary occasions of the Public; especially for your having done it by means so little burdensome to my people; which, I assure you, recommends the Supplies to me above any other circumstance whatsoever.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The open and declared Rebellion, which is now actually begun in Scotland, must convince all, who do not wish to see us given up into the hands of a Popish Pretender, of the dangers to which we have been and are still exposed.

I thought it incumbent on me to give you the earliest notice of the designs of our enemies; and I cannot sufficiently commend the zeal and dispatch, with which you impowered me, at a time when the Nation was in so naked and defenceless a condition, to make such preparations, as I should think necessary for our security. You shall have no reason to repent of the trust and confidence you repose in me, which I shall never use to any other end, than for the protection and welfare of my people.

It was scarce to be imagined, that any of my Protestant subjects, who have known and enjoyed the benefits of our excellent Constitution, and have heard of the great dangers they were wonderfully delivered from by the happy Revolution, should by any arts and management be drawn into measures, that must at once destroy their Religion and Liberties, and subject them to Popery and arbitrary Power. But such has been our misfortune, that too many of my people have been deluded, and made instrumental to the Pretender's designs, who had never dared to think of Invading us, or raising a Rebellion, had he not been encouraged by the success of his emissaries and adherents have already had in stirring up riots and tumults, and by the further hopes they entertain of raising Insurrections in many parts of my Kingdoms.

The endeavouring to persuade my people, that the Church of England is in danger under my Government, has been the main artifice employed in carrying on this wicked and traitorous design. This insinuation, after the solemn assurances I have given, and my having laid hold on all opportunities to do every thing, that may tend to the advantage of the Church of England, is both unjust and ungrateful. Nor can I believe so groundless and malicious a calumny can make any impression upon the minds of my faithful subjects, or that they can be so far misled, as to think the Church of England is to be secured, by setting a Popish Pretender on the Throne.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The proofs this Parliament has given of their unshaken duty and affection to Me, and of their love and zeal for the interest of their Country, will recommend you to the good opinion and esteem of all, who have their Religion and Liberty truly at heart, and has laid a lasting obligation upon me; and I question not, but by your further assistance in the several Countries, to which you are going, with the blessing of Almighty God, who has joining us, shall have twenty shillings sterling gratuity, besides his pay; and each trooper or dragoon, who brings his horse and accoutrements along with him, the sum of twelve pounds sterling.

And, in general, we will concur with all our fellow-subjects in such measures, as shall make us flourish at home, and be formidable abroad, under our rightful Sovereign, and the peaceable harmony of our antient fundamental Constitution, undisturbed by Pretenders interests, counsels from abroad, or by restless factions at home.

In so honourable, good, and just a cause, we doubt not of the assistance, direction, and blessing of Almighty God, who has so often rescued the royal Family of Stuart and our Country from sinking under oppression.

(1) When the Speaker presented the three bills for settling a revenue on the Princes of Wales, for enlarging the capital stock of the South-Sea Company, and for making provision for the Ministers of the fifty new Churches, he made a speech with great spirit and eloquence, wherein, among others, were the following passages.

Your Commons could not see, without the utmost indignation, the glories of her late Majesty's Reign tarnished by a treacherous cessation of arms; the faith of treaties violated; that antient probity, for which the English Nation had been justly renowned throughout all ages, exposed to scorn and contempt, and the trade of the Kingdom given up by insidious and precarious treaties of Commerce, whilst the people, amused with new worlds explored, were contented to see the most advantageous branches of their Commerce in Europe lost or betrayed.

Such was the condition of this Kingdom, when it pleased the Divine Providence to call your Majesty to the Throne of your Ancestors, under whose auspicious Reign, your Commons, with pleasure, behold the glory of the Plantagenets, your Majesty's Royal Ancestors, revive, and have an unbounded prospect of the continuance of this happiness even to the latest Posterity, in a race of Princes lineally descended from your Majesty.

And that nothing may be wanting on the part of your Commons, to establish your Majesty's Throne on solid and lasting foundations, they have applied themselves with unwearied diligence to vindicate the honour of the British Nation, and to restore a mutual confidence between this Kingdom and its antient and faithful Allies, by detecting the Authors of those pernicious counsels, and the actors in those treacherous designs, in order to bring them to justice, by the judgment of their Peers, according to the law of the land, and the usage of Parliament, &c.

so frequently interposed in favour of this Nation, I shall be able to disappoint and defeat the design of our enemies.

Our meeting again to do business, early in the next winter, will be useful on many accounts, particularly, that the sitting of Parliaments may be again brought into that season of the year, which is most convenient; and that as little delay may be given as is possible to your judicial proceedings; and I shall at present give such orders to my Lord Chancellor, as may not put it long out of my power to meet you on any sudden occasion.

When the King's speech was ended, the Parliament adjourned to the 6th of October, and afterwards, by several adjournments, to the 9th of January.

Pursuant to the King's speech, orders from the Privy-Council, with a letter from the Secretary of State, were sent to all the Lords-Lieutenants of the Counties in England, to cause the Militia to be put in such a posture, as to be ready to march when required; and also to give the necessary directions to the proper Officers, to seize the persons and arms of all Papists, Nonjurors, and others, whom they should have reason to suspect.

A design to seize Bristol previously.

The designed Insurrection in the western Counties was so deeply concerted, and the Conspirators so potent and numerous, that the Jacobites at Bath, depending on their majority, openly talked, that the affair of Scotland was only a diversion to draw the King's troops that way; but that the effectual attempt would be made in the West very speedily. But the Government having received information of the secret proceedings of the Disaffected, took such measures, as defeated all their designs. And first, to prevent the intended surprisal of Bristol, in order to make it a place of arms, the Earl of Berkeley, Lord-Lieutenant of the County, and Governor of that City, repaired thither with all speed, and took all necessary precautions to secure that important place. Several Persons were apprehended, and, amongst the rest, Mr Hart, a Merchant, who was charged with having collected great quantities of warlike stores for the use of the Conspirators. Besides part of Lumley's regiment of horse, and the two battalions of Stanwix and Pocock, who were already in Bristol, Colonel Chudleigh's regiment of foot marched thither, about the beginning of October. At the same time, the Lord Windsor's regiment of horse, and Rich's dragoons, under the command of Major-General Wade, marched to Bath, which place was both the rendezvous, and one of the arsenals of the Conspirators. Upon strict search, the King's Officers found and seized there eleven chests of fire-arms, a hoghead full of basket-hilt swords, and another of cartouches, and three pieces of cannon, one mortar, and moulds to cast cannon, which had been buried under ground. There were about two hundred horses seized; and the following persons were apprehended, Captain Lansdon, Captain Doyle, Captain Sinclair, Sir George Brown, Mr Mackarity, Mr Dun, Mr Macdonnel, and William Hibbert. They were all brought to London by a party of Brigadier Bowles's regiment, on the 18th of October.

The University of Oxford is expelled.

The behaviour of the University of Oxford gave likewise reason to suspect them. They had lately chose the Earl of Arran their Chancellor, in the room of his brother the Duke of Ormond, by a great majority over the Earl of Pembroke, who was put up in competition with him. On the 26th of September, the Earl of Arran was sworn and installed into that Office with the usual solemnity; and the Vice-Chancellor made a long speech, wherein he enumerated and extolled the eminent virtues of the family of Butler, and took notice of the great obligations they had at different times laid on that seminary of learning; suggesting withal, that, the Duke of Ormond having, before his withdrawing beyond sea, thought fit to resign the place of Chancellor of that University, they could not better express their gratitude, both to his Grace and his noble Ancestors, than by choosing his brother, the Earl of Arran, in his Grace's room. The University concluded this demonstration of their disaffection, by conferring the degrees of Doctor of Laws on Sir John Everard, a Nonjuror, and on Sir William Gifford, late Governor of Greenwich Hospital. Not many days after, a letter from a young Gentleman at Oxford to his Friend in London falling into other hands, by reason of a similitude of names, the following particulars were found in it: 'I think myself very happy in being settled in this so loyal a place, and only want your good company to complement it; for here we fear nothing, but drink James's health every day. The Prince thought to have been made Chancellor, and by that to have been a Bishop, but, thank God, he was disappointed.'

The Government being informed of all that passed at Oxford, and in particular, that Colonel Owen, with some other broken Officers, Irish Papists, and several notorious Jacobites, having taken sanctuary in that place, fomented the spirit of Rebellion, drinking publicly and uncontrolled the Pretender's health; and it being justly suspected, that they designed an Insurrection, in order to act in conjunction with the disaffected at Bristol and Bath, with whom they held intelligence, it was resolved to secure their persons. Major-General Pepper, being charged with this Commission, sent one of his Officers, disguised in a countryman's habit, to Oxford, to get intelligence, and view the avenues and principal posts in the town; and then began to move himself, with his own regiment of dragoons, and a detachment of Tyrrel's, bending his march towards Bath and Bristol. But, on the 5th of October, being come within seven or eight miles of Oxford, instead of resting, he marched all night, and entered the City very early in the morning. Having caused his men to alight, and fix their bayonets in the muzzles of their fuzees, he immediately secured all the avenues and the gates of every inn and public house; and then sent one of his Officers to the Vice-Chancellor and the Mayor of the town, to desire to speak with them. They having readily obeyed the summons, General Pepper delivered to them a letter from Mr Secretary Stanhope, and, in a few words, acquainted them with his orders to seize sixteen or eighteen suspected persons; adding, 'That their concurring assistance would be very acceptable to the Government; otherwise, that he must be obliged to proceed to such methods, as should best execute his orders.' The Vice-Chancellor and the Mayor, surprized at this unexpected sight of soldiers, readily

1715. readily promised the General all the assistance in their power, and offered to provide him quarters for his men; which was not accepted, because their stay was to be very short. The Vice-Chancellor in particular, who some days before had boldly delivered a long oration in praise of a Nobleman attainted by act of Parliament, now trembling, and in the utmost confusion, made large professions of loyalty and affection to his Majesty. General Pepper told him, the only proof of those professions, which he desired at present, was, that he should keep the Fellows and Scholars quiet in their Colleges; declaring to him, at the same time, that if any disturbance happened, or if any persons assembled in the streets, above the number allowed by the act of Parliament against riots, he would cause his men to fire upon them. The Vice-Chancellor promised all, and even more than was desired; so the Officers appointed by General Pepper began to search for the men, whom they had orders to apprehend. But the chief of them, Colonel Owen, who lay that night at the Grey-bound Inn having timely notice from the officer of the arrival of the King's troops, leaped over a wall in his night-gown, and got into Magdalen College, where General Pepper did not think proper to search for him, rightly judging, it would be in vain. Of the other suspected persons, ten or eleven were taken; the principal of whom were Mr Gordon, Mr Ker, Mr Dorrel, Mr Wilson, Captain Halfhead, Mr Spelman of Norfolk, Lloyd, the famous Jacobite Coffee-man at Charing-Cross, (who had formerly followed the same employment at Dublin) and one, who pretended to be a Postman, in the lining of whose coat were found letters, which he was bringing from the Conspirators at Bath to their Correspondents at Oxford. They also seized two horses, with fine furniture, belonging to Colonel Owen, which were said to have formerly been the Duke of Ormond's; as likewise the horses and warlike accoutrements of several others. As soon as the Officers had made what search they thought proper, and refreshed their men, General Pepper caused them to mount, and marched out of town with his prisoners towards Abingdon. It might have been expected, that the University and City of Oxford would have taken warning from this short military visit; but upon information, that the Disaffected there persisted in their disrespectful behaviour towards the King's Person and Government, and even that a traitorous design was carrying on to seize that City for the Pretender, for which purpose a regiment was to be formed of the young Students, under proper Officers, who secretly resorted to Oxford; the Court thought fit to order Handasyde's regiment of foot to be quartered there. Accordingly, they marched thither on the 28th of October; and their arrival was the more seasonable, as, the very night before, the rabble had the insolence to proclaim the Pretender, and to commit several outrages against the Well-affected.

A design on Plymouth prevented.

The design upon Bristol having miscarried, a project was laid to seize on Plymouth. But this was also prevented by timely securing several suspected persons, particularly Sir Richard Vivian, who was brought to London the 8th of October in custody of a Messenger.

The Pretender proclaimed in Cornwall.

The common people in Cornwall were at this time so ripe for Rebellion, that six or seven of them ventured to proclaim the Pre-tender at St Colombes, two of whom were seized, and a reward of 100*l.* each was offered by the Government for apprehending the rest. However, by the great care and vigilance of Mr Boscatwen, Comptroller of the Household, all things were kept quiet in those parts.

The Disaffected in the North of England were more successful than their brethren in the West. There had been measures concerted at London by the Pretender's friends some time before the Insurrection in Northumberland broke out; which received great assistance from Captain John Shastoe, an half-pay Officer, afterwards executed at Preston, and Captain John Hunter, of North Tyne in Northumberland, who had a Commission from Queen Anne to raise an Independent Company, but did not. Besides these, there was one Captain Robert Talbot, an Irishman, and a Papist, formerly in the French service, who, being acquainted with the design in August, 1715, took shipping at London, and went to Newcastle. By Talbot the resolutions, taken at London, were first communicated to their friends in the North of England, and means used to persuade and prepare those, who had been engaged by them, to be ready to rise upon warning given.

A correspondence and intelligence were now settled with all the Conspirators in the several parts of Britain. But, as this was a correspondence of too much importance to be carried on by the ordinary conveyance of letters, there were several Gentlemen from sundry parts in the Kingdom riding from place to place as travellers, under pretence of seeing the Country, and thereby carrying intelligence, discoursing with persons, and settling and appointing their business. The principal men intrusted with these Negotiations were Colonel Oxburgh, Mr Nicholas Wogan, Mr Charles Wogan, and Mr James Talbot, all Irish Papists. A second class of Agents consisted of Mr Clifton, brother of Sir Gervase Clifton, and Mr Beaumont, both Gentlemen of Nottinghamshire, and Mr Buxton, a Clergyman of Derbyshire. All these rid like Gentlemen, with servants and attendants, and were armed with swords and pistols. They kept always moving, and travelled from place to place, till things ripened for action. The first step towards their appearing in arms was, when, about the latter end of September, the Earl of Derwentwater had notice, that there was a warrant out from the Secretary of State to apprehend him, and that the Messengers were come to Durham, who were to take him. The Earl went to the house of one Mr B—— in his neighbourhood, a Justice of the Peace, who, if he had been well-affected to the Government, or had regarded that Lord's real interest, might have honourably enough taken him, or at least persuaded him to surrender; which, it is presumed, would not have been a difficult matter. Hence the Earl is supposed to have gone to the house of one Richard Lambert, which was thought more private, and less suspected. Mr Thomas Forster Junior, Knight of the Shire for Northumberland, against whom a warrant was likewise issued out, having notice of it, went from place to place, till at last he came to the house of Mr Fenwick of Bywell. The Messenger in pursuit of him was come within half a mile

Insurrection in Northumberland. Patten.

1715. mile of that place; but, staying to call for a Constable to his aid, Mr Forster found time to escape. Upon this there was a full meeting of the parties concerned in Northumberland; where considering all the circumstances of their friends, and of the interest they were embarked in, they judged that, as there was no longer any safety in shifting from place to place, in a few days they should all be secured and confined in prisons, or conveyed to London; that, as they should be separately confined, so they should be separately examined, and none could say what the other should answer; so that, for fear of betraying one another, they should be really brought to do it; that now was the time to shew their loyalty to their King, since, if this opportunity were lost, they had no room to hope for another; and therefore they boldly resolved immediately to appear in arms. Pursuant to this resolution an appointment was made, and notice of it sent to all their friends, to meet the next morning, at a place called Green-rig. Accordingly Mr Forster, with several Gentlemen, in number at first about twenty, met at the rendezvous, but made no stay, thinking the place inconvenient, but rode immediately to the top of a Hill called the Waterfalls; from whence they might discover any, that came either to join, or oppose, them. They quickly discovered the Earl of Derwentwater, who came that morning from his seat at Dilston, with some friends, and all his servants, mounted upon his coach horses, and all very well armed. In coming from Dilston-Hall, they all drew their swords as they marched along Corbridge. They halted at the seat of Mr Errington, where several other Gentlemen according to appointment came to the Lord Derwentwater. When they had joined Mr Forster and his company, they were in all about sixty horse, most Gentlemen and their attendants. They called a short council, and it was concluded to march towards the river Cockburn, to a place called Plainfield. Here they were joined by others, and, having made some stay, they resolved to go that night to Rothbury, a small market-town. They staid there all night; and next morning, being the 7th of October, their number still increasing, they marched to Warkworth, another market-town upon the sea coast, of a strong situation. Here they continued till Monday, during which time nothing material happened, except that on Sunday morning Mr Forster, who now stiled himself General, sent Mr Buxton their Chaplain to Mr Jon, the Minister of the Parish, with orders for him, 'to pray for the Pretender as King, and in the Litany, for Mary Queen-Mother, and all the dutiful branches of the Royal Family;' which Mr Jon declining, Mr Buxton took possession of the Church, read prayers, and preached. In the mean while Mr Jon went to Newcastle to consult his own safety, and acquaint the Government with what had happened. The next thing they did, was openly to proclaim the Pretender as King of Great-Britain, &c. It was done by Mr Forster in disguise, and by sound of trumpet, and all the formality, that the circumstances and place would admit. On Monday the 10th of October they marched to Morpeth, having been joined at Felton-Bridge by seventy Scots horse, or rather Gentlemen from the borders. They had been considerably increased before, in their march from Warkworth, at Alnwick, and other places, so that, at their entering Morpeth, they were three hundred strong, all horse, for they would entertain no foot; otherwise their number would have been very large: But, as they neither had nor could provide arms for those they had mounted, they gave the common people good words, and told them, they should soon be furnished with arms and ammunition, and then they would lift regiments to form an army. This was upon the expectation of surprizing Newcastle, in which case they did not question to have as many foot as they pleased. Here Mr Forster received an account, that Mr Lancelot Errington and some others had surprized the Castle in Holy Island, which is a small fort guarded by a few soldiers sent weekly from the garrison at Berwick. Errington undidcovered took boat and went to sea, and with his companions landed under the cover of the wall, and got into the fort by surprize; though he kept the possession but a very short time, for the Governor of Berwick, having an immediate account of the action, and resolving, if possible, to recover the place before Errington could be supplied with men and provisions, detached a party of thirty men of his garrison, with about fifty volunteers of the inhabitants, who, marching over the sands at low-water-mark, attacked the fort, and took it sword in hand: Errington himself attempting to make his escape, was wounded and taken prisoner, with several others; but he with his brother afterwards escaped out of Berwick in disguise. The design of taking this fort was to give signals to any ships, that seemed to make to the coast to land soldiers; for, by the assurances they had from their friends beyond sea, they expected them to land on that coast with supplies of arms and officers; but they came not till they were gone for Scotland; and then two ships appeared off at sea, and made their signal, but, having no answer from the shore, they sailed northward.

The Rebellion was now formed, and they were all in a body at Morpeth, promising themselves great things at Newcastle. Several Gentlemen joined them, and some of the country people offered to lift; but they still refused them, and prepared to march to Newcastle. Before they went on, Mr Buxton the Clergyman, taking on himself the office of a Herald, proclaimed the Pretender. Having sent a party to seize Felton-Bridge, they marched towards Newcastle, and to their great disappointment found the gates shut against them. Upon this, they turned to the westward, and marched to Hexham, where they were joined by some more Scots horse. From Hexham they all went three miles distant, to a heath or moor adjoining to Dilston, the Earl of Derwentwater's seat, and there made an halt, with design, as it was thought, to go and surprize Newcastle; but they soon returned to their former quarters, having certain intelligence from their friends in Newcastle, that, even before any regular forces entered the town, the Magistrates and Deputy-Lieutenants, having had first some suspicion, and soon after positive intelligence of the design of the Rebels, had effectually prevented a surprize, and taken all imaginable precaution for their security, raising immediately what men they could, seizing all Papists and suspected persons, arming the inhabitants for their own defence; and taking into the town the militia, who, about 1715. that time, were ordered to muster at Killingworth. The Earl of Scarborough, Lord-Lieutenant of Northumberland, repaired likewise with his friends to Newcastle; and the Gentry of those parts, after his example, mounted their neighbours and tenants; so that the town was full of horses and men, both townsmen and countrymen unanimously declaring for King George. However, the chiefs of the Rebels having great interest in that place, the inhabitants were not altogether without fear; nor were the High-party in the town without the folly of discovering their affection for the Rebels at Hexham, and even using some threatening expressions. This was, perhaps, partly the occasion of laying aside the former divisions and prejudices between the well-affected inhabitants as Churchmen and Dissenters. The latter cheerfully offering, and the former freely accepting the offer, an Association was entered into by both, for the mutual defence of their lives and estates; and a body of seven hundred Volunteers were armed by the town for their immediate guard without distinction. The Keelmen, being mostly Dissenters, offered a body of seven hundred more, to be always ready at half an hour's warning; which was also accepted. In the midst of this hurry, a battalion of foot, and part of a regiment of dragoons, having been ordered out of Yorkshire for the security of the town, came to Newcastle; and then all the fears of the inhabitants vanished. A few days after, Lieutenant-General Carpenter having been sent by the Government in pursuit of the Rebels with Hotham's regiment of foot, and Cobham's, Molesworth's, and Churchill's dragoons, arrived also at Newcastle the 18th of October, and began to prepare for attacking the Rebels at Hexham. In the mean time the Rebels, who staid but three days at Hexham, seized all the arms and horses they could meet with, and, the night before they left the town, they all drew up round the Cross in the Market-place, and proclaimed the Pretender. They had received advice, that the Lord Viscount Kenmore, the Earls of Nithisdale, Carnwarth, and Wintoun, who had taken arms in Nithisdale, Dumfriesshire, and other places in the West of Scotland, were entered England to join them, and were come to Rothbury. The Lord Kenmore, the only nobleman in that part of Scotland capable of commanding, was solicited by the Earl of Mar to take up arms for the Pretender, and to command such forces, as would join him on that side the Forth. He at first refused this offer, but, being importuned by the Jacobites in that Country, was at last prevailed with to set up the Pretender's Standard at Moffat in Annamdale on the 12th of October. The next day the body, who joined him, marched towards Dumfries, with design to surprize that town; but the Marquis of Annan- dale, whom they had followed the day before, having none but his servants with him, entered the town, and concerted such measures, as disappointed their design. This obliged the Rebels to alter their route, and after great disputes they agreed at last to march to Loughmaben, where they set up their Standard, and proclaimed the Pretender. On the 14th they marched to Achelfeichen, and on their march, being in all near two hundred horse, they were formed into a regiment, divided into two squadrons, the chief command remaining with the Lord Kenmore, and each squadron under the Earls of Wintoun and Carnwarth. Hence they marched regularly, and sent their Quarter-master-general Mr Calderwood to take up quarters for them. Next day they came to Langholm, and so on to Hawick, their numbers increasing in the way. At this place they were alarmed, which raised some disputes, whether they should proceed. They agreed at last to return; but receiving an express from Mr Forster about two miles from Hawick towards Langholm, inviting the Lord Kenmore and his followers to meet him at Rothbury, they faced about, and marched that night to Fedburgh. Here they received intelligence of Mackintosh's crossing the Forth, and the Duke of Argyle's resolution to attack them. In their march to Fedburgh, they were extremely alarmed; for, being late, their advance guard was surprized by the shouts of one, who called out, that the Grey horse were ready to fall upon them, and had cut the Quarter-master, and those with him, to pieces. They, who were acquainted with the Quarter-master, assuring the Lord Kenmore, he would by no means be so easily ensnared, they continued their march, and entered the town without opposition. Here, as in most other towns, they proclaimed the Pretender; and the next day proceeded to Rothbury; and from thence dispatched Mr Burnet of Carlisle to Hexham to Mr Forster, to know, whether he would come towards them, or they should advance? Forster returned an express, that he would join them. Upon this, and the news that General Carpenter was preparing to attack them, the Northumberland Rebels marched out of Hexham on the 19th of October; and making a long march joined the Scots that night, and all of them next day marched to Wooler. Being informed there by Mr Errington, that the Higblanders, who had crossed the Forth under Mackintosh, were coming to join them, they marched to Kello in Scotland.

During these proceedings of the English Re-^{The brave} bels, the principal persons, who were either in^{of the Dis-} affected the Dis-Rebellion with the Earl of Mar, or justly sus-^{summoned} pected of being disaffected to the Government, ^{to Edin-} were, pursuant to the late act, ordered, as has^{burgh.} been said, to appear at Edinburgh, and surrender themselves (1). Of all that were summoned,

(1) The persons summoned were:

The Marquis of Hutley, eldest son to the Duke of Gordon; the Earls of Seaforth, Wintoun, Carnwarth, Southes, Nithisdale, Linlithgow, Mar, Kinnaul, Pannure, Marischal, Broadalbin; the Viscounts of Kenmore, Stormont, Kilgib, Kingston, Strathallen; the Lords Ogilvie, Rello, Drummond, Nairn, Glenorchy; Sir James Campbell of Auchenbrech, Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochnel, Sir Donald Macdonald, Sir Patrick Murray of Auchtertyre, Sir Hugh Paterfson of Bonnekburn,
No. 86. Vol. IV.

Sir Alexander Erskine, Lord Lyon, Sir John Maclean; Lieutenant-General George Hamilton; the Master of Stormont, the Master of Nairn, Mr Alexander Mackenzie of Praserdale, James Stirling of Keir, Robert Stuart of Apin, John Campbell of Atravalder, William Murray, Junr. of Auchtertyre, Alexander Robinson of Strawan; the Lairds of Mackinnan, Clanronald, Glenghary, Keppoch, William Drummond, servant to the Lord Drummond, Mr Seaton of Touch, Lieutenant Allen Cameron, Rob Roy, alias Mac-Greger, Mr Stuart

The Duke of Argyle arrived at Edinburgh the 14th of September. He went, the next day, and viewed the Castle, and appointed Brigadier Grant to command it, till the arrival of Brigadier Preston the Deputy-Governor.

Progress of the Earl of Mar.

The Earl of Mar and his party, after having proclaimed the Pretender at Kirk-Michael, on the 9th of September, continued there four or five days, and then proceeded to Moulin, another small market-town in Perthshire, where they likewise proclaimed the Pretender, and rested fourteen days, considerably increasing their numbers. From hence they marched to Logaret, another market-town, where they were reckoned to be a thousand men well armed. From Logaret they marched to Dunkeld, which they made their head-quarters; and here their numbers greatly increased again, for they were joined by two thousand men from the Highlands, by the Marquis of Tullibardine, by the Earl of Broadalbin's men, and several others. Finding themselves thus strengthened, they resolved to extend their quarters; and the Earl of Mar having intelligence, that the Earl of Rothes and the Gentlemen of Fife (who were up in arms for the King) were advancing to possess themselves of Perth, which commands the passage over the Tay, resolved to prevent them; and detached Mr John Hay, brother to the Earl of Kinnoul, with a strong party, with orders to possess himself of that place, which he performed effectually. As this was a great disappointment to the King's troops, so it was a very great advantage to the Earl of Mar, as it gave him the command of all Fife, the most fruitful, rich, and, for the convenience of the sea-coast, the most commodious to him of any Shire in that part of Scotland; and as it gave a considerable reputation both to his conduct and to his party, who, upon this success, made preparations in all parts to join him. And now they began to have the face of a formidable army, making this City their chief garrison and head-quarters. A great many Lords, Chiefs of Clans, and other Gentlemen from all quarters flocked to them, with their Followers, and some of them in very good order, and well armed, particularly the Marquis of Huntley, the Earl of Seaforth, the Mackintoshes, the Earl Marjsebal, and with them so many, that their number was said to be about twelve thousand men, very well appointed, both horse and foot.

From thence extending their quarters, they performed an exploit at Brunt-Island, which still added to their reputation. They not only surprized the town, being strong by situation, and a sea-port on the Firth of Forth, in view of the City of Edinburgh; but, manning out some boats in the harbour, they seized a ship laden with arms, ammunition, and other warlike stores, which lay in the Firth, bound to the North, for the use of the Earl of Sutherland. 1715.

After this, they made themselves masters of all the towns upon the coast, even to the mouth of the Firth, the Earl of Rothes, and the Gentlemen with him, being obliged to separate, or retire to Stirling, to the King's army.

The Rebellion being come to this height, the Earl of Mar resolved, in concert with his confederates (who began by this time to appear likewise in other places) to make an attempt upon the South parts of Scotland, by a method, which at that time was thought almost impracticable. He sent a strong detachment to cross the Firth of Forth, and land on the Lothian side, in order to be joined by their friends, whom they expected to rise about Haddington, and on the borders of England. On their march to the Sea-coast they were covered by some horse under the command of Sir John Arskine of Alva, the master of Sinclair, and Sir James Sharp, grandson to Archbishop Sharp, who was murdered in his coach by the old Cameronians. This body was commanded by the Laird of Barlum, better known by the name of Brigadier Mackintosh, and consisted of two thousand five hundred men well armed. Orders had been given for all the boats on that side to be ready to carry them over. The King's ships in the Firth either seeing them, or having notice of the design, prepared to intercept them, if they should attempt the passage; but the Rebels made several counter-marches to amuse them till night came on; when, drawing down to the shore, several embarked that night, and others the next, making directly over to the South shore, the men of war not being able to prevent them. However one boat was taken with fifty men. Others were forced back to Fife again; among whom Lord Strathmore, and his Lieutenant-Colonel Walkinshaw of Barrowfield, and many were driven into the Isle of May. Of the two thousand five hundred designed for this descent upon the Lothians, only one thousand five hundred of them landed; for the men of war being come down made it impracticable for the rest to pass; so they were obliged to stay till the next night, and then to return to Criel on the shore of Fife. The others landed at North-Berwick, Aberlady, and other places on that coast, and quartered at Haddington, and Tranent the first night. This was certainly a bold attempt, for men in open boats to cross an arm of the sea sixteen or seventeen miles broad, in sight, and in defiance of three men of war, among whom they fell, but received no damage from them, but rather an advantage; for the lights of the ships shewed them how to row to the shore. On the other hand, the Government omitted; nothing, that might prevent this attempt; no care was wanting to disappoint them of vessels for the undertaking: The Magistrates of Edinburgh, and of the other towns on the Edith, having had notice from the Duke of Argyle of this

art of Ard, Mr Francis Stuart, brother to the Earl of Murray, John Cameron of Lochell, Mr John Fullerton of Greenhall, Mackintosh, Junr. of Borlaim, James Alcolom, Mr Henry Maul, brother to the Earl of Panmure, John Walkinshaw of Barrowfield, Colin Campbell of Glenderule, — Graham of Bucklroy, George Hume of Whitfield, Mr John Drummond, brother to the Lord Drummond, Lyon of Auchterhouse, Colonel Balfour, the Master of Balfour, and Esthume of Balfour.

(1) This

1715. this design, had caused all the boats, that could be got, to be brought to Leith; and besides the three ships of war, that lay in the road, ordered three Custom-House smacks, either to burn or bring over from Fife all the boats and vessels they could find, to prevent the Rebels coming over. But all these precautions proved ineffectual: The Rebels, being masters of all the sea-shore from Cromarty to the Forth of Edinburgh, easily found means to get boats for their purpose; nor did they fail of all necessary policy in the management of the design; for, whilst some of them amused the King's ships about Brunt-Island, as if they would pass above Leith-Road, their main body embarked on the other side, under the conduct of Brigadier Mackintosh, quite out of sight of the ships; and by that means came safe ashore.

While this design was executing, the Earl of Mar made a feigned march from Perth towards Dumblain, as if he intended to cross the Forth at Stirling-Bridge, in order to divert the Duke of Argyle from falling upon those, who had crossed the Firth. Nor did this prove ineffectual; for it obliged the Duke of Argyle to return to Stirling with the utmost expedition.

The Highlanders, who had thus crossed the Firth, having refreshed themselves but one night at Haddington, marched directly towards Edinburgh, where they caused more terror than there was real danger; for, unless their number had been greater, it was impossible for them to force that City. It was indeed supposed, they expected to be joined by the rabble, and some tumult would be raised in their favour. In the mean time the Duke of Argyle received letters from all hands, that, if he did not send a detachment of troops to Edinburgh, the town would certainly fall into the enemies hands. And therefore, though it had always been entirely against his opinion to divide the small number of troops he had with him, he was obliged to comply, and went himself with a detachment of three hundred dragoons, and two hundred foot, mounted on Country horses for expedition, and arrived at Edinburgh in the night. The Rebels who were then within four miles of the City, hearing of the arrival of this detachment, altered their resolution of going directly to Edinburgh (which they would have infallibly taken) and marched into the Citadel of Leith (1). The next morning the Duke of Argyle invested the town with the cavalry, and marched his two hundred foot with three hundred and fifty volunteers from Edinburgh, and the like number of Lord Polwarth's militia, down to the sea-shore, where, at a large breach in the old rampart, he judged it easy to enter; but, taking a near view of the place, he found, that, to come at the breach, the men must march at least five hundred paces under a flank-fire; that the Rebels had made a barricade along the breach; and that a garden-wall on the inside flanked it. These things made the Duke unwilling to expose his few regular troops, though they shewed a great eagerness to assault. The Rebels, in the Citadel were about one thousand two hundred; and the rest, that passed the river, being in East Lothian, the Duke thought fit to delay any attempt, and consider of some proper method to dislodge them. But in the middle of the night they abandoned the place, and retired into Seaton-House, a large, old, and strong Castle, seven miles from Edinburgh, leaving behind them some baggage and ammunition. Thirty-six of their men, and two officers, were taken by a detachment under Colonel Debourgay.

Whilst the Rebels were in Seaton-House, several of the King's forces, joined by the well-affected Gentlemen of the Country, came from Edinburgh, and appeared near Preston-Pans; which gave an alarm to the Highlanders; upon which a party marched out, and formed themselves in order to receive those, who appeared against them. But those from Edinburgh, having made a halt, retired; and the Rebels returned into their garrison at Seaton-House. The next day, the Earl of Roths, with three hundred Gentlemen volunteers, and the Lord Torpiessen with two hundred dragoons, left by the Duke of Argyle, marched to Seaton-House; but found the Rebels so strongly posted, that it was impossible to dislodge them without artillery. This animated the Rebels; and, a good body of them advancing, some shot were exchanged, but at too great a distance to do any harm on either side; and the King's troops, seeing nothing could be done, retired.

The Duke of Argyle having received intelligence from Stirling, that the Earl of Mar, and the Rebels under his command, were marching from Perth, he returned to Stirling to observe their motions, leaving a party to protect the people of Edinburgh from the insults of the rabble. This was a feigned march of the Earl of Mar, to draw the Duke of Argyle from attempting any thing upon the Highlanders, who had crossed the Firth. He gave out, that he would pass the Forth with his whole army, either at Stirling, or at the bridge of Down. They began their march in the night of October the 17th, and advanced in three bodies; but upon notice, that the Duke of Argyle was returned from pursuing the enemy, he marched back to Perth. All this was an amusement, which indeed succeeded; for he broke the measures of the Duke, who had resolved to attack Seaton-House. But the Earl was determined not to coſt the Forth till he had drawn all the Clans together, and reduced the Earl of Sutherland, whom if he should leave in his rear, it might prove fatal to his designs, and expose all he had gained without opposition to be recovered by that Lord.

The Highlanders still continued at Seaton-House, and sent out parties to bring in provisions, of which they procured great plenty, as cows, sheep, meal, &c. They gave out, they resolved to fortify themselves, and make the house a magazine, while they raised an army, as well from the adjacent Country and from Edinburgh, and from other friends to their design in the West part of Scotland, who were preparing to join them, as from the borders of England, where by this time numbers were risen in Northumberland.

1715. While they laid here, they discovered a boat at sea, making towards the shore from the Fife-side of the Firth. The men of war fired very briskly at her; but, the boat keeping to the windward at a distance, she got safe to shore. This boat had been lent by the Rebels from Leith to the Earl of Mar, and now brought back news concerning the proceedings of their friends at Perth, and orders to march towards

OR. 18. England, to join the Northumbrians. Immediately after the receiving of these orders, two Gentlemen brought them an account of the Insurrection in Northumberland under the command of Mr Forsyth, and of the Southern Scots Gentlemen under the Lord Kennmare. Upon this they altered their resolution of continuing at Seaton-House; and having also received an express from Mr Forsyth, inviting them to meet him at Kelso on the borders, they resolved to

OR. 19. march the next day towards him. Accordingly they set out in the morning for Longformacbus, a small town seventeen miles from Seaton-House. During this day's march, several of the Highlanders deserted. As soon as Major-General Wightman received intelligence of their motion, he marched from Edinburgh with eighty dragoons, fifty of the militia, and some volunteers, to attack their rear; but returned in the evening without success, having only taken some of the deserters, whom he made prisoners, and left fifty foot in Seaton-House, where they had left a great deal of their spoil. Mackintosh and his men marched from Longformacbus, towards another small town in the Mers called Dunfermlie, where they drew up in order of battle, whilst the Pretender was proclaimed, retiring afterwards to their quarters in that town. The next morning they marched towards Kelso, where the English and Scots horse from Northumberland and Nithisdale entered the same evening. The next

OR. 22. day they proclaimed the Pretender, and continued there till the 27th of October (1). It will now, be proper to see what was doing in other parts of Scotland.

The Synods of Glasgow, Air, Perth, Stirling, Merse, and Trivetdale had very early published earnest admonitions to persons of all ranks, to animate them to the defence of King George and the Constitution.

On the 28th of September, Mr James Murray, second son of the Lord Viscount Stourmont arrived incognito at Edinburgh from France, by way of England, crossing the Firth at Newhaven above Leith, got undiscovered into Fife, and so to the Earl of Mar at Perth. He gave the Rebels large promises of assistance both from France and England, and came with the character of Secretary of State to the Pretender for Scotland.

About this time a strong party of the Macdonalds, Macleans, and Camerons, attempted to surprize the fortrels of Inverlochy, and succeeded so far, as to take three redoubts at some distance from it; in one of which there was an Officer with twenty men, and in another a Sergeant with five; but, the main garrison being on their guard, the Rebels were disappointed, and marched towards Argyleshire.

On the 20th of October, an account was brought from the North to Edinburgh, that the Earl of Sutherland, with the Lord Rea and Mr Monroe of Foulis, having drawn together about eighteen hundred men, advanced, on the 18th, to Alneth, in order to attack the Earl of Seaford, who had assembled the Clans of the Mackenzies, Macleds, and others; but that, upon a near view of the Rebels, they appeared to be much superior in number; and therefore it was judged proper for the Earl of Sutherland to retire, which he did in good order, and without any

(1) Mr Patten gives the following account of the fate of the Rebels, at their junction at Kelso.

The Lord Viscount Kennmare had the chief command whilst in Scotland. He was a grave, full-aged Gentleman, of a very ancient family, and of great experience in political business, but of little or none in military affairs. He was of a singular good temper, but too mild and calm for such a post. He had a troop of Gentlemen with him, which, as he was General, was called the first troop, the Command of which he gave to the honourable Basil Hamilton of Beldoun, son to the Lord Basil Hamilton, brother to the late Duke Hamilton, a very promising youth, and who behaved himself with a great deal of courage in the action at Presden, though but very young.

The second troop was called the Merse troop, commanded by the Honourable James Hume, Esq; brother to the Earl of Hume, who, at that time, was prisoner in Edinburgh Castle. This youth is of a good temper, but not very capable of having the command of a troop, as well on account of his age, as other incapacities. He was tried at the Marshalsea, and found guilty.

The third troop, called the Earl of Wintoun's troop, and commanded by himself. This Earl is of a very ancient family, wants no courage, and has more capacity than his friends find it for his interest to suggest, as appears by the counsel he gave. He opposed the scheme of the Northumbrian Gentlemen to march into England, and pressed them to leave Edinburgh and Stirling to their fate, and go and join the western Clans, attacking in their way the towns of Dumfries and Glasgow, and then to open a communication with the Earl of Mar. Had this advice been followed, it would, probably, have proved very advantageous. The command of his troop he assigned, under himself, to Captain James Dalziel, brother to the Earl of Carnwarth, who had been in King George's service formerly, and continued an half-pay Officer for some time; but, upon engaging in the Rebellion, he threw up his Commission; which piece of policy was the saving of his life, and prevented his being shot to death at Presden, by sentence of the Court-martial, among the half-pay Officers. He was a very bold and brave young Gentleman, and shewed it upon all occasions.

The fourth troop belonged to Robert Dalziel, Earl of Carnwarth: This Nobleman was brought up under the tuition of one, who made it his studied care to instil the principles of Hereditary-Right, Passive-Obedience, and Non-Resistance into his mind. He studied some time at Cambridge, and there sucked in an entire affection for the Liturgy and Worship in use in the Church of England, of which he was a sincere Devotee. He is singularly good in his temper, and of an agreeable affability, and delivers himself very handsomely in his discourse. The command of this troop he gave over to his uncle James Dalziel, Esq. This Gentleman had a very good character, and gave sufficient demonstrations of his affections to the Pretender's interest, by his courage and conduct.

The fifth troop was under the command of Captain Lockhart, brother to Mr Lockhart of Carnwarth: He was a half-pay Officer in the Lord Mark Kerr's regiment, and as such tried at Presden, by a Court-Martial; by which being found guilty of desertion, he, with three more, were shot to death there.

These troops were well manned, and indifferently armed; but many of their horses small: Besides these, there were many Volunteers, who were not formed into any regular troop.

1715. any loss, to his own Shire, where he was augmenting his forces, and preparing to come forward again, being assured of assistance from the Grants and Rosses of Culraick, and other parts, and from some of the Frasers.

These motions of the Earl of Sutherland kept the Earl of Seaforth from joining the Earl of Mar; the Rebels under whom committed great ravages and disorders in Fife. A party coming to Lesley, the chief seat of the Earl of Rothes, after searching the house for arms, they forced open the Church-doors, and, finding no arms there, broke into the burial-place of the family of Rothes, and, digging up the ground, tore open the coffins in a most shocking manner.

On the 20th of October a body of Western Highlanders, consisting of two thousand three hundred men, commanded by General Gordon, came before Inverary, the chief town in Argyle-shire; and, having that night viewed the place, marched back to a mill about half a mile from the town. Next day being reinforced by three hundred of the Earl of Broadalbin's men, they viewed the town a second time, and again returned to their former quarters. On the 22d they drew up a third time, and sent detachments to cut fascines, as if they designed to attack the town; but finding, that the Earl of Ilay, who commanded in it, was ready to receive them, they thought fit once more to retreat to their quarters; and on the 24th left the place, and marched through Glenorchies, in their way to join the Earl of Mar. This preservation of the town of Inverary was, at that juncture, a very considerable service; for, had the Rebels been masters of that pass, they might have poured in their men, either towards Glasgow, or into the Shire of Ayr, and so have joined the Rebels in the North of England.

On the 23d of October the Duke of Argyle received advice, that a party of Rebels, consisting of two hundred foot, and one hundred horse, were marching by Castel Campbel towards Dumferling; upon which he sent away a detachment of dragoons under the command of Colonel Calcart, who came up with the Rebels on the 24th at five in the morning; and, after having killed and wounded several of them, took seventeen prisoners, and amongst them the following Gentlemen, Mr Murray, brother to the Laird of Aberkernie; Mr Hay, son to Arbat; Mr Patrick Gordon, Aberlour's eldest son; Alexander Forbes, son to Bussie; William Robertson, brother to Donbills; Mr Kenlock, a Physician; Alexander Smith; Mr Alexander Gordon; Francis Gordon, of Craig; Mr Hamilton, of Gishowen in Strabogie; and George Gordon, of the mill of Kincardine. The same evening Colonel Calcart returned to the camp at Stirling with his prisoners, having had only one of his dragoons wounded.

About this time the Earl of Mar received three letters, which had been intercepted by Mr Forster, one from Lord Townshend to the Duke of Argyle; one from the Earl of Nottingham to the Duke of Roxburgh; and one from the Prince of Wales to the Duke of Argyle; of which we have an account in the following letter of the Earl of Mar to the Earl of Broadalbin, which gives a view of the state of the Rebels affairs at that time:

My dear Lord,

I had the pleasure of your Lordship's of the 13th last night. I have now sent one hundred bolls of meal, and what quantity of ammunition we could spare, for the use of the army under General Gordon; all which is sent under an effort of forty men to Teymouth, and from thence

The six regiments designed to cross the Forth were: First, the Earl of Strathmore's; but he and his Lieutenant-Colonel Walkinshaw of Barrowfield were forced back in their passage by the King's men of war, with several others, and obliged to go on shore in the Isle of May. This regiment was not in Highland-dress, as the others were. This Lord was a hearty friend of the Pretender's, and had some time before this Rebellion broke out, given it under his hand, that he would be ready, the first opportunity, to rise and assist to establish him upon the Throne. This paper, which was signed by several others, was lodged in the hands of Colonel Hosker, to be by him transported into France.

The second regiment was the Earl of Mar's, which came not entire over the Forth; for only Major Forbes, with three Captains and three Lieutenants, were taken at Preston, the rest were driven back by the men of war.

The third, Legie Drummond's. This regiment came not entire over the Forth, being driven back on the Fife side, with many more; for, of the two thousand five hundred designed to cross the Forth, the better half were prevented. He that had the command of this regiment was one of those that signed an answer to Monsieur de Torcy's questions, which gave a distinct resolution to each query, containing a full account of the state of affairs; particularly an account of the inclinations of the people, to venture all for the Chevalier's service: This was when the people of Scotland were dissatisfied about the Union, in the year 1707. This paper was likewise lodged in the hands of Colonel Hosker, to be by him transported into France.

No. 86. Vol. IV.

The fourth, the Lord Nairn's, brother to the Duke of Athol; but by marrying an heiress, according to the custom of Scotland, changed his own name for her's: He came over the Forth with a good many of his men. He is a Gentleman well beloved in his Country, and by all that had the advantage to be acquainted with him: He had formerly been at sea, and gave signal instances of his bravery: He was a mighty stickler against the Union. His son, who was Lieutenant-Colonel to Lord Charles, took a great deal of pains to encourage the Highlanders by his own experience, in their hard marches; and always went with them on foot through the worst and deepest ways, and in Highland-dress.

The fifth regiment was commanded by Lord Charles Murray, a younger son of the Duke of Athol: He had been a Cornet of horse beyond sea, and had gained a mighty good character for his bravery, even temper, and graceful deportment. Upon all the marches, he could never be prevailed with to ride, but kept at the head of his regiment on foot, in his Highland-dress, without breeches: He would scarce accept of a horse to cross the rivers, which his men, in that season of the year, forded above mid thigh deep in water. When the Rebels surrendered at Preston, he was tried for a deserter, being a half-pay Officer, and shot.

The sixth regiment was called Mackintosh's Battalion, a relation of the Brigadier's, who is chief of that clan. He is of an antient family, descended from the old Thanes of Fife. His name, in the Irish, or Highland language, discovers his descent; for Toibh signifies Thane, and Mac Son. His motto to his coat of arms is comical as well as remarkable, Touch not the cat without your Lordship will take care to transport it to your army.

You ask for news, and I can tell you a good deal pretty agreeable. Most of our Fife detachment are got over to the other side, and proclaimed the King yesterday at Haddington. I have now a letter from Mr Forster, with three letters they had intercepted; one from Lord Townshend to Duke of Argyle; one from Lord Nottingham to Duke of Roxburgh, and one from Prince Hopeful to Duke of Argyle, of which I send your Lordship a copy, and by that you will judge pretty well of the situation of our enemies. By Hopeful's letter it will seem, that the Duke of Ormond is in England by this time. Mr Forster's letter is three days after his last to me. He was then three hundred horse, and was to be joined next day by all the border, and go frant to New-castle, which they were sure of, and of getting good numbers of the best foot in the North of England to join them. By them and our men on the South side, all correspondence betwixt London and the Duke of Argyle will be stopped. I have heard nothing yet of these four battalions, and if Evans's dragoons from Ireland to Duke Argyle be come: But, if the news we had of the commotions in that Country be not true, they will certainly be with him soon; and by that your Lordship will easily see the necessity of Gordon's finishing his business in Argyleshire without delay, and marching Wilt. Tom. Forster thinks and presses my attacking Duke of Argyle before that enforcement join him; which I wish heartily to do; but that must be as things happen. The affair of Argyleshire being finished by your Lordship and Gordon, is of great consequence to this, as well as other things. Therefore I am sure your Lordship and he will lose no time in it.

By Lord Nottingham's to Duke of Roxburgh,

I perceive your Lordship has had the honour of a letter from his Grace; to which I have no doubt of your giving a suitable answer. The paragraph of the letter is this: Not having time to send you the whole; and beside, it signifies little. Though what you writ to my Lord Broadalbin was in itself very proper; yet, I doubt it will have little effect upon him, unless he were convinced of the folly of this attempt, from some assurance, that not only the preparations against them would be sufficient to suppress them; and that all their expectation of assistance from abroad, or by an insurrection in England, would certainly fail them.

These are the words of the letter; and it is dated the 3d of this month. That of Hopeful to Duke of Argyle is of the 7th, by which they then knew of Duke Ormond's leaving Paris, which they had not when Nottingham wrote his letter. And, now that they must know of the Insurrection in England being far from failing us, I leave your Lordship to judge what they are not thinking at London of their condition. I have read most of Hopeful's letter to the company here: What I have not read is the first paragraph; and that I think your Lordship had best not shew to any body, save to General Gordon.

I just now hear from Monteilb, that the Earls May and Bute are certainly in Argyleshire; and that there are two men of war come into Clyde, who were sending their long-boats to retake the boats on Lochlomond, which Glyngill has seized. I wish, with all my heart, this could be prevented, and that these folks were driven from Inverary, which I am sure your Lordship and General Gordon will lose no time in doing. I am sorry for more in that Country's following Lawer's example; and particularly, I am surprized exceedingly with Lochnell's behaviour, which I knew some days ago; but I hear they have without your glove; which coat of arms is supported by two wild cats, and has a cat for the crest. The Earl of Wemy is descended from the same Thane of Fife; and it is disputed whether he or Mackintosh are elder, though certain it is, that the Earl of Wemy retains a considerable part of Thane's estate. Whether Mackintosh be elder or younger, he left Fife, and made a purchase in the North, where his successors have lived for several hundreds of years in a handsome and splendid manner, and married the Heiress of Clancattau, whereto Mackintosh became the Head and Chief; which has a great many Tribes or Followers, viz. the Macphersons, the Farquarsons of Brac-Mar, the Macgillivray, the Shaw, Macbeans, Macquens, Smiths and Clarks, &c. which, joined together, make a numerous Clan. The Macphersons would not on this occasion follow their Chief, but formed a separate body for the Pretender. This regiment came entire over the other side; but the persuasions of the Brigadier prevailed with him. He is a handsome brave young Gentleman, of a very considerable interest in his own Country; for he can bring into the field upon any occasion one thousand stout, hardy, and well armed men.

The English were not so well regulated, or so well armed as the Scots. The troops were: First, the Earl of Derwentwater's, commanded by his brother Charles Radcliffe, Esq; and Captain John Shaftoe. That Earl being a papist, and a Relation of the Pretender's, having it seems had the opportunity of being personally acquainted with him, all these circumstances unhappily concurred to draw him into this snare, to his disaction, and the utter ruin of the most flourishing family in that part of Britain.

It was thought, however, that this Lord did not join either so heartily or so premeditatedly in this affair as was expected; for there is no doubt but he might have brought far greater numbers of men into the field than he did; the great estate he possessed, the money he could command, his interest among the Gentlemen, and, which is above all, his being so well beloved as he was, could not have failed to have procured him many hundreds of followers more than he had, if he had thought fit; for his concerns in the Lead-mines in Aylone Moor are very considerable, where several hundreds of men are employed under him, and get their bread from him, whom, there is no doubt, he might easily have engaged: Besides this, the sweetness of his temper and disposition, in which he had few equals, had so secured him the affection of all his tenants, neighbours, and dependants, that multitudes would have lived and died with him: The truth is, he was a man formed by nature to be generally beloved; for he was of so universal a beneficence, that he seemed to live for others, as he lived among his own people, there he spent his estate, and continually did offices of kindness and good neighbourhood to every body, as opportunity offered. He kept a house of generous hospitality and noble entertainment, which few in that Country do, and none come up to. He was very charitable to poor and distressed families on all occasions, whether known to him or not, and whether Papist or Protestant. His fate will be sensibly felt by a great many, who had no kindness for the cause he died in, and who heartily wish he had not forwarded his ruin, and their loss, by his 1715. have used him as he deserves. One near Stirling wrote to me two days ago, that the Duke of Argyle had sent him prisoner to Edinburgh, which, I wish, may be true. I hope it will not be in the power of those rogues to do us much hurt, especially when your Lordship's being heartily in the cause of your King and Country is known to them: And I assure your Lordship, those vassals of your's, who misbehave, shall be used as you desire.

I have sent to Aberdeen for the Printing-press, and we have Lawyers here, with whom I advise as your Lordship recommends.

These men of Glenlyon's, you mentioned, were in Fife, and are gone over: So I have sent a party of Macphersons with the meal and ammunition to Taymouth, who are to return from that; and your Lordship will take care of it from thence. I have recommended it to your doers there, in case of your absence; and I send this by an express, that you may have it sooner than that party can march.

I'll long to hear from your Lordship, and that you will send me some good news from your parts in return for all this.

The thing I am most in pain about is our friends, who are gone over to the other side, because of Mr Forster's marching towards Newcastle; and nothing could so much prevent the Duke of Argyle's sending a detachment that way, as your clearing Argyleshire soon, and marching Westwards, as Gordon has orders.

I am, my dear Lord,

Soon after, two letters from the Earl of Mar were intercepted, and the Pretender caused a declaration to be drawn up (1).

The Rebellion being thus kindled as well in Dutch England as Scotland, it was thought proper to demand in form of the States-General the six thousand men, which by the treaty of guarantee they were engaged to send over when required. The States immediately complied with the demand, and preparations were made for transporting them. At the same time, General Cadogan represented to the States, that the King, having received advice that the Pretender, James Butler late Duke of Ormond, Henry St John late Viscount Bolingbroke, and other Traitors, designed to pass through their Dominions in order to go to Great-Britain and join the Rebels, desired them to give orders to all the Governors of the places under their dominion, to stop and examine all the King's subjects that should pass out of Germany, Lorrain, or France, and also to all the Captains of ships not to take any such on board. This memorial was readily agreed to, and orders were issued accordingly.

As it would be some time before the Dutch could be embarked, Pitt's regiment of horse, and Sabine's, Preston's, and Vane's of foot, had been sent for from Ireland, and had landed at Chester the beginning of October. Associations were also entered into throughout the Kingdom, for the defence of the King's Person and Government; and the Lords-Lieutenants of the Counties were empowered to form into Troops or Companies such as should be willing to affiliate, and to grant Commissions to them in the King's name.

The Archbishop published a declaration, signed by himself and thirteen of his Suffragans, testifying their abhorrence of the Rebellion.

But

his indiscretion in joining in this mad as well as wicked undertaking. If the warrant from the Secretary's Office for apprehending him had been made a greater secret than it was, he might have been taken, and so his ruin have been prevented. His brother is young and bold, but too forward: He has a great deal of courage, which wants a few more years, and a better cause to improve it; there is room to hope he will never employ it in such an adventure again.

The second troop was the Lord Widdrington's, commanded by Mr Thomas Errington of Beaufront. This Errington is a Gentleman of a very antient family in Northumberland, a younger brother of the family of Errington: He has very good natural parts, and had been formerly an officer in the French service, where he had got the reputation of a good soldier. It is believed he would not have engaged in this Rebellion, had not the many obligations he lay under to the Earl of Darwentwater prevailed with him.

The third troop was commanded by Captain John Hunter, born upon the river North-Tyne in the County of Northumberland: He had obtained a commission in the latter end of Queen Anne's Reign to raise an Independent Company, but never received any pay, nor lifted any men, but when he made use of that commission now in the Rebellion. He was famous for running uncultured goods out of Scotland into England. He behaved with great vigour and obstinacy in the action at Preston, where he took possession of some houses during the attack, and galled that brave regiment of Brigadier Preston's, making a great slaughter out of the windows: He has since made his escape out of Chester-Castle, and, as is said, got over into Ireland, and from thence to France.

The fourth troop was commanded by Robert Dou- glas, brother to the Laird of Finland in Scotland: He signalized himself upon several accounts; for going so often, so privately, and expeditiously betwixt England and the Earl of Mar. He was the man who brought Mr Forster his Commission, and the Manifestoes and Declarations of the Pretender. He was indefatigable in searching for arms and horses, a trade, some were pleased to say, he had followed out of the Rebellion as well as in it. He was also very vigorous in the action at Preston; where he with his men were possessed of several houses, and did a great deal of harm to his Majesty's forces from the windows. He also made his escape when a prisoner, either at Liverpool or Chester.

The fifth troop was commanded by Captain Nicholas Wogan, an Irish Gentleman, but descended from an antient family of that name in Wales; he joined the Rebels at their first meeting. He is a Gentleman of a most generous mind, and a great deal of bravery, unwearied to forward the good of his cause: His bravery was made known by several instances in the action at Preston: His generosity, as well as courage, was most remarkable in bringing off prisoner Captain Preston, of Preston's regiment of foot, who was mortally wounded through the body by a bullet from the Rebels, and just at the point of being cut in pieces; he hazarded his life among his own men, if possible, to save that Gentleman, though an enemy, and was wounded in doing it. Besides these there were many volunteers not formed into any troop, and the whole amounted to about two thousand horse and foot.

Proceſſings of the Rebels.

On the 25th of October, Lieutenant-General Carpenter, who was appointed to go againſt the Northumberland Rebels, ſet out from Newcaſtle with Hotſham's regiment of foot, Cobham's, Moleſworth's, and Churchill's dragoons; and, on the 27th, lay at Wooler, intending, the next day, to face Kelſo, where the Rebels were. The Lord Kennmare, who commanded them while on the South ſide of the Tweed, having notice of this, called immediately a Council of war, wherein it was conſidered what courſe they ſhould take. The Lord Wintoun preſſed them earneſtly to march into the Weſt of Scotland; but the Engliſh oppoſed, and prevailed againſt that opinion. Then it was propoſed to paſs the Tweed, 1715. and attack the King's troops, taking advantage of the weakneſs and wearineſs of General Carpenter's men, who were indeed extremely fatigued, and not above nine hundred men in number, whereof two regiments of dragoons were new raiſed, and had never ſeen any ſervice. But this advice was alſo reſected, and the Rebels decamped from Kelſo, and, taking a little to the right, marched to Jedburgh. Upon this march they were all alarmed, by miſtaking a party of their own men for ſome of General Carpenter's forces. The party appearing at a diſtance, Captain Wogan, deſirous to know who they were, went off towards the river's ſide, which parted them, and left Mr Patten to ſtand at a convenient diſtance from him, whiſt he rid up to make a diſcovery. If they proved enemies, he was to fire a piſtol; if friends, to toſs up his hat. At the ſame time ſome of the party, wanting fore, ſince I have not had the leaſt accounts almoſt of your motions, ſince I ſent the detachment over. I hope all is pretty right again; but it was an unlucky miſtake of Brigadier Mackinſh's in marching from Haddington to Leith. I cannot but ſay though, that it was odd your Lordſhip ſent no orders or intelligence to him, when you had reaſon to expect that party's coming over every day. His retreat he made from Leith, and now from Seaton, with the help of the movement I made from this, makes ſome amends for that miſtake; and I hope that party of men with him will be of great uſe to you, and the cauſe. I with you may find a way of ſending the incloſed to Mr Forſter, which I leave open for your Lordſhip to read; and I have little further to ſay to you, than what you will find in it. I know ſo little of the ſituation of your affairs, that I muſt leave to yourſelf what is fit for you to do, as will moſt conduce to the ſervice; and I know you will take good advice.

My humble ſervice to all friends with you, particularly Brigadier Mackinſh's, Lord Nairn, Lord Charles Murray, and Mackinſh's, who, I hope, are joined you long e'er now; and indeed they all deſerve praiſe for their gallant behaviour. I muſt not forget Kinackin, who I hear ſpoke ſo reſolutely to the Duke of Argyle from the Cadet; and I hope Inverreal and all my men with him are well; and their countrymen long to be at them, which I hope they and we ſhall ſoon. I have ſent another copy of the incloſed to Mr Forſter by ſea; ſo it will be hard, if none of them come to his hands.

I know your Lordſhip will endeavour to let me hear from you as ſoon as poſſible, which I long impatiently for; and I hope you will find a way of ſending it ſafe. In one of my former, either to your Lordſhip, or to ſome body to ſhew you, I told, that a part of the army would be about Dumbarton. But now you would not rely on that, for, till I hear from General Gordon, I am uncertain, if they hold that way. I have ſent your Lordſhip a copy of my new Commiſſion, which perhaps you have not ſeen before. I have named the ſeveral General Officers, and your Lordſhip has the rank of a Brigadier of the horſe.

I am told Earl Wintoun has been very uſeful to our men we ſent over. I ſuppoſe he is now with your Lordſhip, and I beg you may make my compliments to his Lordſhip; and I hope the King will ſoon thank him himſelf.

I will trouble your Lordſhip no farther now; but all ſucces attend you, and may we ſoon have a merry meeting. I am, with all reſpect,

M A R.

To Mr. Forſter, General of the King's forces in Northumberland.

S I R,

I wrote to you of the 17th from Auchterarder, which I hope you got. I marched the ſame night the horſe to Dumblain, within four miles of Stirling, and the foot ſome miles ſhort of that place. Next morning I had certain intelligence of the Duke of Argyle's returning from Edinburgh with moſt of the troops he had carried there, and was on their march towards Stirling. I alſo had account of Evans's regiment landing in the Weſt of Scotland from Ireland, and were on their way to Stirling. I had come away from Perth before the provisions were ready to go with us; and I found all the Country about Stirling, where we were to paſs the Forth, was entirely exhauſted by the enemy, ſo that there was nothing for us to ſubſiſt on there. I had no account from General Gordon, as I expected; and the ſooner I could expect him at the heads of Forth was two days after that; and I could not think of paſſing Forth till I had been joined by him. Under thoſe difficulties, and having got one of the things I deſigned by my march, the Duke of Argyle's withdrawing from our friends in Lothian, I thought fit to march back to Auchterarder, which was a better quarter, though not a good one neither. Next morning I got intelligence of the Duke of Argyle's being come to Stirling the night before, and that he had ſent an expreſs to Evans's dragoons to haſten up. I had a letter alſo that morning from General Gordon, telling me, that ſome things had kept him longer than he expected that it would be that day e're he could be at Inverary; and that he could not poſſibly join me this week. Upon this I thought it better to return here, which is a good quarter, and wait his coming up, and the Lord Seaforth's, than continue at Auchterarder, ſince it would not a bit retard my paſſing the Forth, when I ſhould be in a condition to do it; and in the mean time I could be getting provisions ready to carry along with me in my march, which, as I have been told, are abſolutely neceſſary about the heads of Forth: So I came home laſt night.

I very much regret my being obliged to this for many reaſons, particularly becauſe of its keeping me ſo much the longer from joining you; but you eaſily ſee it was not in my power to help it. However, I hope my ſtay here ſhall be very ſhort, and you may depend upon its being no longer than it neceſſarily muſt. The paſſage over the Forth is now ſo extreme difficult, that it is ſcarce poſſible to ſend any letters that way; and within theſe two days there were two boats coming over with letters to me, that were ſo hard purſued, that they were obliged to throw the letters into the ſea; ſo that I know very little of our friends on that ſide, and leſs of you, which is ſo ſmall loſs to me. I heard to-day 1715. wanting to know who he was, and, galloping towards him, he fired a pistol; so the alarm was taken; but the disorder was not great, the matter being soon discovered. Then they continued their march towards Jedburgh. The horse having entered the town, word was brought them, that General Carpenter had fallen upon the foot, who had not as yet reached the town. This put them into the utmost consternation. However, not being discouraged so as to abandon their fellows, they all mounted their horses, and marched out to relieve their friends. This mistake was likewise occasioned by another party of their own men, who had taken a different route; and, this being also discovered, they all returned to their quarters, and staid at Jedburgh two days.

As they had now a fair opportunity to slip General Carpenter, who was some marches behind them, it was resolved, pursuant to the advice of the English, to cross the mountains, and march into England. Accordingly, Captain Hunter, who was well acquainted with the country, was ordered, with his troops, to go into North Tynedale, and there provide quarters for them, who would follow. But here began a mutiny; the Higblanders could not be persuaded to pass the borders; and, though many persuasions were used with them, they would not stir. Upon this, the first resolution was altered, and orders were sent after Captain Hunter to countermand him. They were joined in this town by Mr Ainsley of Blackhill, and some others. From Jedburgh they marched to Hawick, a small to-day by word of mouth, that the detachment I sent over are marched and joined our friends in the South of Scotland; so I hope they may be yet useful; but I hope you know more of them than I do. I have now writ to Lord Kennure, but it is ten to one, if it comes to his hands. I know not what he is doing, where he is, or what way he intends to dispose of his people; whether he is to march into England, or towards Stirling, to wait my passing Forth; and, in the ignorance I am in of your affairs below the river, I scarce know what to advise him. If you be in need of his assistance in England, I doubt not but you have called him there; but, if not, certainly his being in the rear of the enemy when I pass Forth, or now that the Duke of Argyle is reinforced, should he march towards me before I am, it would be of great service. I am forced, in a great measure, to leave it to himself to do as he finds most expedient.

I am afraid the Duke of Ormond is not as yet come to England; else I should have had the certainty of it one way or other before now. I cannot conceive what detains him, nor the King from coming here. However, I am sure it is none of your fault; and I hope they will both surprize us agreeably very soon.

I believe I told you in my last of the Lord Strathmore, and two hundred of the detachment, that were going over Forth, and drove into the Island of May by three men of war, being got safe ashore on this side, and are now joined us again. There were but two of all the boats taken; and I hear some of the men, that were in them, who were made prisoners in Leith, were relieved by our men, when they came there; but that their officers were sent to Edinburgh-Castle; so I want some reprisals for them, which I hope to have ere long.

Though Brigadier Mackintosh's mistake in going to Leith was like to be unlucky to us and them, yet it has given the Duke of Argyle no little trouble; and our march obliging him to let them slip, has, I am apt to believe, vexed him.

I beg you will find some way to let me hear from you. Ever since my detachment were in Fife, all the men of war, that cruised on the North Coast, betwixt Peterhead and the Firth, have been in the Firth, and, I believe, will continue there to prevent my sending more over that way; so that all that coast is clear, which I wish to God the King knew; and you may easily send a boat here any where with letters from England. I hear there is one of the regiments of foot come from Ireland to Stirling.

When you write to me, if by sea, pray send me some News-papers, that I may know what the world is doing; for we know little of it here these eight days. Success attend you; and I am, with all truth and esteem,

S I R,

From the Camp at Perth, October 12,

Your most obedient

Humble servant,

No. 86. VOL. IV.

The Pretender's Declaration was in the following terms:

James R.

'James VIII, by the Grace of God, of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. to all our loving subjects of what degree or quality soever, greeting. As we are firmly resolved never to omit any opportunity of asserting our undoubted title to the Imperial Crown of these Realms; and of endeavouring to put ourself into the possession of that right, which is devolved upon us by the laws of God and Man; so must we, in justice to the sentiments of our own heart, declare, that nothing in this world can give us so great satisfaction, as to owe, to the endeavours of our loyal subjects, both our and their restoration to that happy settlement, which can alone deliver this Church and Nation from the calamities, which they lie at present under, and from those future miseries, which must be the consequences of the present Usurpation. During the life of our dear Sister of glorious memory, the happiness, which our people enjoyed, softened in some degree the hardship of our own fate: And we must further confess, that when we reflected on the goodness of her nature, and her inclinations to justice, we could not but persuade ourself, that she intended to establish and perpetuate the peace, which she had given to these Kingdoms, by destroying for ever all competition to the Succession of the Crown; and by securing to us at last the enjoyment of that inheritance, out of which we had been so long kept, which her conscience must inform her was our due, and which her principles must lead her to desire, that we might obtain.

But, since the time when it pleased Almighty God to put a period to her life, and not to suffer us to throw ourself, as we then fully purposed to have done, upon our people, we have not been able to look on the present condition of our Kingdoms, or to consider their future prospect, without all the horror and indignation, which ought to fill the breast of every Scotman.

We have beheld a foreign Family, aliens to our Country, distant in Blood, and strangers even to our Language, ascend the Throne.

We have seen the reins of Government put into the hands of a faction; and that Authority, which was designed for the protection of all, exercised by a few of the worst, to the oppression of the best and greatest number of our subjects. Our Sister has not been left at rest in her grave; her name has been scurrilously abused; her glory, as far as in these people lay, insolently defaced, and her faithful servants inhumanly persecuted. A Parliament has been procured by the most unwarrantable influences, and by the grossest corruption, to serve the vilest ends. And they, who ought to be the Guardians of the liberties of the people, are become the Instruments of tyranny. Whilst the principal powers engaged in the late wars enjoy the blessings of peace, and are attentive to discharge their debts, and ease their people; Great-Britain, in the midst

1715. small market-town, belonging to the Dukes of Bucclagh, at whose house the English Lords, with their relations, and Mr Forster, took up their quarters. The Highlanders still supposing, that the march for England was resolved on, separated themselves in disgust, and went to the top of a rising ground on Hawick Moor, and, resting their arms, declared, they would fight, if they were led on to the enemy; but would not go into England; adhering to Lord Wintoun's advice, that they would go through the West of Scotland, join the Clans there, and either cross the Forb some miles above Stirling, or send word to the Earl of Mar, that they would fall upon the Duke of Argyle's rear, whilst he fell on his front. Whilst they were in this humour, they would allow none to come and speak with them but the Earl of Wintoun, 1715. who had tutored them in this project, by assuring them, if they went to England, they would be all cut to pieces, or taken and sold for slaves (1). After a dispute of two hours they were at last brought to this, that they would keep together as long as they staid in Scotland; but, upon any motion of going for England, they would return back: So they continued their march to Hawick, where they were extremely frightened for quarters. Here the Highlanders, who had always the guard, and did all the duty after they joined the horse, discovered from their advanced guard a party of horse (who were patrolling in their front) and, taking them for enemies, gave the alarm at midnight; and all ran immediately to arms. The moon shone, midst of peace, feels all the load of a war. New debts are contracted; new armies are raised at home; Dutch forces are brought into these Kingdoms; and by taking possession of the Duchy of Bremen, in violation of the public faith, a door is opened by the Usurper to let in an inundation of foreigners from abroad, and to reduce these Nations to the state of a province, to one of the most inconsiderable provinces of the Empire.

These are some few of the many real evils, into which these Kingdoms have been betrayed, under pretence of being rescued and secured from dangers purely imaginary. And these are the consequences of abandoning the old Constitution, as we persuade ourselves, very many of those, who promoted the present unjust and illegal Settlement, never intended.

We observe, with the utmost satisfaction, that the generality of our subjects are awakened with a just sense of their danger; and that they shew themselves disposed to take such measures, as may effectually rescue them from that bondage, which has, by the artifice of a few designing men, and by the concurrence of many unhappy causes, been brought upon them.

We adore the wisdom of the Divine Providence, which has opened a way to our Restoration, by the success of those very measures, that were laid to disappoint us for ever. And we most earnestly conjure all our loving subjects, not to suffer that spirit to faint or die away, which has been so miraculously raised in all parts of the Kingdom; but to pursue, with all the vigour and hopes of success, which so just and righteous a cause ought to inspire, those methods, which the finger of God seems to point out to them.

We are come to take our part in all the dangers and difficulties, to which any of our subjects, from the greatest down to the meanest, may be exposed on this important occasion, to relieve our subjects of Scotland from the hardships they groan under on account of the late unhappy Union, and to restore the Kingdom to its antient, free, and independent State.

We have before our eyes the example of our Royal Grandfather, who fell a sacrifice to Rebellion; and of our Royal Uncle, who, by a train of miracles, escaped the rage of the barbarous and blood-thirsty Rebels, and lived to exercise his clemency towards those, who had waged war against his Father and Himself; who had driven him to seek shelter in foreign lands, and who had even set a price upon his head.

We see the same instances of cruelty renewed against us by men of the same principles, without any other reason than the consciousness of their own guilt, and the implacable malice of their own hearts. For, in the account of such men, it is a crime sufficient to be born their King. But God forbid, that we should tread in these steps, or that the cause of a lawful Prince and an injured People should be carried on like that of usurpation and tyranny, and owe its support to Assassins. We shall copy after the patterns abovementioned, and be ready, with the former of our Royal Ancestors, to seal the cause of our Country, if such be the will of Heaven, with our blood. But we hope for better things: We hope, with the latter, to see our just rights, and those of the Church and People of Scotland, once more settled in a free, independent Scots Parliament, on their antient foundation. To such a Parliament (which we will immediately call) shall we entirely refer both our and their interests, being sensible, that these interests, rightly understood, are always the same. Let the civil as well as religious rights of all our subjects receive their confirmation in such a Parliament. Let consciences truly tender be indulged. Let property of every kind be better than ever secured. Let an act of general grace and amnesty extinguish the fears even of the most guilty. If possible, let the very remembrance of all, which have preceded this happy moment, be utterly blotted out, that our subjects may be united to us, and to each other, in the strictest bonds of affection as well as interest.

And that nothing may be omitted, which is in our power to contribute to this desirable end, we do, by these presents, absolutely and effectually, for us, our heirs and successors, pardon, remit, and discharge all crimes of High-Treason, misprision of Treason, and all other crimes and offences whatsoever, done or committed against Us, or our Royal Father, of blessed memory, by any of our subjects, of what degree or quality soever, who shall, at or after our landing, and before they engage in any action against us, or our forces, from that time, lay hold of mercy, and return to that duty and allegiance, which they owe to us, their only rightful and lawful Sovereign.

By the joint endeavours of Us and of our Parliament, urged by these motives, and directed by these views, we may hope to see the peace and flourishing estate of this Kingdom in a short time restored; and we shall be equally forward to concert with our Parliament such further measures, as may be thought necessary for leaving the same to future generations.

And we hereby require all Sheriffs of Shires, Stewarts of Stewarts, or their Deputies, and Magistrates of Burghs, to publish this our Declaration, immediately after it shall come to their hands, in the usual places and manner, under pain of being proceeded against for failure thereof, and forfeiting the benefit of our general pardon.

Given under our Sign Manual and Privy Signet, at our Court of Commerce, the 25th day of October, and in the fifteenth year of our Reign.

(1) During the contest, the horse surrounded the foot, in order to force them to march Southwards, upon which the Highlanders cocked their firelocks, and said, 'If they were to be made a sacrifice, they would chuse to have it done in their own country.'

1715. shone, and the night was very clear; so the whole body formed themselves in very good order to oppose any attack, that should be made. But in the end this proved another false alarm; and they all returned to their quarters. It was said, that this alarm was designed to try the Highlanders, and to see how they would behave; and whether they would stand cheerfully to their arms, if an enemy appeared.

Oct. 30.

The next day, they marched to Langbolme, another small market-town, belonging to the Duchess of Buccleugh. From hence there was a strong detachment of horse sent in the night to Ecclefechan, with orders to block up Dumfries, till they should come up and attack it. Dumfries is a rich town, situated very commodiously upon the mouth of a navigable river on the Irish sea, and maintains a considerable trade with England and the West of Scotland. Had the Rebels been steady in their resolutions, they might very easily have made themselves masters of that town, there being no regular forces in it, but only train-bands, militia, and townsmen, who would not have been able to hold out, nor any fortifications to assist them in the defence of it. Here the Rebels also might have furnished themselves with arms, money, and ammunition, which were much wanted, and opened a passage to Glasgow, one of the best towns in Scotland. Here likewise they might have joined the Highland Clans from the West, besides a great many Country Gentlemen, who, on such an appearance, would have come in to them; by which means they might have soon formed a considerable army, and have received succours from France and Ireland, no men of war being in all those seas at that time. They were, moreover, assured, that in Glasgow there were a great many arms in the Talbooth ready for all occasions, and a considerable quantity of gun-powder in the Tron steeple. As to the Duke of Argyle, he was in no condition to have disturbed them; but, on the contrary, would have scarce thought himself safe in Stirling, his troops not exceeding two thousand men; for he had not then been reinforced by the troops from Ireland, nor the Dutch from England. But all these arguments were in vain; the English Gentlemen were positive for an attempt upon their own Country, pretending to have letters from their friends in Lancashire, inviting them thither, and assuring them, that there would be a general insurrection upon their appearing; and that twenty thousand men would immediately join them. Whether they had any such letters or no, is still a question; but they affirmed it to their army, and urged the advantages of a speedy march into England with such vehemence, that they turned the scale, and sent an express after the party of horse they had ordered to Ecclefechan, for to return and meet them at Langtoun in Cumberland. Thus the design of continuing in Scotland was abandoned. But the Highlanders, whether dealt with privily by the Earl of Wintoun, or being convinced of the advantages they were going to throw away, and the uncertainties they were bringing upon themselves, halted a second time, and would march no farther. However, their Leaders were again prevailed with to march by promises, and distributing money to the men. But many of them were still positive, and that to such a degree, that they separated, and about five hundred of them went off in bodies, chusing rather, as they said, to surrender themselves prisoners, than to go forward to certain destruction. All imaginable means were used to prevent this desertion; but nothing could prevail with them to alter their resolutions; for they retired in parties over the mountains. The Earl of Wintoun went off likewise with part of his troop, very much dissatisfied at the measures, and declaring they were taking the way to ruin themselves. However, in a little time he returned and joined the body, though not at all satisfied with their proceedings; and was never after called to any Council of War, which incensed him extremely against the rest of the Lords and commanding Officers. They left the small pieces of cannon, which they had brought from Kello, at Langbolme, having nailed them up, and made them unfit for service. Then they marched that night to Langtoun, about seven miles from Carlisle, which was a very long and fatiguing march. Here they had intelligence, that Brigadier Stanwix, with a party of horse from Carlisle, had been there that day to get intelligence of their numbers and motions; but that, upon notice of their coming towards him, he had retired to his garrison, which then consisted of very few men, having made Mr Graham of Inchbracky a prisoner. This night the party ordered to Ecclefechan returned and joined the Rebels. Next day they entered England, and marched to Brampton, a small market-town, belonging to the Earl of Carlisle. Here they proclaimed the Pretender, and Mr Forster opened his Commission (brought by Mr Douglas from the Earl of Mar) to act as General in England. From this time the Highlanders had six-pence per day paid them, to keep them in good order, and under command. The Rebels halted one night at Brampton, to refresh the men, having marched above one hundred miles in five days. On the 2d of November they advanced to Penrith, where they expected to have met with some friends to join them; for it was reported, that Mr Dacre of Abbeylanger-Coast, a Papist, had promised to raise forty men; but he was prevented by a fever. As they drew near Penrith, they had notice, that the Sheriff, with the Lord Lonsdale, and the Bishop of Carlisle, had drawn together the whole Posse of Cumberland, amounting to about twelve thousand men, in order to oppose their progress. The first part of this was very true, that the Posse was drawn together; nor was their number much less. But they gave the Rebel army no occasion to try, whether they would stand or not; for, upon notice of the approach of the Rebels, they shamefully dispersed, leaving the Lord Lonsdale, with about twenty men besides his own servants, who continued on the spot till the Rebels appeared, and then he retired. A party was sent to Lowther-Hall to see for him, but he was not to be found. This retreat animated the Rebels, who made some booty, taking several horses and a great many arms. Having staid at Nov. 3. Penrith that night, they marched next day to Appleby, where they halted again. On the 5th of November they marched to Kendal, and on the 6th to Kirby-Lonsdale, a small market-town in Westmoreland, where some few Papists and their servants from Lancashire joined them.

1715. them (1). From this place they marched to Lancaster on the 7th, where the famous Colonel Charlton and another Officer happened to be. Upon the news of their approach, the Colonel proposed to blow up a fine bridge, over which they were to pass, to obstruct their entry into the town; but the inhabitants would not agree to it. The Colonel therefore thought it advisable to leave the town, after having ordered some barrels of powder to be thrown into a well, to prevent their falling into the hands of the Rebels. The Rebels, having entered Lancaster without opposition, performed the usual ceremonies of proclaiming the Pretender, and levying the public revenue. It was thought they would have continued here till they had received the promised succours, the place being easily made tenable against a greater force than the Government could command on a sudden: But they were in a great hurry to meet their fate, and left Lancaster on the 9th, carrying with them six pieces of cannon, which they found there. They directed their march towards Preston, where the horse arrived that night, but the foot halted half way. The horse entered Preston without any opposition; Stanhope's regiment of dragoons, and a regiment of militia, having thought proper to retire on the approach of the Rebels, which did not a little animate them to see the Royal troops thus fly before them. At Preston they were joined by a considerable number of Gentlemen and their followers, all Papists; which very much disgusted the Scots Gentlemen and Highlanders, because they were made to believe, that all the High-Church party would join them. The Rebels had once resolved to march out of Preston the next day, in order to enter Manchester, where they expected to meet with a considerable reinforcement, and to possess themselves of War-rington-Bridge, which would have made them masters of the rich town of Liverpool. But this design, like all others, that had any shew of prudence, was laid aside for two days, by which time they found themselves otherwise employed.

Proceed-
so on.

It is now time to observe what motions the King's troops made to oppose the Rebels, who had thus given General Carpenter the slip.

While it was yet uncertain which way the Rebels would direct their march, the Duke of Argyle sent a detachment from his small army at Stirling, to hinder their passing the head of Forth, if they should attempt that way to join the Earl of Mar. A squadron of dragoons, and one battalion of foot of this detachment, were quartered at Falkirk, and two hundred dragoons at Kilfyth.

General Carpenter, upon intelligence, that the Rebels were in full march towards Lancaster, resolved to pursue them with the dragoons only, for the greater expedition; not doubting but he should be joined by the King's troops in the West, in which he was not mistaken; for General Wills, who had been sent down some days before to command in the West, having intelligence at Chester, that the Rebels were advancing towards Lancaster, gave orders for all the troops, quartered in those parts, to assemble at War-rington, on the borders of that County. When he arrived there, he found only Preston's regiment. With that he set out, on the 8th of November, and, the same day, arrived at Manchester, where he had intelligence that General Carpenter was on his march from Durham to Lancaster, to whom he sent an express, to acquaint that General of his own motions, that they might act in concert. He marched from Manchester the 11th, with the regiments of dragoons of Wynne, Honeywood, Munden, and Dormer, and Preston's regiment of foot, and advanced directly to Wigan, where Pitt's horse and Stanhope's dragoons were quartered. Understanding here, that the Rebels were still in Preston, he gave orders for the troops to be ready to march towards that place next morning, by break of day. He formed the horse into three brigades, Wynne's and Honeywood's, under the command of Brigadier Honeywood; Munden's and Stanhope's, under the command of Brigadier Munden; Pitt's and Dormer's, under the command of Brigadier Dormer.

On the 12th of November, the troops began their march in the following order: A Captain and fifty men of Preston's foot, sustained by a Captain and fifty dragoons, formed the vanguard: Preston's regiment followed Brigadier Honeywood's brigade; next Dormer's; and Munden's in the rear; and the baggage in the rear of all. In this order they marched to the bridge of Ribble, where we shall leave them, to observe what preparations were made for their reception by the Rebels.

The same morning General Forster gave orders for his army to march, not in the least suspecting the King's troops, and the destruction of all their hopes, were so near at hand. He had depended on the intelligence from the Lancashire Gentlemen, who had promised, that none should advance within forty miles without his knowledge; but it seems, they disappointed him; so that he was under the greatest surprize, when he was informed from all hands, that General Wills was within sight of him. He went out with a party of horse to view the posture of the King's troops; and, upon finding they were in full march towards him, he returned to the town to prepare for their reception.

His men were no ways discouraged, but cheerfully set about the preparations for their defence. of Preston. They barricaded the avenues, and posted their men in the streets and by-lanes, and such houses, as were properest for galling their enemies. The Gentlemen Volunteers were posted in the Church-yard, under the command of the Earls of Derwentwater, Wintoun, and Nithisdale, and the Lord Kenmore. General Forster formed four main barriers; the first a little below the Church, commanded by Brigadier Mackintosh, and sup-

(1) It is to be observed, there were no Papists of any account had yet joined them in their march; for all the Papists on that side the Country had been secured in the Castle of Carlisle, as Mr Howard of Corbie-Castle, Mr Warwick of Warwick-Hall, Mr James Graham of Inchbrachy, and Mr Henry Curwen of Workinton.

1715. ported by the Gentlemen-Volunteers in the Church-yard, the second was situated at the end of a lane leading to the fields, and commanded by Lord Charles Murray. The third Barrier was near a wind-mill, and commanded by the Laird of Mackintosh. And the fourth was in the street leading to Liverpool, commanded by Major Miller, and Mr. Douglas. They threw up several intrenchments in an instant, and did all in their power to make a stout resistance; but were guilty of one capital error, which discovered their ignorance, or rather infatuation. For in the morning, upon the first intelligence of General Wiles's approach, they had detached Macpherson of Innercal, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Earl of Mar's Regiment, with an hundred chosen men, to take post at the bridge of Ribble, which was the only pass the King's troops could enter on that side; the river being fordable only in two places, the one below, and the other above the bridge, and these fords easily made unpassable. The bridge terminates a long narrow lane, where, in some parts, not above two can ride abreast. This is the famous lane, where Oliver Cromwell met with a stout resistance from the King's troops, who having rolled down several large stones from the height upon him and his men, one of them came so near, that he escaped only by making his horse jump into a quick-sand. But Mr. Forster, instead of making advantage of this pass, which he might have done to the destruction of the King's troops, (whom he might have very much annoyed by the help of his cannon, while they lay exposed without any cover) ordered this detachment to return to the town, and left the pass free for General Wiles.

When General Wiles came up to the bridge in the forementioned order, he expected to have met with great difficulties in forcing the pass; but, finding it abandoned, he was much surprized, and suspected some stratagem; and therefore resolved to proceed with caution. Having viewed the hedges, and laid open the ways for the cavalry to enter, he found all clear, and not the least appearance of an enemy. This made him conclude, they had abandoned the place, and were endeavouring, by long marches, to return to Scotland; but in this he was likewise mistaken. For, upon his advancing near the town, he found them in a posture to give him a warm reception, in a place, where he could easier come at them, than he could at the bridge of Ribble. He immediately prepared for an attack, and disposed his troops in such a manner, as he might best annoy them in the town, and prevent their making an escape.

The General having viewed the disposition of the enemy, and finding all the avenues leading to the town strongly barricaded, and two pieces of cannon planted on each; he resolved to make two attacks. For the attack of the avenue, that leads to Wiggan, a Captain and fifty dragoons were draughted out of each of the five regiments, with a Major and Lieutenant-Colonel to command them, and ordered to dismount to sustain Preston's regiment commanded by the Lord Forrester their Lieutenant-Colonel; and Honeywood's regiment was ordered to remain on horseback, to sustain the whole; and the Brigadier of that name had the direction of that attack.

squadron of Stanhope's, were ordered to dismount under the command of Brigadier Dormer, while the regiments of Pitts and Munden, and the remaining squadron of Stanhope's sustained them in the attack of the avenue that leads to Lancaster, lying on that side of the town opposite to the attack of the avenue leading to Wiggan. By the disposition of the King's forces, the four chief barricades of the enemy were easily attacked, but not with desired success.

The first attack was upon that barricade below the Church, commanded by the old Brigadier Mackintosh, who received the King's troops very gallantly; and with a terrible fire, both from the barricade and the houses, obliged them to retire to the end of the town; at the same time the Lord Forrester, Lieutenant-Colonel of Preston's foot, entered the avenue of Wiggan, and took possession of two large houses within fifty yards of the barricade, where he posted his men, finding it impracticable to force the barricade; but from these houses, which overlooked the whole town, he very much annoyed the enemy; and from thence, it is said, they received most of the damage they sustained during the action. These houses had been possessed by the Highlanders, when the barricade was commanded by Mackintosh; but they were called off by him to support that barricade, which gave the King's troops an easier possession of them, and perhaps saved the remains of that regiment, which suffered very much in that bold attack. General Honeywood ordered the houses between those he possessed and the barricade to be set on fire; which was not done without the loss of men on both sides. He likewise ordered breast-works to be thrown up, both to secure his men, and prevent the Rebels from escaping at that quarter of the town.

The other barricades were attacked with great resolution, but without any success; the King's troops being obliged to retire to the ends of the town, and remain satisfied till they could renew their attempts the next day; for by this time night hindered their farther approaches. Thus far the Rebels appeared to have acted with courage, and to have had the advantage, since they had, in all the attacks, repulsed their enemies with little or no loss on their side, and a considerable slaughter on the King's. But they did not long continue in this disposition; for having intelligence next morning, that General Carpenter had arrived with more troops to surround them, their resolution failed them, and from that moment they acted with great confusion and despair.

General Carpenter arrived at Preston on the 13th, at ten in the morning, with three regiments of dragoons, Lord Cobham's, Churchill's, and Moleworth's, accompanied by the Earl of Carlisle, Lord Lumley, and Colonel Darcy; ordering Moleworth's to the Manchester side, and marching the other two to the Lancaster side. He found, that the Rebels had been attacked the day before, without success, and that most part of the King's horse and dragoons were crouded in a deep narrow lane near the end of the town, so incommodious, that it was impossible to draw up above three or four in front; and, going to view the ground towards the river, he saw there were no troops posted at the end of Fishergate-Street, to block up that part of the town, where several of the Rebels were said to have

1715: have escaped the night before. This street leads to a marsh or meadow, which joins to that part of the river Ribble, where there are two good fords, being the high road towards Liverpool; and, towards the end of the same street, there was another barricade with two pieces of cannon. General Carpenter therefore ordered Colonel Pitt to post his two squadrons on that marsh; and going back to the end of the town, he ordered communication to be made for the troops to assist each other in case of a fall. The Rebels, being thus invested on all sides, and being now sensible, though too late, of their condition, began to consider what was to be done. The Highlanders were for sallying out upon the King's forces, and dying, as they called it, like men of honour, sword in hand; but they were over-ruled, and not allowed to stir. Nor was the motion communicated to the whole body; but General Forster (prevailed upon by Lord Widdrington, Colonel Oxburgh, and some few others,) resolved upon a capitulation, flattering themselves with obtaining good terms from the King's Officers. Colonel Oxburgh, pretending acquaintance with some of them, made an offer to go out, and treat of a surrender. Accordingly, he went with a trumpet to General Willes, and offering to lay down their arms, and submit themselves, hoped he would recommend them to the King's mercy. The General told the Colonel he would not treat with Rebels; for they had killed several of the King's subjects, and they must expect to undergo the same fate. The Colonel said, as the General was a man of honour, and an officer, he hoped he would shew mercy to people, who were willing to submit. The General replied, All he would do for them, was, that, if they laid down their arms, and submitted prisoners at discretion, he would prevent the soldiers from cutting them in pieces till he had farther orders; and he would give them but an hour to consider of it. Colonel Oxburgh returned into the town, to acquaint Mr. Forster with this; and, before the hour was expired, there came out Mr. Dalziel, brother to the Earl of Carnwarth, who wanted terms for the Scots. The General's answer was, that he would not treat with Rebels, nor give them any other terms than what he had before offered them. Upon which the General was desired to grant farther time till seven o'clock next day, to consult the best method of delivering themselves up. The General agreed to grant them the time desired, provided they threw them up no new intrenchments in the streets, nor suffered any of their people to escape, and sent out the chief of the English and Scots as hostages for the performance. The General sent in Colonel Cotton to bring them out, who accordingly brought out the Earl of Derwentwater and Brigadier Mackintosh. The next day, about seven in the morning, Mr. Forster sent out to let the General know, that they were willing to give up themselves prisoners at discretion, as he had demanded. Brigadier Mackintosh, being present when this message was brought, said, He could not answer, that the Scots would surrender in that manner; for that they were people of desperate fortunes; and he had been a soldier himself, and knew what it was to be a prisoner at discretion. Upon this the General said, 'Go back to your people again; and I will attack the town, and the consequence will be, I will not spare a man of you.' The Brigadier went back, but came running out immediately again, and said, 'The Lord Kennemure, and the rest of the Noblemen, with his brother, would surrender in like manner with the English.'

General Carpenter entered one side of the town, and General Willes the other, with all their troops, with trumpets sounding, drums beating, and colours displayed. They both met in the middle of the town, where the Highlanders were drawn up under arms. The Noblemen and Gentlemen were first secured in several inns, and the Highlanders then laid down their arms in the place where they were standing; and they were next secured under a sufficient guard.

General Carpenter, finding the place too narrow to contain all the horse that was with him, sent part of them to Wigan the same day, and went away himself the next, leaving General Willes to command in his absence. Nov. 14.

Mr. Forster was by most people blamed for the surrender, without obtaining better terms for those, whom he had drawn into this enterprize. His want of skill was acknowledged on all hands, and this was what he could be least blamed for, since he was made General, as the only Protestant of note of the party. But, though he was nominal General, he depended mostly upon the conduct of Colonel Oxburgh, who had gained in foreign Service, the reputation of an experienced Officer. Others did not scruple to charge Mr. Forster with treachery as well as want of capacity, and pretend to say, that, if the King's General had not been sure of him beforehand, he would have granted more generous terms to the Rebels; and they bring his escape out of Newgate, as a proof of this surmise; supposing that a prisoner of his distinction would have been better looked after, if the Government had not been under an obligation to connive at his escape. But there seems to be little ground for such a suspicion, especially as the Pretender himself did not credit it, but held Mr. Forster afterwards in great esteem and confidence.

In the attack upon Preston, Brigadier Honeywood received a contusion on the shoulder, by a musket-shot, and Major Bland a slight one in the arm; and his horse was shot through the neck. There were killed at Brigadier Honeywood's attack, two Captains, one Ensign, and twenty-eight private soldiers; wounded, Lord Forrester, Major Lawson, two Captains, one Lieutenant, four Ensigns, and fifty private men. At Brigadier Dormer's attack there were nine men killed; wounded, the Brigadier, one Captain, one Lieutenant, one Cornet, and thirty-nine men (1).

Upon the very day, the Rebels agreed to surrender themselves at Preston, was fought the battle of Dumblain. The Earl of Mar, being now joined by all the power he could expect from the Earl of Seafort, and all his Northern Clans, and by the troops under General Gordon, thought himself strong enough to put his design in execution of passing the Forth, joining his Southern friends, and marching into England. To this purpose he summoned a general Council of war, where all their measures were concerted for this enterprize. Accordingly, he left Colonel Balfour Governor of the town of Perth with a guard sufficient; and, being furnished with provisions, artillery, and all other necessaries for a long march; he set out on the 10th of November, for Auchterardre, there to draw his army together, of which he made a general review that day at that place, and rested the 11th.

The Duke of Argyle, having intelligence of the motion of the enemy, was at no uncertainty what to do. He knew, if he was to dispute their passage over the Forth at the heads of that river, his horse on which he placed his whole dependance, would be of no service to him in that place. He chose therefore to engage the Earl on the grounds about Dumblain, where he might employ all his forces (1). He likewise had intelligence, that on the 12th at night the enemy designed to incamp at Dum- blain. Therefore, judging it of importance to possess that place, on the 12th in the forenoon he ordered his whole army to pass the river at Stirling Bridge, and incamped that night with his left at Dumblain, and his right towards Sheriff-Moor. The enemy advanced the same night within two miles of the Royal army; and having received intelligence, that the Duke with his whole army was in possession of Dumblain, they drew up in order of battle, and remained in that posture under arms till break of day.

On the 13th in the morning both armies were in motion, and the Duke of Argyle advanced to a rising ground, to take a view of the Rebel-army, which he could easily discern, in full march towards him. But another hill on his left intercepted his view of the whole extent of their left wing; for which reason it was impossible for him to guess at the true extent of their line, or how far they out-flanked him.

The Duke's army amounting to three thousand five hundred men, of which one thousand two hundred were dragoons, was drawn up upon the heights above Dumblain to the North-east of that place, which lay about a mile and a half from his left, and a wet boggy morass, called Sheriff-Moor, on his right.

The order of the Royal army was thus: The first line was composed of six battalions of foot in the centre, with three squadrons of dragoons upon

The Earl of Nithsdale, The Lord Nairn,
The Earl of Winton, The Master of Nairn,
The Earl of Carnwarth, Lord Charles Murray,
The Lord Viscount Ken- Major Basil Hamilton, mure, George Seton of Barne,

(1) On the 23d of October, the Duke of Argyle had notice that a party of the Rebels, consisting of two hundred foot and a hundred horse, were marching by Castle-Campbell towards Dunferling. Upon this intelligence, his Grace immediately sent off a detachment of dragoons, under the command of Colonel Cathcart, who came up with the Rebels the 24th, at five o'clock in the morning; and, after having killed

and

1715. upon the right and left. The second line was composed of two battalions of foot, and two squadrons of dragoons on each wing. The Duke commanded the right; General Wilham the left; and Major-General Wightman the main battle or centre.

The Earl of Mar's army, amounting to about nine thousand men, were drawn up in the following order: The first line was composed of ten battalions of foot, consisting of the Clans commanded by the Captain of Clanronald, Glen-gary, Sir John Maclean, and Campbell of Glen-Lyon on the right; there were three squadrons of horse, the Stirling Squadron, which carried the Pretender's standard, and two of the Marquiss of Huntley's. On the left were drawn up the Perthshire and Fife-shire squadrons. The centre of the second line was composed of three battalions of the Earl of Seaforth's, two battalions of the Marquiss of Huntley's, the battalions of the Earl of Pannure, Marquiss of Tullibardine, Lord Drummond and Strowan, all commanded by their respective Chiefs, except that of Drummond, commanded by the Viscount of Strathallan and Legie-Almond. The Earl Marischal's Squadron was on the right, and that of Angus on the left.

The Earl of Mar, who knew that his number far exceeded the Duke's, extended his lines as far as possible, with a design to take him in flank, and marched up to him in this disposition.

The Duke of Argyle, who till now supposed that the morals of Sheriff-Moor was unpassable, saw, that the two or three nights frost had made it capable of bearing; and the Rebels coming down the Moor with intent to flank him, having their right much extended beyond the point of his left; he found himself obliged to alter the disposition of his front, to prevent his being surrounded; which, on account of the scarcity of General Officers, was not done so expeditiously, as to be all formed again before the Rebels begun the attack.

The left wing of the Duke's small army fell in with the centre of theirs, which consisted, especially the first line, of the flower of the Rebel army.

They begun the action by a general discharge of their fire-arms, and received the first fire of the Royal troops without shrinking; but the Captain of Clanronald, who led them on in chief, was killed, which had like to have struck a damp upon them. But Glen-gary, who succeeded him, starting from the lines, waved his bonnet, and cried three or four times Revenge, which so animated the men, that they followed him close up to the muzzles of the muskets, pushed aside the bayonets with their targets, and with their broad swords did great execution.

1715. Duke's centre, behaved gallantly, and made all the resistance they could; but, being unacquainted with this way of fighting, they were forced to give ground, fell in among the horse, and helped the enemy to put them in confusion; so that a total rout of that wing of the Royal army ensued. General Wilham, with some of the horse, riding full speed to Stirling, gave out that all was lost; but the General was mistaken in that, as well as in the opinion he formed of the men he run from that morning before the engagement.

Upon the right wing of the King's army, the Duke of Argyle commanded in person, and at the head of Stair's and Evans's dragoons, attacked the enemy's left, consisting chiefly of horse, with such intrepidity, that, notwithstanding the Rebels shewed they wanted neither courage nor inclination to stand, yet were obliged to give way, and were put into confusion. The Duke pursued them towards the river Allen, which he was forced to do, in regard that, tho' the distance is not above two miles, yet in that space they attempted to rally again above ten times; and, whenever the ground afforded them any advantage, endeavoured to make a full stop; so that the Duke having to do with troops of that disposition, who likewise out-numbered him, was obliged to follow his blow, lest he should have lost the advantage he had gained. Nor was it in his power to succour the left, the rout of that wing happening so suddenly, and the Officer, who commanded, leaving the field, almost at the first fire of the Rebels, there was no opportunity to rally the broken troops a second time.

Brigadier Wightman followed close after the Duke with three battalions of foot, and ran a very great risque of faring in the same manner with the rest, if the Rebels had but had common prudence; for, no sooner their right understood the disaster of their left, than they formed again, and returned back to the field, following close on the rear of Wightman's battalions, to the number of five thousand. Some say, that body was led on by General Gordon, others by General Hamilton, others by both; and others, (and indeed with more probability) say, they were headed by Glen-gary; and that he, upon being ordered to attack these battalions, returned for answer, That the Clans had done enough; and that he would not hazard them to do other people's work, (meaning the horse) and remained upon a hill, where he seemed to form his men, as if for some new action.

The Duke, having by this time intirely broke their left, and pushed them over the river Allen, returned to the field; and Wightman, facing again to the right, took possession of some inclosures and mud walls, which would serve for a breast-and wounded several of them, took seventeen prisoners; amongst them the following Gentlemen:

Mr. Murray, brother to the Laird of Aberkeny.
Mr. Hay, son to Arboth.
Mr. Patrick Gordon, Arbuthnot's eldest son.
Alexander Forbes, son to Bystie.
William Robertson, brother to Donhill.
Mr. Keloch, a Physician.
Alexander Smith.
Mr. Alexander Gordon.

Francis Gordon of Craig.
Mr. Hamilton of Gibbston in Strabogie.
George Gordon of the Miln of Kinkardine.

The same evening Colonel Cathcart returned to the camp at Stirling with his prisoners. A few days after, a detachment sent by the Earl of May into Lorn, to intercept about four hundred of the Earl of Broadalbin's men, who were in motion to join the Rebels, having surrounded them, obliged them to separate and return to their several habitations.

(A) This

1715. a breast-work, in case they were attacked, as they judged by the countenance and number of the enemy they should. In this posture both armies stood looking at one another, but neither caring to engage; when towards evening the Duke drew off towards Dumblain, and the enemy towards Ardoch, without molesting one another (1).

The day after the engagement, the Duke of Argyle returned to the field of battle, and carried off the wounded, and four pieces of cannon left by the Rebels, to Stirling, where he retired with all his army.

The prisoners of most note taken by the King's forces were the Lord Stratballan, the Lairds

(1) This is the account of the Duke of Argyle's Historian; to which it may be proper to add those which were published by a kind of authority on all sides. The first is Colonel Harrison's account, who was sent express to the King by the Duke of Argyle:

The Duke of Argyle being informed, on the 12th, that the Rebels had come to Auchterardrie with their baggage, artillery, and a sufficient quantity of bread for a march of many days, found he was obliged either to engage them on the grounds near Dumblain, or decamp, and wait their coming to the head of the Forth. He chose the first on many accounts, and, amongst others, that the grounds near Dumblain were much more advantageous for his horse, than those at the head of the river: And besides this, by the frosts then beginning, the Forth might become passable in several places, which the small number of his troops did not enable him to guard sufficiently. He likewise received advice, that the 12th at night the Rebels designed to incamp at Dumblain; upon which, judging it of importance to prevent them by possessing that place, he marched the 12th in the forenoon, and incamped with his left at Dumblain, and his right towards Sheriff-Moor. The enemy stopped that night within two miles of Dumblain. Next morning his Grace, being informed by his advanced guard, that the Rebels were forming, rode to a rising ground, where he viewed the enemy distinctly, and found, as they pointed their march, they designed flit upon his flank. The Moor to our right, was the preceding night unpassable, and guarded us from being flanked on that side; but by the frost was become passable. His Grace therefore ordered his troops to stretch to the right in the following order: Three squadrons of dragoons upon the right and left in the front line, and six battalions of foot in the centre. The second line was composed of two battalions in the centre, and one squadron upon the right, and another upon the left, and a squadron of dragoons behind each wing of horse in the first line. As the right of our army came over against the left of the Rebels, which they had put to a morass, his Grace, finding they were not quite formed, gave orders immediately to fall on, and charged both their horse and foot. They received us very briskly, but, after some resistance, were broke through, and were pursued above two miles by five squadrons of dragoons, the squadron of volunteers, and five battalions of foot. When we came near the river Allan, by the vast numbers of Rebels we drove before us, we concluded it an intire rout, and resolved to pursue as long as we had day-light. The pursuing to the river Allan had taken up a long time, by reason of the frequent attempts they made to form in different places, which obliged us as oft to attack and break them, when they were in part passed, and others passing the Allan. Major-General Wightman, who commanded the five battalions of foot, sent to acquaint the Duke of Argyle that he could not discover what was become of our troops on the left; and that a considerable body of the Rebels, horse and foot, stood behind him. Upon that his Grace halted, formed his troops, and marched towards the hill, on which the Rebels had posted themselves.

Hereafter his Grace extended his right towards Dumblain, to give his left an opportunity of joining him. There we continued till it was late, and, not finding our left come up, his Grace marched slowly towards the ground he had formed on in the morning. So soon as it was dark, the Rebels, who continued undispersed on the top of the hill, moved to Ardoch. About an hour after our troops, which had been separated from the Duke of Argyle, joined his Grace. Our dragoons on the left, in the beginning of the action, charged some of the horse on the right, and carried off a standard; but at the same time the Rebels pressed so hard on our battalions on the left, that they were disordered, and obliged to fall in among the horse. The Rebels, by this means cut off the communication betwixt our left and the other body; and they being informed, that some of the Rebels were endeavouring to get to Stirling, the troops on our left retired beyond Dumblain, to possess themselves of the passes leading there. We have, as yet, no certain account of the numbers killed; but it is reckoned they may be about eight hundred, among whom there are several persons of distinction. The quality of the prisoners is not yet fully known; only that the Viscount of Stratballan, two Colonels, two Lieutenant-Colonels, one Major, nine Captains, besides Subalterns, are brought to Stirling. We have likewise carried off fourteen colours and standards, four pieces of cannon, tumbrils with ammunition, with all their bread-waggons. This victory was not obtained without the loss of some brave men on our side. The Earl of Forfar's wounds are so many, that his life is despaired of. The Earl of Illy, who came half an hour before the action, received two wounds, the one in his arm, the other in his side; but, the bullet being cut out of his side, it is hoped he is past danger. General Evans received a cut in his head. Colonel Hawley was shot through the body, but there is hopes of his recovery. Colonel Lawrence is taken. Colonel Hummers and Captain Armstrong, Aid de Camp to the Duke of Argyle, are killed. The courage of the King's troops was never keener than on this occasion, who, though the Rebels were three times their number, yet attacked and pursued them with all the resolution imaginable. The conduct and bravery of the Generals and inferior Officers contributed much to this success; but, above all, the great example of the Duke of Argyle, whose presence not only gave spirit to the action, but gained success as often as he led on. The troop of horse Volunteers, which consisted of Noblemen and Gentlemen of distinction, shewed their quality by the gallantry of their behaviour; in a particular manner the Duke of Roxburgh, the Lords Rathes, Haddington, Lauderdale, Loudoun, Belhaven, and Sir John Shaw.

Major-General Wightman's account was as follows:

Stirling, Nov. 14, 1715, at eleven at night.

'Last Friday I arrived from Edinburgh, where I had finished all the works and barricadoes, that I had orders to do for the security of that town; and, as soon as I came to his Grace the Duke of Argyle, he told me he was glad to see me, and that, as he intended to make a march towards the enemy the next morning, he had sent an express to Edinburgh for me. Accordingly, on Saturday the 12th instant our whole army marched over the bridge of Stirling towards the enemy, who lay at a place called Ardoch, about seven miles from this place; and in the evening our army came within three miles of the enemy's camp. We lay all that night on our arms, and the next morning, being Sunday, I went with his Grace where our advanced guard was posted, and had a plain view of the Rebels army all drawn up in line of battle, which consisted of nine thousand one hundred men. They seemed to make a motion towards us; upon which the Duke ordered me immediately back to put our men in order; and soon after his Grace ordered them to march to the top of a hill against the enemy: But before all, or not above half of our army was formed in line of battle, the 1715. Lairds Barrowfield, Logie Drummond, Mr. Murray of Auchtertyre, the Viscount of Strathallan's brother, Mr. Drummond of Drumquhany, Mr. Ro's, son to the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, Colonel Mackenzie of Keldin, &c. with several Captains, subaltern Officers, and private

Men, amounting in all to the number of about eighty. 1715.

The Earl of Forfar, the Laird of Glenkindy, and Lieutenant-Colonel Lawrence, were all the men of note, who were mentioned to be taken prisoners by the Rebels, who took likewise several enemy attacked us. The right of their line, which lay in a hollow way, vastly outwinged us, which was not perceived by us, nor possible for us to know it, the enemy having possession of the brow of the hill; but the left of their army was very plain to our view, the moment we got to the top of the hill. Not half our men were come up, or could form. The enemy, that were within little more than pistol-shot, began the attack with all their left upon our right. I had the command of the foot; the enemy were Highlanders, and, as it is their custom, gave us fire, and a great many came up to our noses sword in hand; But the horse on our right, with the constant fire of the platoons of foot, soon put the left of theirs to the rout; the Duke of Argyle pursuing, as he thought, the main of their army, which he drove before him above a mile and a half over a river. As I marched after him as fast as I could with a little above three regiments of foot, I heard great firing on our left, and sent my Aid de Camp to see the occasion of it, and found, that the right of the enemy's army, that lay in the hollow way, and were superior to that part of the army, which we had beaten, was fallen upon our left with all the fury imaginable; and as our men were not formed, they cut off just the half of our foot, and the squadrons on our left. The Duke, who pursued the enemy very fast, was not apprised of this; and, as he had ordered me to march after him as fast as I could, I was obliged to slacken my march, and send to his Grace, to inform him of what had happened. I kept what foot I had in perfect order, not knowing but my rear might soon be attacked by the enemy, that had beat our left, which proved to be the flower of our army. At last when the Duke had put to flight that part of the Rebel army he was engaged with, he came back to me, and could not have imagined to see such an army as was behind us, being three times our number; but, as I had kept that part of our foot, which first engaged, in very good order, his Grace joined me with five squadrons of dragoons, and we put the best face on the matter, to the right about, and so marched to the enemy, who had defeated all the left of our army. If they had had either courage or conduct, they might have intirely destroyed my body of foot; but it pleased God to the contrary. I am apt to conjecture their spirits were not a little damped by having been witnesses some hours before of the firm behaviour of my foot, and thought it hardly possible to break us. We marched in a line of battle till we came within half a mile of the enemy, and found them ranged on the top of a hill, on very advantageous ground, and above four thousand in number. We posted ourselves at the bottom of the hill, having the advantage of ground, where their horse could not well attack us; for we had the convenience of some earth walls or ditches about breast high, and as evening grew on, we inclined with our right towards the town of Dumblain, in all the order that was possible. The enemy behaved like civil Gentlemen, and let us do what we pleased; so that we passed the bridge of Dumblain, posted ourselves very securely, and lay on our arms all night. This morning we went with a body of dragoons to the field of battle, brought off the wounded there, and came to this town in the evening. General Webb's late regiment, now Morison's, is one of the unfortunate regiments that was not formed, and suffered most. Major Hammer is killed, with young Hillary, and many other Officers. General Evans and I had the good fortune to be on the right wing with the Duke. General Evans had his horse shot dead under him, and escaped very narrowly as well as myself.

P. S. Our whole army did not consist of above one thousand dragoons, and two thousand five hundred foot; and but a little more than half of them engaged. However I must do the enemy that justice to say, I never saw regular troops more exactly drawn up in line of battle, and that in a moment; and their Officers behaved with all the gallantry imaginable. All I can say is, it will be of the last danger to the Government if we have not force to destroy them soon. The loss on both sides I leave for another time, when we have a more exact account.

The following account (given by the Earl of Mar or his party, of the engagement on Sheriff-Moor near Dumblain, Nov. 13, 1715, was published by Mr. Frederick, the Pretender's Printer at Perth:

There being various and different reports industriously spread abroad, to cover the victory obtained by the King's army over the enemy, the best way to set it in a clear light, is to narrate the true matter of fact, and leave it to the world to judge impartially thereof.

Thursday, Nov. 10, the Earl of Mar reviewed the army at Auchterarder. Friday 11, rested.

Saturday 12, the Earl of Mar ordered Lieutenant-General Gordon, and Brigadier Ogilvie, with three squadrons of the Marquis of Huntley, and the Master of Sinclair's five squadrons of horse, and all the Clans, to march and take possession of Dumblain, which was ordered to be done two days before, but was delayed by some interruptions: And all the rest of the army was ordered, at the same time to parade upon the Moor of Tullibardine very early, and to march after General Gordon. The Earl of Mar went to Drummond-Castle to meet with my Lord Broadalbin, and ordered General Hamilton to march the army. Upon the march, General Hamilton had intelligence of a body of the enemy's having taken possession of Dumblain; which account he sent immediately to the Earl of Mar. A little after General Hamilton had another express from General Gordon, who was then about two miles to the Westward of Ardoch, that he had intelligence of a great body of the enemy's being in Dumblain. Upon which General Hamilton drew up the army so, as the ground at the Roman camp near Ardoch would allow. A very little after the Earl of Mar came up to the army, and not hearing any more from Lieutenant-General Gordon, who was marched on, judged it to be only some small party of the enemy to disturb our march, ordered the guards to be posted, and the army to their quarters, with orders to assemble upon the parade any time of the night or day, upon the firing of three cannon. A little after the army was dismissed, the Earl of Mar had an account from Lieutenant-General Gordon, that he had certain intelligence of the Duke of Argyle's being at Dumblain with his whole army. Upon which the General was ordered to halt till the Earl should come up to him, and ordered the three guns to be fired; upon which the army formed immediately, and marched up to Lieutenant-General Gordon at Kinbuck, where the whole army lay under arms, with guards advanced from each squadron and battalion till break of day.

Sunday the 13th, the Earl of Mar gives orders for the whole army to form on the Moor, to the left of the road that leads to Dumblain, fronting to Dumblain. The general persons were ordered to their posts. The Stirling Squadron, with the King's standard, and two squadrons of the Marquis of Huntley's, formed the right of the first line of horse. All the Clans formed the right of the first line of foot. The Perthshire and Fifehire squadrons formed the left of the first line of horse; the Earl Marjoch's squadron on the right of the second line; three battalions of the Marquis of Seaforth's 1715. ral Captains and subaltern Officers; and, according to them, about two hundred private Men.

The number of the killed and wounded, on the side of the Rebels, is said to have amounted to eight hundred, and on the King's side to five

Seaforth's foot, two battalions of my Lord Huntley's, the Earl of Panmure's, the Marquis of Tullibardine's, the battalions of Drummond, commanded by the Viscount of Strathallan and Logie Almond, the battalion of Strowan, and the Angus squadron of horse, formed the second line. When the army was forming, we discovered some small number of the enemy on the height of the West end of the Sheriff-moor, which looks into Dumblain, from which place they had a full view of our army. The Earl of Mar called a Council of war, consisting of all the Noblemen, Gentlemen, General Officers, and Heads of the Clans, which was held in the front of the horse on the left, where it was voted to fight the enemy nemine contradicente. Upon which the Earl of Mar ordered the Earl Marischal Major-General of the horse, with his own squadron, and Sir Donald Macdonald's battalion, to march up to the height, where we saw the enemy, and dislodge them, and send an account of their motions and dispositions. No sooner the Earl Marischal began his march, but the enemy disappeared, and the Earl of Mar ordered the army to march up after them. By the other Generals orders the lines marched off the right, divided in the centre, and marched up the hill in four lines. After marching about a quarter of a mile, the Earl Marischal sent back an account, that they discovered the enemy forming their line very near him, to the South of the top of the hill: Upon which the army, particularly the horse, was ordered to march up very quickly, and form to the enemy; but, by the breaking of their lines in marching off, they fell in some confusion in the forming, and some of the second line jumbled into the first, on or near the left, and some of the horse formed near the centre; which seems to have been the occasion, that the enemy's few squadrons on the right were not routed as the rest.

The Earl of Mar placed himself at the head of the Clans, and finding the enemy only forming their line, thought fit to attack them in that posture. He sent Colonel William Clepham, Adjutant-General to the Marquis of Drummond, Lieutenant-General of the horse on the right, and to Lieutenant-General Gordon on the right of the right of the foot, and Major David Erskine, one of his Aids de Camp, to the left, with orders to march up and attack immediately: And upon their return, pulling off his hat, waved it with a huzza, and advanced to the front of the enemy's formed battalions: Upon which all the line to the right, being of the Clans, led on by Sir Donald Macdonald's brothers, Glenagary, Captain of Clanronald, Sir John Maclean, Glenco Campbell of Glenlyon, Colonel of Broadalbin's, and Brigadier Ogilvie of Boyme, with Colonel Gordon of Glenbucket, at the head of Huntley's battalions, made a most furious attack; so that in seven or eight minutes we could perceive neither the form of a squadron or battalion of the enemy before us. We drove the main body and left of the enemy in this manner for about half a mile, killing and taking prisoners all that we could overtake. The Earl of Mar endeavoured to stop our foot, and put them in some order to follow the enemy, which we saw making off in some small bodies from a little hill below, towards Dumblain, where the Earl of Mar resolved to follow them to complete the victory. When an account was brought him, that our left, and most of our second line, had given way, and the enemy was pursuing them down the back of the hill, and had taken our artillery, immediately the Earl of Mar gave orders for the horse to wheel; and having put the foot in order, as fast as could be, marched back with them. When he was again near the top of the hill, two squadrons of the enemy's Grey dragoons were perceived marching towards us. When they came near the top of the hill, and saw us advancing in order to attack them, they made much faster down the hill than they came up, and joined at the foot of the hill to a small squadron or two of the Black dragoons, and a small battalion of foot, which we judged had marched about the West end of the hill, and joined them. At first they again seemed to form on the low ground, and advanced towards us; but, when they saw us marching down the hill upon them, they fled very speedily to Dumblain. The Earl of Mar remained possessed of the field of battle, and our own artillery, and stood upon the ground till sunset; and then, considering that the army had no cover or victuals the night before, and none to be had nearer than Brace, Ardoch, and the adjacents, whereby his Lordship expected the left to rally, and the battalions of the Lord George Murray, Innesmyhe, Macpherson, and Macgregor, to join him, resolved to draw off the artillery, and march the army to that place, where were some provisions. There were two carriages the guns broke, which we left on the road. But these battalions did not join us till the next day afternoon, before which the enemy was returned to Stirling.

We took the Earl of Forfar, who was dangerously wounded, Colonel Lawrence, and ten or twelve Captains and Subalterns, and about two hundred Sergeants and private men, and the Laird of Glenkindy, one of the volunteers, four colours, several drums, and about fourteen or fifteen hundred stands of arms. We compute, that there lay killed in the field of battle about seven or eight hundred of the enemy: And this is certain, that there lay dead upon the field of battle above fifteen of the enemy to one of ours. Besides, the number of the wounded must be very great.

The prisoners taken by us were very civilly used, and none of them stripped. Some are allowed to return to Stirling upon their parole, and the Officers have the liberty of the town of Perth. The few prisoners, taken by the enemy on our left, were most of them stripped and wounded after taken. The Earl of Panmure being first of the prisoners wounded after taken, they having refused his parole, he was left in a village, and by the hasty retreat of the enemy, upon the approach of our army, was rescued by his brother and his servants, and carried off.

Monday 14, the Earl of Mar drew out the army early in the morning on the same field, at Ardoch, they were on the day before. About eleven o'clock, we perceived some squadrons of the enemy on the top of the hill near the field of battle, which marched over the top of the hill, and a little after we had an account of their marching to Stirling. Upon which the Earl of Mar marched back with his army, who continued about Auchterardire.

Tuesday 15, rested. Wednesday 16, the Earl of Mar left General Hamilton with the horse to canton about Duplin, and Lieutenant-General Gordon with the Clans, and the rest of the foot about Forgan and adjacents, and went into Perth himself to order provisions for the army; the want of which was the reason of his returning to Perth.

Thursday 17, the Earl of Mar ordered General Hamilton to march with the horse, and some of the foot, to Perth, and Lieutenant-General Gordon with the Clans, to canton about that place.

After writing the former Narrative, we have account from Stirling, that the enemy lost twelve hundred men; and, after inquiry, we cannot find above sixty of our men in all killed; among whom were the Earl of Strathmore, and the Captain of Clanronald, both very much lamented. Auchterhouse is missing. Very few of our men are wounded.

1715. five hundred; but they never agreed in the accounts of their several losses (1).

Passen.

It was reported, that Mr. Drummond, an Officer in the Duke of Argyle's army, went to Perth under the pretence of being a deserter, and was made Aid de Camp to the Lord Drummond; and at the battle of Dumbtain he attended the Earl of Mar to receive his orders. When the Earl thought that his right wing was like to defeat the Duke of Argyle's left, he dispatched this Mr. Drummond to General Hamilton (who commanded the left of the Earl of Mar's army) with orders to attack the enemy briskly, since he was like to have the advantage on the right. But Mr. Drummond, instead of delivering that order, gave the direct contrary orders to General Hamilton, and told him, that the Earl of Mar was worsted on the right, and desired him to retire with all haste with as good order as possible. Upon which General Hamilton gave order to halt, which was obeyed. Then, the right of the Duke of Argyle's army approaching them, most part of them gave way without firing a gun; and those that stood were chiefly Gentlemen and Officers, who were so galled by the Duke of Argyle's right wing, that many of them were killed on the spot, and others taken prisoners. And it is said, Mr. Drummond, after he gave the abovementioned orders to General Hamilton, deserted to the Duke of Argyle's side. But this is only report.

There was another thing very observable that day; Mr. Robert Roy Macgregor, alias Campbell, a Gentleman eminent formerly for his bravery and courage, was with his men very near the Earl of Mar's army; and being desired by a Gentleman of his own party to go and assist his friends, he refused, and said, If they could not do it without him, they should not do it with him.

Inverness taken.

The engagement being over, news was brought to the Rebels of the surrender of the important pass of Inverness to the King, on the same day the battle was fought. This service was performed by Simon Fraser of Beaufort, Lord Lovat, chief of the Frazers, who had hitherto appeared in the interest of the Pretender. He came before Inverness on the 10th of November, where he was little expected in that manner, having been all his life of a contrary party. Sir John Mackenzie, who held the town as Governor for the Earl of Seaforth, had only three hundred men with him. With these he retired to a kind of Castle or Citadel, out of which he made his retreat on the 12th, and gave free possession to the king's new friends. The securing Inverness was a great blow to the Rebels in these parts, for by it a free communication was opened between the Earl of Sutherland and the Well-affected in the Counties adjacent to Inverness; and by this means the Earl of Seaforth and the Marquis of Huntly were not only drawn from the Rebel-army to defend their own territories, but were induced soon after to make their submission; and a good number of the Frazers, who followed Frazerdale before, upon the change of disposition in their Chief, the Lord Lovat left the Rebels, and increased the number of the King's friends under him.

The Marquis of Tullibardine left the Earl of Mar likewise, in order to cover his own Country; and many of the Clans, not seeing any likelihood of coming to an action, returned to their homes; it being the custom with these people never to remain long in the field, unless they are kept in constant employ.

On the 12th of November arrived at White. The Barball Captain Williamson, Aid de Camp to General Cadogan, with the news of the Barrier treaty being signed, bringing with him a duplicate of the treaty itself for the King to ratify. This treaty had been a long while in hand, and had met with many difficulties and delays; and it was very much doubted by some, whether the Imperial Court intended to conclude it at all.
But, after great disputes, it was at last finished at Antwerp, and signed by the Plenipotentiaries of the Emperor, the States-General, and the King of Great-Britain, by which the bounds of the Imperial Dominions in the Netherlands, as also of the States-General, were adjusted, and the Emperor became guarantee of the Succession of the House of Hanover to the Crown of Great-Britain, as the States-General were before.

Three days after, General Cadogan arrived at London from Flanders, and the same day three thousand of the Dutch Auxiliaries came up the Thames; and having refreshed themselves for some days in their quarters in the Tower Hamlets, and Southwark, marched by land towards Scotland, and the other three thousand were ordered to follow by sea. But the winds being contrary, they were forced to put into Harwich and other places. These troops not being used to sea, suffered so much, that they desired to land, and march wherever the King should think fit. Accordingly they were ordered also to proceed by land to Scotland; and their march, with that of the three thousand from London, was so regulated, as to arrive at Edinburgh about the same time.

A resolution being taken to dislodge the Rebels from Perth, General Cadogan, by the King's command, set out on the 29th of November for Scotland; and Brigadier Petit, with six engineers under him, was ordered to march thither

About the same time Colonel Stern's regiment arrived in the Thames from Ghent, where they had been garrisoned, and brought prisoners with them the Lord Clermont, son to the Earl of Middleton, who, in the year 1708, was taken prisoner in the Pretender's expedition to Scotland, and Mr. Murray, who by the name of Gordon, had lately been with the Earl of Mar, and who were both taken in Flanders. The Lord Clermont was committed to the Tower, and the other to Newgate.

With regard to the prisoners taken at Preston, some half-pay Officers being found amongst them, a Court-martial was held at Preston on the 28th of November, to try the following persons as deserters; the Lord Charles Murray, a younger son of the Duke of Atbol, Major Nairn, and Captain Lockhart, brother to Lockhart of Carnwarth, the Author of the Memoirs of Scotland. Nairn and Lockhart had belonged to Lord Mark Ker's regiment; Captain Shaftoe to Colonel Frank's; Ensign Erykine to Preston's; and Ensign Dalziel to Lord Orkney's. The five first were found guilty, and sentenced to be shot; but Dalziel was acquitted as to the crime of desertion, upon his proving, that he had resigned his Commission some time before he engaged in the Rebellion. The Lord Charles Murray was respited till further orders; but the others were, on the 4th of December, executed. About five hundred of the inferior prisoners were sent to the Castle of Chester, and a great number to Liver- pool; but all the Noblemen and most considerable persons amongst them were sent to London, where they arrived on the 9th of December, being guarded from Higbgate by Major-General Tatton, Lieutenant-Colonel of the first regiment of guards, at the head of a detachment of about three hundred foot guards, and a hundred and twenty horse-grenadier guards. They were brought so far by Brigadier Panton, Lieutenant-Colonel of Lumley's regiment of horse, under a guard of one hundred of his troopers. At Higbgate every one of the prisoners had his arms tied with a cord coming cross his back; and, thus pinioned, they were not allowed to hold the reins of the bridle, but had their horses led by a foot-foldier. In this posture they were ranged in four divisions, according to the four different prisons to which they were allotted; the Noblemen to the Tower; Forster and Mackintosh to Newgate; others to the Marshalsea; and others to the Fleet; each division being placed between a party of horse-grenadiers, and a platoon of foot-guards. In this manner General Tatton set out from Higbgate about noon, and proceeded to London through innumerable crowds of Spectators of all ages and conditions; his drums beating all the way a triumphal march. The same day two of them, Mr. Richard Gascoigne and Mr. Thomas Butler, one of the Duke of Ormond's natural sons, were carried to the Cock pit, where they were examined before a Committee of the Privy-Council, and afterwards committed to the custody of a Messenger. The next day, the Lord Kenmore, Mr. Forster, and Brigadier Mackintosh were carried to the Cock pit, where they were severally examined by a Committee of Council, and then remanded, the first to the Tower, and the others to Newgate. The same day likewise, Mr. Gascoigne and Mr. Butler were examined a second time, and then committed to Newgate. On Monday, the 12th of December, the Earls of Derwentwater, Nithdale, Carnwarth, and Wintoun, the Lord Widdrington, and some others of the principal Rebels, were also severally examined, and afterwards sent back to their respective prisons.

The Rebellion in England being totally suppressed, the King's household troops broke up their camp in Hyde Park, the day after the prisoners were brought to London, and the artillery was sent to the Tower. However, for the greater security of London and Westminster, an extraordinary horse-guard was placed in several inns between St. James's and Whitehall, with orders to patrol all night.

On the 22d of December, the Pretender landed at Peterhead in the North of Scotland, with only six Gentlemen in his retinue; among whom was the Marquis of Tinmouth, son to the Duke of Berwick. The Pretender had embarked at Dunkirk on board a small ship, which had formerly been a privateer of eight guns. The first night he lay at Peterhead; the second at Newburgh, a feat of the Earl Marischal's. He passed through Aberdeen incognito (he and all that were with him being in the habit of Sea-officers) to Fetterosse, the chief feat of the Earl Marischal. Here he was met by the Earl of Mar, the Earl Marischal, and about thirty Noblemen and Gentlemen of the first Quality, who had left Perth with a party of horse, on the first notice of his landing, which they received by an express from Peterhead. At this place he appeared in public, and, assuming his pretended Quality, permitted the Noblemen and Gentlemen to kiss his hand. Whilst he remained at Fetterosse, which was till the 27th, he formed a Court, appointing all the Officers of State and Household, and made some Peers, and several Knights. He was proclaimed with great solemnity before the door of the house, and then published his declaration*, dated at Commerce * See in Lorrain, on the 25th of October. It was p. 454. printed at Perth by Robert Freebairn, who styled himself Printer to his Majesty, and was sent to all the Magistrates, Ministers, and Justices of the Peace within the Rebel-quarters; many of whom, especially in the North, published it according to the order sent with it.

He is proclaimed, and his declaration published.

At Fetterosse, the Pretender received also the homage of his Ecclesiastical and Lay Episcopal Subjects of the Diocese of Aberdeen by addresses from each of them (1).

He goes to Scoon

During the Pretender's stay at Fetteresso, he was attacked by an aguish disorder; but he soon recovered, and, on the 2d of January, arrived at Briechen, where he continued two days; and, on the 3d, went and lay at Kinaird. The next day he arrived at Glames, and lay there that night. Next morning he made his public entry into Dundee, with the Earl of Mar on his right, and the Earl Marjiball on his left hand, being followed by about three hundred Gentlemen on horseback. At the desire of his friends he remained about an hour on horseback in the market-place, allowing the people to perform the ceremony of kissing his hand. He then went and dined at Stuart of Garantully's, where he lodged that night. Next day he left Dundee, and dined at Castle-Lyon, a seat of the Earl of Strathmore's, and lay that night at Sir David Tripplin's, and, on the 7th of January, arrived at the palace of Scoon, the ancient place of the Coronation of the Kings of Scotland, where he seemed resolved to stay till that ceremony was performed.

He makes his entry into Perth

On the 9th of January, about noon, he made his public entry on horseback into Perth, and reviewed some of the troops, that were drawn out on purpose. He expressed great satisfaction at the appearance of the men, and was much pleased with the Highland dress, which he had never seen before. In the evening he returned to Scoon, where he began to form a regular Council, and to perform several acts of State. He published six proclamations; for a general thanksgiving for his safe arrival; for praying for him in Churches; for the currency of all foreign coins; for summoning the meeting of the Convention of Estates; for ordering all fencible men, from sixteen to sixty, to repair to his Standard; and for his Coronation on the 23d of January. 1715.

On the 16th of that month, a grand Council was held, at which all the Chiefs of the Rebels were present. At the opening of it, the Pretender delivered himself in a set speech to this effect:

'I am now, on your repeated invitation, His speech come among you. No other argument need be to his used of the great confidence I place in your Council. loyalty and fidelity to me, which I entirely rely on. I believe you are already convinced of my good intentions to restore the ancient laws and liberties of this Kingdom: If not, I am still ready to confirm to you the assurance of doing all, that can give you satisfaction therein.

The great discouragements, which presented, were not sufficient to deter me from coming to put myself at the head of my faithful subjects, who were in arms for me, and whatsoever shall ensue, I shall leave them no room for complaint, that I have not done the utmost they could expect from me. Let those, who forget their duty, and are negligent of their own good, be answerable for the worst that may happen. For me, it will be no new thing, if I am unfortunate. My whole life, even from my cradle, has shewn a constant series of misfortunes; and I am prepared (if so it please God) to suffer the threats of my enemies, and yours. The preparations, which are making against us, will, I hope, quicken your resolution, and convince others, from whom I have assurances, that it is now no time to dispute what they have to do: If, otherwise, they shall by their remissness be unmindful of their own safety, I shall take it

mate your loyal subjects, our noble and generous patriots, to go on with that invincible courage and resolution, which they have hitherto so successfully exerted for the recovery of the rights of their King and Country, and to excite many others of your good subjects to join them, who only wanted this great encouragement.

We hope and pray, that God may open the eyes of such of your subjects, as malicious and self-designing men have industriously blinded with prejudices against your Majesty, as if the recovery of your just rights would ruin our Religion, Liberties, and Property, which by the overturning of these Rights have been highly incroached upon; and we are persuaded, that your Majesty's justice and goodness will settle and secure those just privileges, to the conviction of your most malicious enemies.

Almighty God has been pleased to train up your Majesty from your infancy in the School of the Cross, in which the Divine Grace inspires the mind with true wisdom and virtue, and guards it against those false blandishments, by which prosperity corrupts the heart. And as this School has sent forth the most illustrious Princes, as Moses, Joseph, and David; so we hope the same infinitely wise and good God designs to make your Majesty, not only a blessing to your own Kingdoms, and a true Father of them, but also a great instrument of the general peace and good of mankind.

Your Princely virtues are such, that, in the esteem of the best judges, you are worthy to wear a Crown, though you had not been born to it; which makes us confident, that it will be your Majesty's care to make your subjects a happy people, and so to secure them in their Religion, Liberties, and Property, as to leave no just ground of distrust, and to unite us all in true Christianity, according to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and the Practice of the Primitive Christians.

We adore the goodness of God, in preserving your Majesty amidst the many dangers, to which you have been exposed, notwithstanding the hellish contrivances formed against you, for encouraging assassins to murder your sacred person; a practice abhorred by the very Heathens. May the same merciful providence continue still to protect your Majesty, to prosper your arms, to turn the hearts of all the people towards you, to subdue those who resist your just pretensions, to establish you on the Throne of your ancestors, to grant you a long and happy reign, to bless you with a royal progeny, and at last with an immortal crown of glory. And as it has been, still is, and shall be our care, to infill into the minds of the people true principles of loyalty to your Majesty; so this is the earnest prayer of, &c.

The City of Aberdeen, who were mostly of the Episcopal Communion, followed the example of their Pastors, in the following address:

We your ever loyal and dutiful subjects, the Magistrates, Town-Council, and other your Majesty's loyal subjects, Citizens of Aberdeen, do heartily congratulate your arrival to this your native and hereditary Kingdom. Heaven very often enhances our blessings by disappointments, and your Majesty's safe arrival, after such a train of difficulties, and so many attempts, makes us not doubt but God is propitious to your just cause.

As your Majesty's arrival was seasonable, so it was surprising. We were happy, and we knew it not: We had the blessing we wished for, yet insensible till now, that your Majesty has been pleased to let us know, that we are the happiest, and, as so, we shall always endeavour to be the most loyal of, &c.

1715. as my greatest comfort, that I have acquitted myself of whatever can be expected from me. I recommend to you what is necessary to be done in the present conjuncture; and, next to God, rely on your Council and Resolution.

The Rebels

This speech was dispersed with great industry; but the Council soon came to a resolution to abandon the whole enterprize, the first opportunity they should have to do it decently. They were not in circumstances to stand the attack of the Royal army, which was now reinforced with six thousand Dutch: But it was necessary to conceal this resolution from their own people, till the proper measures were concerted to have them all dispersed with the greatest safety, without exposing them to the insults of the Royal army. Had the resolution been made public, it would have had this consequence, that the common people would be so dispirited, as not to be capable of taking care of their safety; and some of them perhaps might have had thoughts of revenging upon their Leaders the danger, in to which they had been drawn. For this reason the Council gave out, they resolved to fight the King's troops; and, accordingly, made all the preparation necessary for such an undertaking, as if they had really intended it.

Expresses were sent to the Earl of Seaforth, the Marquis of Huntley, and many others of their friends, to return speedily to the army at Perth. Their head-quarters were fortified in the best manner; and people of all ranks were zealous in promoting the work. Nothing was to be seen till the very day they abandoned the place, but the greatest industry in throwing up intrenchments, raising batteries, planting guns, with all the other preparations of war. The Pretender even issued out an order, for the burning of the village of Auchterardire, to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy (1).

According to this order, several towns, as Several Auchterardire, Blackford, Dunning, and Alutbell, villages burnt and other villages, were burnt to the ground; by which the poor inhabitants, being only old infirm men, women, and children (the rest being forced from their homes) were exposed to the severest season of the year, in one of the coldest winters that had been known for many ages. In the account published at Paris of the Pretender's conduct in Scotland, it is affirmed, that, upon his leaving that Kingdom, he had deposited a sum of money in the hands of General Gordon, for the use of the Sufferers by the execution of this order; which money was to be delivered by that General, with a letter from the Pretender to the Duke of Argyle. Whether this was published to take off the ill impression that order seemed to leave upon the minds of the people, or whether there was any truth either in that or the letter, depends only on the credit of the account written by the Earl of Mar at Paris (2).

During these transactions, the Duke of Argyle, in conjunction with the Lord Cadogan, took measures to dislodge the Rebels from Perth, and remove the Pretender from Scotland.

A number of the Rebels having possession of Brunt, the town of Brunt-Island, on the other side of the road of Leith, the Duke of Argyle ordered the men of war, then on duty in that road, to stand over, and throw some shot into the town. The Captain had thrown but few, when the Rebels abandoned the town, fearing as they said, the Captain, after his cannonading, would attempt

(1) The order was as follows:

James R.

'Whereas it is absolutely necessary for our service, and the public safety, that the enemy should be as much incommoded as possible, especially upon their march towards us, if they should attempt any thing against us or our forces; and seeing this can be by no means better effected than by destroying all the corn and forage, that can support them in their march, and burning the houses and villages, which may be necessary for quartering their enemy; which nevertheless it is our meaning should be only done in case of absolute necessity, concerning which we have given our full instructions to James Graham younger of Braco: These are therefore ordering and requiring you, how soon this order shall be transmitted to you by the hands of the said James Graham, forthwith, with the garrison under your command, to burn and destroy the village of Auchterardire, with all the houses, corn, and forage within the said town, so as they may be rendered intirely useless to the enemy; for the doing whereof this shall be to you, and all you shall employ in execution thereof, a sufficient warrant.

Given at our Court of Scots this seventeenth day of January, in the fifteenth year of our reign, 1715-16.

By his Majesty's command,

To Colonel Patrick Graham, or the commanding Officer for the time, of our garrison of Tullibardine,

M A R.

(2) This account at large was as follows:

S I R,

'You seem surprized at the sudden change our affairs here have taken, from what you expected by the accounts you had from some of our friends at Edinburgh, before our leaving Perth, and even after we were gone from thence. I will therefore, for your satisfaction, give you a true account of that whole matter.

It is plain enough, that it was our business to represent our affairs then to the public, to be in such a posture, as might encourage our friends every where, and discourage our enemies, and stop them from marching against us, until we were in a better condition to receive them; which we had reason to expect soon to be, by our friends joining us, as they daily promised to do, and until we should receive the money, arms, and ammunition we were every day expecting, as we had been for a long time.

But, that time being now over, I may freely own to you, and it is fit you should know, that a month before the Chevalier landed, the resolution was taken of abandoning Perth, as soon as the enemy should march against it. And, though this resolution was known to a good number in our army, yet the secret was so well kept, that it never came to the public; so that the enemy, believing that we should stand our ground, thought themselves obliged to delay their march for a long time, until they had made great preparations of artillery, &c. as if they had been going to besiege a fortified town: But, in reality, our condition was then such, as obliged us to take that resolution, having neither a sufficient number of men, ammunition, nor arms.

Upon the Chevalier's arrival we expected, that our friends would then have certainly joined us; both those, 1715. attempt to land; and their number was not sufficient to defend the place. Upon notice of the Rebels abandoning Brunt-Island, where they had left behind them six pieces of cannon, some arms, and a great quantity of provisions, a detachment of Scots and Dutch troops were sent over the Firth, to take possession of the town, under the command of Sir James Montgomery. Upon this the Rebels quitted all the towns on the North side of the Firth; by which means the navigation to and beyond Leith was not so much interrupted, as in the beginning of the winter.

There happened some skirmishes between the detachments sent to possess these towns, and some parties of the Rebels; but none of any consequence. The most remarkable skirmish was about the 2d of January, when the Earl of Rolles, with a good company of volunteers, and a detachment of fifty Dutch, attempted to possess themselves of the palace of Falkland, a royal foundation but now gone to decay. The Rebels, having intelligence of the Earl's design, threw a party of their men into the place, and sent another body to surround him in a village, near Falkland. The volunteers, to the number of thirty, found means to make their escape; but the Dutch foot were made prisoners.

To restrain the incursions of the enemy upon the Duke's new acquisitions on the coast of Fife, three battalions of Dutch foot were ordered to pass the Firth at the Queen's-Ferry, and take quarters about Innerkeithing, Dumferling, and the towns in that neighbourhood, which proved a sufficient check upon the Rebels during their stay at Perth.

About this time the Earl of Seaforth and the Marquis of Huntley had capitulated with the Earl of Sutherland, after many threatnings between them, which never came to blows. The Earl of Seaforth afterwards involved himself again in the Rebellion; but the Marquis of Huntley strictly observed the terms of his capitulation.

The Duke of Argyle had now got all the supplies he expected. The six thousand Dutch auxiliaries, under the command of Major-General Vanderbeck, had joined him; as Newton's and Stanhope's dragoons had likewise from England. But he was in great want of a train of artillery, which he had long expected from England, and which had been shipped for this service; but the stormy weather and easterly winds continuing, the Duke grew impatient of waiting any longer for them, and ordered General Cadogan to go to Berwick with a guard of five hundred men, and fifteen hundred carriage horses, to bring thence ten pieces of cannon and four mortars, with their carriages and ammunition, which, with fourteen pieces, that he had already with him, was thought a sufficient train for this expedition. The train being now ready, he was as much at a loss for gunners to manage it, having few or none in his army; but the fleet, on those, who had formerly been with us, and were gone home, and those, who before had given the Chevalier not being come, as the only reason of their not joining the army; and also that those, to whom the reducing of Inverness, the Lord Sutherland, and those with him, was committed, would have vigorously performed that service, and then have joined us; and we had no reason to doubt, but money, ammunition, and arms would immediately be sent after the Chevalier.

But, to our great misfortune, we were disappointed in all these our hopes, though never so well grounded in appearance.

The rigour of the season, and the great fall of the snow on the hills, kept in some measure the rest of the Highlanders from joining us. Most of those, who before had excused themselves upon the Chevalier's not being come, kept still at home, now that he was come, waiting perhaps to see how his affairs were like to succeed. Those employed for reducing of Inverness were so far from acting with vigour, that they made, what they called it, a cessation of arms with the enemy. Some gold was sent to us in Lingo's; but the ship, in which it came, was stranded, and the gold itself lost. Several ships came with Officers, but neither arms nor ammunition in any of them. So that our condition, after the Chevalier's arrival, was no ways bettered, except by the new life his presence gave to the small number we at that time had got together. Even in that weak condition, the Chevalier would gladly have maintained Perth, or ventured a battle. But when the enemy, with all their great preparations, and an army of above eight thousand effective regular troops were actually in march, and advanced near to the place, it was found impracticable to defend the town, and undesirable to enter into a battle with a small number of men, that were in it, for a great many reasons too long to be here mentioned. But in short we had not above four thousand, both horse and foot; and of these, for want of arms, and for other reasons, not above two thousand five hundred to be relied upon as good fighting men. The town is little better than an open village at any time; and at this the river on one side, and a kind of fosse or ditch on the other, were frozen up, so that it was easy to be entered on all quarters. The long continued frost had kept the mills from going; so that there was not above two days provisions in the town. The enemy being then in possession of the most part of Fife, where the coal-pits are, there were no coals to be got; and, the wood being scarce in the country, there happened to be almost no fuel at all. Besides this, the Highlanders are not used to defend towns; nor had they wherewithal to defend this.

On the other hand, to have gone out to fight the enemy, when there was no advantageous post or pass to be defended, had been exposing our men to visible destruction; the enemy being provided with every thing, and thrice our number of fighting men, might have surrounded us on all sides, and prevented all possibility of retreat. All this put us into an absolute necessity of leaving Perth, and retiring Northwards, which we did in good order, and came in two days to Montrose, and Briechin. Neither of these places are tenable, though we had been provided, as we were not, with a sufficient number of men, ammunition, and provisions. But, Montrose being a good harbour, where we expected our succours from abroad, we were unwilling to quit it, so long as we could remain safe in it. We thought indeed, that the enemy would have made a halt at Perth, and not have marched so quickly after us, as we soon found they did, they being within a few miles of us before we had certain intelligence of it, though great pains had been taken to be informed of their motions. The Earl of Pannure, not being recovered of the severe wounds he had received at the battle of Sheriff-Moor, was not in a condition to march along with the army, which otherwise he would have done; upon which the Chevalier advised him, as he passed Dundee, to endeavour to get off in the first ship he could find; and, by accident finding a little bark at Arbuthnot, went off in it for France.

Before this time several people had very seriously represented to the Chevalier the deplorable circumstance, in which his affairs now were on all sides; that, being overpowered in Scotland, no appearance of any rising in England, nor any news of the succours he expected from 1715. on board of which the train and ammunition had been shipped, arrived in the road of Leith on the 28th of January. Colonel Borgard, who commanded the Engineers and Gunners sent with these stores, arrived at Stirling on the 29th, so that now all things were ready for the intended attack of the enemy, which was resolved in a Council of war, notwithstanding the rigour of the season.

On the 2^d ft, two hundred dragoons were sent, under the command of General Guesf, to view the road, and discover some of the dispositions of the Rebels. This party, though only sent to reconnoitre, put the Rebels into the utmost confusion at Perth. Some country-people, whose fear magnified the number of the detachment, carried news to the town, that the Duke of Argyle and all the army was within a few hours march. This struck the whole Rebel army with the greatest consternation; and the panic continued, till parties, sent out as far as Tullibardine to view the country, returned with the report of the falshood of the rumour.

Colonel Guesf being returned, acquainted the Duke of Argyle, that the roads were so covered with snow, that it would be impossible for the army to pass, especially the artillery and heavy carriages, except the snow was removed; upon which several thousand people from the Country were summoned in to clear the roads.

On the 24th, the Duke and General Cadogan went out with a party to view the Country, and hasten the workmen employed in clearing the roads. This likewise alarmed some of the enemy's advanced posts, but did not, as the other, reach Perth.

The day before and that day it thawed suddenly; and the thaw was followed by a great fall of snow, which hindered the workmen employed in clearing the roads, who had now all their work to do over again, and rendered the designed march almost impracticable. This inclined most of the Generals to defer the march of the troops till the season was more moderate, none of them having seen a campaign in so cold a climate: But the Duke was resolute in the measures taken, especially as he had positive orders from above, to attack the Rebels without loss of time.

On the 26th, the Duke ordered two regiments of dragoons, and five hundred foot, to advance to Dumblain, with directions to post a strong party at the demolished bridge of Down.

On the 29th, the army began their march, and proceeded to Dumblain; the troops, which were there before, advancing at the same time, to the old Castle of Bravo, expecting some resistance, but they found it abandoned. The next morning the same party, with two pieces of cannon advanced upon the road to Tullibardine, to cover the workmen, who were clearing the way, and to prevent their being insulted by the garrison of Tullibardine. That day the army marched to Auchterardrie; that is, to the place where from abroad, he had no course at present to take, that was consistent with what he owed to his people in general, to those who had taken arms for him in particular, and to himself upon their account, but by retiring beyond sea, to preserve himself for a better occasion of asserting his own right, and restoring them to their ancient liberties.

It was indeed hard to bring him to think of this; but those about him found it now high time to press the matter more than ever, the enemy being within three miles upon their march towards us. They therefore again represented to him the impossibility of making a stand any where, till they should come to the most inaccessible places of the mountains, where in that season of the year, there being so much snow on the ground, there could be no subsistence for any body of men together, and where no succour could come to them. That, when his small army was divided in lesser bodies, they could not avoid being cut off by the enemies troops, who would then be master of all the Low Countries, and especially by the garrisons they had in Inverlochy and Inverness, which they would reinforce. That, as long as they knew he was in the Kingdom, they would pursue him, even with the hazard of their whole army, his person being the chief object of their pursuit, as his destruction was the only thing, that could secure their usurpation; whereas, if he were gone off, they would not pursue with that eagerness, nor would they find their account in harassing their army in the snow, and excessive cold of the mountains, to pursue the scattered remains of the loyal party, who might skulk in the hills, till providence should open a way for their relief, or that they should obtain terms from the Government. That his person being with them would defeat even these faint hopes; and that in short, whilst he was in the Kingdom, they could never expect any terms or capitulation but by abandoning him, or giving him up; which rather than ever consent to, they would be all to the last man cut in pieces.

Though the Chevalier was still extremely unwilling to leave his loyal people, who had sacrificed their all with so much zeal and alacrity for his service; yet when he considered, that, as things then stood, his presence, far from being a help and support to them, would rather be an occasion of hastening their ruin, he was sensibly touched to find himself, for their sakes, under a necessity of leaving them; There was no answering their reasons, nor any time to be lost, the danger increasing every moment. He therefore at last told them, that he was sorry to find himself obliged to consent to what they desired of him; and I dare say, no consent, he ever gave, was so uneasy to him as this was.

In the mean time fresh alarms coming of the enemies approaching, orders were given for the army's marching towards Aberdeen, and the resolution was taken for his going off in the evening. It happened very providentially, that there was just ready in the harbour a small ship that had been designed to carry a Gentleman he was then to have sent to a foreign Court. This ship was now pitched upon to transport him: She was but a small one, and could carry but a few passengers; and therefore, to avoid confusion, he himself thought fit to name those, who should attend him. The Earl of Mar, who was the first named, made difficulty, and begged he might be left behind; but the Chevalier being positive for his going, and telling him, that in a great measure there were the same reasons for his going as for his own; that his friends would more easily get terms without him than with him; and that, as things now stood, he could be no longer of any use to them in that Country, he submitted.

The Chevalier likewise ordered the Marquis of Drummond to go along with him. This Lord was then lame by a fall from his horse, and not in a condition to follow the army, and was one of the four with the Earl of Mar, Lord Tullibardine, and Lord Lithgow, against whom there was then a bill of attainder passing. The Chevalier would have willingly carried with him the two other Lords; but it happened, that they were both then at a distance; Lord Tullibardine at Briechin with a part of the foot, and Lord Lithgow at Bervil with the horse. Lord Marjibah, Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, was also ordered to go, though he seemed very desirous to stay, and share in the fate of 1715. where it stood, for the Rebels had burnt the village to the ground, so that the men were obliged to lie in the open air in as violent a cold night, as ever was known in those parts. The next morning early they marched to Tullibardine, the garrison of which place had retired, except fifty men, who were made prisoners. Here the Duke of Argyle received intelligence, that the Pretender and his army had abandoned Perth the day before, and retired towards Dundee. This was very agreeable news to the whole army, who had lain in the snow for two nights successively. But, as it was four o'clock in the afternoon before the Duke had the intelligence, they could not reach Perth that night. However the Duke took with him four squadrons of dragoons, and two battalions of foot, and marched that evening to take possession of the town, where he arrived about two o'clock in the morning with the horse; but the foot, through the length and deepness of the road, did not arrive till ten the next morning, very much harassed by their march. Had the Rebels had any intelligence, that the Duke was detached with so small an attendance, from the main of the army, he might have been in some hazard; for the gros of the army did not arrive at Perth from Tullibardine till late in the evening, the 1st of February.

The Pretender and his party had now got two days march before the Royal army. It was necessary therefore to pursue them without intermission, that they might have no rest. Accordingly the 2d of February the Duke of Argyle continued his pursuit at the head of six squadrons, two battalions, and eight hundred detached foot; lay that night at Erris, and on the 3d arrived at Dundee, though the main army, which made more easy marches, did not come up till the 4th. Here the Duke's intelligence made him judge, that the Rebel army, which had now proceeded to Montrose, would make some stop there, as that place was more tenable than Perth, and a sea-port where they might expect supplies from abroad. Therefore he resolved not to allow them to fortify themselves, but sent two detachments to Montrose by two different roads: Two thousand foot and fifty dragoons went by the way of Aberbrothick, and three hundred more, and fifty dragoons, marched by the way of Briecben; but the snow was so deep, that the march proved very tedious to those detachments, since they were obliged to summon in the Country-people, to clear the roads. On the 5th, the whole army marched; the Duke with the cavalry, and train, by the road of Briecben, and the infantry with General Cadogan by the way of Aberbrothick.

In this day's march, they had intelligence that the Pretender had made his escape, both from his own people and the King's army, the morning his countrymen. Lieutenant-General Sheldon, Vice-Chamberlain, had the same orders; as had also Colonel Clepham, who had left the enemy. Lord Edward Drummond, who was also Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, happened to be with Lord Timneath, at five miles distance, and so could not go with the Chevalier, as he intended they both should; but he wrote to them to follow in a small ship, that was then in the harbour; but the master of this ship was frightened, and went away without carrying any body.

The Chevalier then ordered a Commission to be drawn for Lieutenant-General Gordon to command in chief, with all necessary power inserted; and particularly one, to treat and capitulate with the enemy. He left also the said General the reasons of his leaving this Kingdom, and all the money that was in the Paymaster's hands, or that he had himself (save a small sum for defraying his own and company's charges) and left orders for a sum of money (if there should be any left after paying the army) to be given to the poor people, who suffered by the burning of Auchterardre, and some villages about it, which had been thought necessary to be done, to prevent the enemy's march, though very much against his inclination; which made him delay from time to time, until the enemy was actually on their march; and the Chevalier left a letter with General Gordon for my Lord Argyle to be delivered when the said money should be given, desiring, that it should be distributed accordingly.

About nine o'clock the Chevalier went on board the ship, which was about a mile at sea. Lord Marischal and Colonel Clepham came some time after to the shore; but by accident found no boat, and so could not go off; though, as the boat-man, who carried the Chevalier, assured us, he staid for them till near eleven o'clock, but could stay no longer because of the nine men of war, that were cruising thereabouts; and it was great good luck, that the ship having staid so long, got out of their reach before it was day-light.

As soon as the Chevalier parted, we marched, and we are now a good way advanced towards the Highlands; for there was no stand could be made at Aberdeen; nor could we think of going to Inverness, that being still in the enemies hands. Some went to Peter- head, and thought to have got off in a ship they found there; but we hear they were soon forced back by a man of war: So it is like they may join us again, if they are not intercepted by the enemy.

I must add here one thing, which however incredible it may appear, is, to our cost, but too true; and that is, that, from the time the Earl of Mar set up the Chevalier's standard to this day, we never received from abroad the least supply of arms and ammunition of any kind; though it was notorious in itself, and well known, both to friends and enemies, that this was what from the beginning we mainly wanted; and, as such, it was insisted upon by the Earl of Mar, in all the letters he writ, and by all the messengers he sent to the other side. Several ships came with officers, and some small sums of money, after the battle of Sheriff-moor; and three or four ships more came after the Chevalier's arrival. But, even when he was with us in person, no powder was sent, nor a sword nor musket; so that, when we marched from Perth, we had not three hundred weight of powder for the whole army, nor should we have wanted men, had we had arms to put into their hands. How the main point came to be so intirely neglected by those, who had the management of the Chevalier's affairs in their hands, on the other side, is yet a mystery to us: And it surprizes us the more, that those, who came lately over, assure us, that both arms and ammunition might have been gotten from private hands, without having the obligation to any foreign Prince. So whether this unaccountable omission proceeded from mere negligence, want of money, or from a jealousy in some, who were perhaps unwilling that we should be the instruments of this great work, and that it should succeed in our hands, or some other by-reasons, is what time may discover.

Thus I have given you true matter of fact, and a sincere account of our unfortunate condition. Whatever may now be our fate, we have still one solid ground of comfort, that the Chevalier hath (as we hope) got safe out of the reach of his enemies; for in the safety of his person is all our hopes of relief; and we look on him as the instrument referred by God, (and he now seems the only one in the ordinary course 1715. ing before, on board a French ship, called the Maria-Teresa of St. Malo, then lying in the road of Montrose.

It has been already observed, that the abandoning Perth, and dispersing the Rebel army as soon as they could get out of the reach of the King's army, had been resolved ever since, if not before, the Pretender's arrival in Scotland; but that it was necessary to conceal this design from the gros of the army, as well as that the Pretender, and some of the chief Leaders of this undertaking, intended to make their escape to France the first opportunity. However, the army's abandoning Perth so precipitately, as to leave their waggons and artillery behind them, and then pointing their march to the sea-shore, especially to Montrose, where it was known that several French ships lay, raised jealousies in the heads of the army of what was really their intent, and produced considerable murmurings, which the Earl of Mar could not appease, but by countenancing the march from Montrose to Aberdeen, where he gave out they designed to make a stand. The army was made to believe that the Pretender was to go along with them; and, to amuse them, his horses and ordinary body-guard were drawn up before the door of the house where he lodged. This removing all jealousy, the army became tractable again, and proceeded on their march. But the Pretender, instead of going on with them, left his attendance in their usual waiting, slipped out of a back-door, and went on foot to the Earl of Mar's quarters, and from thence to the water-side, where a boat waited for them; and carried them on board with only three servants. The same boat returned, and took in the Earl of Melfort, the Lord Drummond, Lieutenant-General Buckley, Sheldon, and others, to the number of seventeen in all, being persons of the first rank, either in his household or army, or originally privy to his design.

When they were all on board, the vessel set sail, steering to the coast of Norway, to keep clear of the English cruisers. They had a fresh gale at West South West, and made land the next evening; and, coasting along the German and Dutch shores, they arrived in five days at Gravelin in France; and the same ship returned in twelve days from her first setting out, both to give intelligence of the Pretender's safe landing, and to take in another party of Gentlemen, which was done about Frazerburgh, after the main of their army was dispersed in the hills.

The Earl Marischal and the Lord Tinnmouth, son of the Duke of Berwick, were about five miles from Montrose, when the Pretender embarked; and so were left to shift for themselves with several others. But it will appear from the sequel, that both the Earl Marischal and General Gordon were in the secret, though they pretended to make the army believe otherwise, to secure themselves from their resentment, and only of Providence to rescue these nations in due time from their oppression, and the lawless dominion of E----.

Now if we look back a little, and consider our affairs from the beginning of this last attempt, I believe it will be found, that no Nation in our circumstances, and so destitute of all kind of succour from abroad, ever made so brave a struggle for restoring their Prince and Country to their just Rights. And when it comes to be known to the world (as some time or other it may) what encouragements there were at home and abroad, reasonably to make us expect and hope for success in this great, good, and necessary work, it will not appear a chimerical, rash, or ill-grounded undertaking; and its not proving successful, as plainly appears by what has been already said, and what follows, is not owing to the Chevalier, or his faithful friends on this side.

When the Earl of Mar, by the Chevalier's command, came down to Scotland, he found the people there more forward to take arms than his instructions allowed him to consent to; and it was not without difficulty that we could allay their first heat. But the Chevalier not going into England, nor the Duke of Berwick coming to Scotland, as was generally expected, abated very much of that forwardness; so that, when the Government summoned those they suspected to appear, and give bail for their good behaviour, many of them seemed inclined to comply. The Earl of Mar, in pursuance of his instructions, found it then high time, for preventing this step, to appear openly; and it was not without difficulty, that he could persuade some to join with him, they apprehending great uncertainty of success in this affair, by no account being come of the Chevalier, or the Duke of Berwick's arrival, nor of money, arms, ammunition, or officers, though others were all along very forward. Upon the resolution of taking arms, he sent a Gentleman to give the Chevalier an account of it.

It was near a month after the Earl of Mar set up the Standard before he could procure a Commission; and it is no small proof of the people's zeal for their Country, that so great a number followed his advice, and obeyed his orders, before he could produce one. It must be owned, and it is the less to be wondered at, that, his authority being thus precarious, some were not so punctual in joining him, and others performed not so effectually the service they were sent upon; which had they done, not only Scotland, but even part of England, had been reduced to the Chevalier's obedience before the Government had been in a condition to make head against us. But, as it was, most of those who had promised, and some who had not, joined the Chevalier's Standard at Perth about the end of October; at which time the Earl of Mar sent two Gentlemen, to give the Chevalier an account of the condition they were in, of what they had, and what they wanted, and to hasten his own, the Duke of Ormond's, and the Duke of Berwick's coming into Britain.

About this time there was a rising of some Noblemen and Gentlemen in the South of Scotland, who, marching over the borders, were joined by some in the North of England; and they all together marching back into Scotland, the Earl of Mar sent over the Firth of Forth fifteen hundred foot to join them. This occasioned the Duke of Argyle's leaving Stirling, and going with a part of his army to Edinburgh. Now had the Scots and English horse, who were then in the South of Scotland, come and joined the fifteen hundred foot as was expected; had the Highland Clans performed as they promised, the service they were sent upon in Argyleshire, and marched towards Glasgow, as the Earl of Mar marched towards Stirling, he had then given a good account of the Government's army, the troops from Ireland not having yet joined them, nor could they have joined them afterwards. But, all this failing by some cross accidents, Lord Argyle returned with that part of his army to Stirling; and the Earl of Mar could not, with the men he then had, advance farther than Dumblain; and for want of provisions there, was soon after obliged to return to Perth.

But immediately after we had got provisions, and that the Clans and my Lord Seaforth had joined us, we marched again towards the enemy; and, notwithstanding the difficulties the Earl of Mar had upon that occasion with some of our own people, he gave the enemy battle; and, as you see in our printed accounts

1715. only staid behind to conduct the army to a place, where they could with safety disperse them: Which they did so effectually, that though the Duke of Argyle used his utmost endeavours to come up with them, yet he could never overtake one party of them, and did not, in all the pursuit from Perth to the Highlands, take a hundred prisoners. They kept so close together, and marched with such expedition into the mountains, that it was in vain for the Duke to pursue them any farther.

When the Pretender went away, he appointed General Gordon to command in chief. When that General arrived in the army at Aberdeen (where they were but coldly received, in comparison of their former reception) he produced a paper of instructions which he had from the Pretender, and which, he said, he was commanded not to open till he came to that City. In this paper the Pretender complains chiefly of disappointments from abroad; and mentions the necessity he was under, for his own preservation, to leave the Country. He thanks them for their so cheerfully undertaking so hazardous an enterprise, which, he says, would not have been liable to the present disappointments, if their endeavours had been as well seconded by others, who had, by large promises, flattered him with their assistance. He recommends to them to consult their own safety, and to keep together till they arrived at such places, where they might separate without becoming a prey to the enemy, and promises to let them hear from him shortly.

It was the 6th of February when they arrived at Aberdeen, the third day after the Pretender embarked. Here they staid but one night, and in that interval procured three vessels to carry over about two hundred Gentlemen, who designed to make their escape that way. These vessels received private orders to meet them to the North of Aberdeen, about Peterhead, Buchan-Ross, and other parts, where they took in their intended cargo; but one of them, falling in with the King's Cruisers, put in for the shore, where the Gentlemen landed again, and followed the Rebel army through by-ways. The other two vessels, with about a hundred and forty Gentlemen, arrived safe in France.

On the 7th, the Rebels resolved to leave Aberdeen, and began their march early in the morning, and had evacuated the place by two in the afternoon. General Gordon, with the foot, formed the van, and the Earl Marjsebal, with about a thousand horse, formed the rear to prevent surprize. They marched to the left directly West through Strath-Spey, and Strath-Down, to the hills of Badenoch, where they quietly dispersed the common people, mostly to their homes, but with a resolution to be ready to take up their arms on the first notice they should have from General Gordon.

About this time several Gentlemen, who had betaken themselves to the hills about Lochaber, received of it, had not our left-wing given way, which was occasioned by mistake of orders, and scarcity of experienced officers, that being composed of as good men, and marched as cheerfully up to the field of battle as the other, our victory had been complete; and, as it was, the enemy, who was advanced on this side the river, was forced to retire back to Stirling.

Amongst many good qualities, the Highlanders have one unlucky custom, not easy to be reformed; which is, that generally after an action they return home. Accordingly a great many went off after the late battle of Sheriff-Moor; so that the Earl of Mar not being in a condition to pursue the advantage he had by it, was forced to return to Perth, waiting there, not without impatience, both for the return of the Highlanders, and for money, arms, and ammunition, he had so often asked, and still expected from abroad. But the Highlanders, hearing nothing of the Chevalier, or the Duke of Berwick's coming, nor of the supplies, did not return to the army, as they had promised: And the Gentlemen of the army, who had been long from home, living still at their own charges, which they could not well longer support, went also mostly home, some without leave, and others after a leave, which the Earl of Mar saw well enough would be to no purpose to refuse. Some indeed never thought of quitting the army, and others returned soon to it; but our number was never again near so great, as it had been before the battle. About this time we had the news of the fatal affair at Pryston, which was no small discouragement to the army; so that some, who had been caballing privately before, began then to speak openly of capitulating with the enemy, and found others more easy to join with them.

We had, at the same time, another piece of bad news; which was, that Simon Fraser of Beauford (by some called Lord Lovat) had joined Lord Sutherland; and that they, with the help of some other disaffected people thereabouts, had retaken Inverness. Upon this news, most of the name of Frazer, who had joined the Chevalier's army with Frianterdale, went now away, and joined Beauford, or Lord Lovat, their Chief.

North to get his men together, who had mostly returned home after the battle, and in conjunction with the Chevalier's friends in that Country, to endeavour to recover Inverness.

In the mean time those who were for capitulating with the enemy, pressed the Earl of Mar so hard to consent to it, that to prevent some people's making private separate treaties, which he found they were about, he was at last forced to comply so far with them, as to send a message from the whole army to my Lord Argyle, to know, if he had power to treat with them? That Lord returned with great civility this answer, That he had no sufficient power to treat with them in a body, but that he would write to Court upon the subject. To which it was replied, That, when he should let them know he had sufficient power, they then would make their propositions. By which the affair was put off at that time, and we were since informed, that the Lord Argyle never received those powers; and that even his former powers, which he sent up to be enlarged, were never returned to him.

Much about this time the Marquis of Huntley having for some time pressed his going home with his horse, the Earl of Mar consented to it, and gave him a Commission, in conjunction with my Lord Seaforth, for reducing of Inverness, and those who opposed the Chevalier's interest in that Country, which we then hoped would be soon done.

After this some, though but few, were discovered to have private dealings with the enemy; and some others went home, and never returned to the army; but a good number of the Noblemen and Gentlemen, and all the Heads of the Clans, still remained with the army at Perth.

We had about this time the long wished-for news of the Chevalier's being landed; and that put an end for the present to any further talking of capitulations.

I have now given you a true, and, I hope, a satisfactory account of the condition we have been in, ever since our first taking arms; of the bad condition in which the Chevalier found us at his arrival; and of the reasons that obliged him at last to leave us.

There

1715. received advice, that two French frigates lay at the Orkneys in Penland Friib, till they should come aboard. Upon this the Lord Duffus, Sir George St. Clair, and Lieutenant-General Ecllin, with about one hundred and sixty Gentlemen more on horseback well armed and mounted, made a fall from the hills, and crossing in a body the Shire of Murray, came down to the sea-coast, near a place called Bruch. Here they quitted their horses to their servants; and such, as they had no use for, they killed to prevent their falling a prey to the King's forces; then went on board some small boats to pursue their way to the Orkneys; but finding these boats too small and dangerous for that boisterous season of the year, they put in again at Dumbeth; where they hired two large barks, in which sixty of them got safe to the frigate of twenty-six guns. The others pressed another Scots vessel to carry them to the other frigate. When they arrived off that coast, the country people were alarmed, and afraid, that they were come with a design to plunder them, and seemed inclinable to fall upon them. But, the French ship coming in to their assistance, the people were soon set right as to their mistake, and assisted them in getting on board the French ship. Both the ships set sail, and landed them at Gottenburgh, in the King of Sweden's Dominions, who was then setting out with an army on his expedition to Norway, and received their offer of entering into his service very courteously. But the Lord Duffus, going to Hamburg, was there seized at the suit of the British Envoy.

In the mean time, the Duke of Argyle was on his march to Montrose, where he arrived on the 6th of February; and at Aberdeen, with five hundred men, on the 8th; but the rest of the army not being come up, the pursuit could not be continued: Only he dispatched General Evans with two hundred dragoons to harass their rear, or endeavour to divide their horse from the foot; and at the same time, to give chase to the two hundred Gentlemen, who had separated from the rest, to take shipping at Frazersburgh; but the General succeeded in neither.

While the Duke of Argyle was in chase of the Rebel army by land, the men of war were as industrious to annoy them by sea, and hinder their escape. But they had not the fortune to meet

There remains yet to answer one question, which you may naturally ask, as most people do, on this subject; and that is, Why the Chevalier delayed his coming so long?

To answer this question to your satisfaction, I must tell you, that I have what I shall here relate, from persons of unquestionable veracity, who were then upon the place, eye and ear witnesses of what passed; and so you may safely rely upon it.

You have certainly heard, what was generally said, of the Chevalier's sister's inclinations towards him, whilst she was in possession of his Throne. But, whatever there was of truth in that, what I am well assured of is, that he was at last so little satisfied with what was said to him from thence, that he was fully resolved, whilst she was yet alive, to have gone into Scotland; and in order to that, had already prepared a declaration, or manifesto, to have been there published upon his arrival. How he was hindered from putting this design in execution by some real friends, that were themselves imposed upon, and by other pretended friends, who were at the bottom real enemies, is a mystery, which time may discover.

Upon the first news of his sister's death, he immediately took post, and resolved to endeavour at any rate, to get into some part of his Dominions; but was stopped by those, who had power to do it effectually. Being then forced back to Lorraine, he made and published his protestation, which it is likely you have seen, and which, I can assure you, was drawn intirely by himself.

From that time, as before, he had nothing in his thoughts, but how, and when, he could assert his own right, and deliver his people. He saw little ground to hope for succour from any foreign Prince, and had only the affections of his people, and the advice of his friends on this side the water, to rely upon. Their interest seemed now more than ever linked to his; and they being upon the place, and consequently best able to judge of the fittest time for his coming to them, it must be allowed, that it had been no ways prudent nor advisable in him to act contrary to their opinion: And yet it is most certain, that it was only by following their advice, contrary to his own judgment and inclination, that so much time was lost. Some of them in England insisted upon having a certain number of regular troops to make head at first, without which, they said, nothing was to be attempted: And though he sent them word over and over, that, after all the endeavours he could use, he found it absolutely impossible to obtain any troops; yet they insisted for several months in this opinion, and by that means the most favourable time, he ever had, was lost. Other friends there pretended, that the disposition of the people would still grow more favourable towards him; and that there was no danger, but advantage, by delaying.

Thus, though he had several times fixed a day for his departure, he was still forced to delay, that he might not act contrary to the advice of his friends; and at another time, because he found, that his enemies had discovered his design, and taken infallible measures to intercept him. But as soon as his friends began to see and own the mistakes they had been in, he without any regard to the many dangers he had to go through, set out from Commercy the 28th of October, and went incognito through a great part of France to the coast of Bretagne; and to avoid falling into the hands of many, who were placed upon the common road to intercept him, he was obliged to cross the Country through bye-ways, with only three people with him. His design was to go to England, if things appeared favourable there; or, if they did not, to go to Scotland.

When he arrived at St. Malo's, he found the Duke of Ormond returned from the coast of England, to which he had gone some days before, in hopes to have found friends ready to join him; but that having failed by some accidents of discoveries, he was forced to return. Upon this he resolved to go into Scotland; and it not being thought safe for him to go through the British channel, he had been advised to go round Ireland; and by a message from his friends in Scotland, it was proposed to him to land at Dunstaffnage, which was at that time in their possession; but soon after the enemy came to be masters of it, by the Clans not performing what they were charged with in Argyleshire, as is aforementioned. His friends immediately informed him of this change by a second message; and this confirmed him in the resolution he had himself before taken, of changing all his measures, and in place of taking that long tedious way, which was indeed the safest, to take a much shorter, though a more dangerous way for being intercepted by the enemies ships. He sent therefore immediately to prepare a small ship privately for him at Dunkirk; which was accordingly done, though not without difficulty.

He was a second time obliged to traverse a great part of France, and that on horseback, in the very coldest time of this hard and severe winter; exposed to greater danger than in the Forth, from the greater 1715. meet with one ship belonging to the Rebels; though they were not remits in their duty (1).

With all this diligence both on sea and land, it was strange that any escaped: But it was much more so, that not one of them ever fell into the hands of their pursuers, but arrived every man safe in France; where they were hunted by the Earl of Stair, the British Ambassador at the French Court, whose intelligence was so good, that there was scarce one step taken by the Pretender, or any of his most secret friends, without his knowledge; by which means he disappointed the Pretender of the greatest part of the supplies he expected from France, and watched his person so narrowly, that he kept him a considerable time on that side of the water, to the general disappointment of the Rebels. By his repeated memorials to the Regent of France, he kept him in constant observance of the treaty of Utrecht; at least any violations, that were made, were only by connivance; in which cases the Earl was never silent, as appears by two memorials; the one writ while the Pretender was in Scotland, and the other after he had abandoned it (2).

The facts contained in the first memorial were too well vouched, for the Regent to deny them; and it was difficult to find any evasion to reconcile them to the engagements of the Court of France in the treaty of Utrecht; for which reason he did not incline to give any answer. But the affairs of the Pretender taking a different turn, and he being obliged to leave Scotland, and number of those, who lay in wait for him on all the great roads, which obliged him to travel by unfrequented roads where there was accommodation bad enough; and yet all this time, in that terrible cold, he never had the least ailment or indisposition.

It was about the middle of December (our style) before he could reach Dunkirk. He was there informed, that there was a man of war then lying in that very road; and that there were a great many more cruising on the coasts of France, England and Scotland, all of them in waiting for him: But he without any regard to these dangers, went immediately on board this small ship with only three servants, and conducted by good Providence, arrived safe at Peterhead, where he landed the 22d of December, O. S.

Having, I hope, now fully satisfied your curiosity, I have only to add, that though it hath pleased God to permit, that this attempt, though never so just, had not the wished for success; we have still reaped by it one great advantage, which is, that we have seen with our own eyes, and personally known our lawful Sovereign, and to our unspeakable satisfaction, discovered in him all the great and good qualities, that are necessary for making a people every way happy.

The time may, and I hope, will yet come, when God in his mercy, will open the eyes, and turn the hearts of those Nations to a sense of their duty, and not permit to be accomplished a person to be always unfortunate. But however it should please Providence to dispose of him, this I can assure you, and you may rely upon it, that as his right is indefeasible, he is firmly resolved, by the help of Almighty God, to assert it, when ever he finds a fit opportunity, and never to depart from it but with his life.

Feb. 22. The Royal Anne Galley, Pearl, Port-mahon, Deal-Castle, and Phoenix are returned from cruising. It appears from the journal of Captain Stewart, that he had intelligence early of the Pretender's having put to sea from Montrose in a clean tallowed French Snow, which rowed out of the harbour, and close in a long shore, a good while with her sails furled.

The Port-mahon lay all that night within two leagues of the harbour's mouth; but it was so very dark, there was no seeing a ship at a quarter of a mile's distance. Captain Stewart and the Pearl were off Aberdeen; and when the rebels marched out of that town, having notice of their marching Northward, and that Lord Timmouth and others were contriving to make their escape from Peterhead or Frazersburgh, he immediately dispatched away the Pearl and Phoenix to lie off these places, which effectually disappointed them. He lay himself at Aberdeen, till the Duke of Argyle arrived there. The winds afterwards blowing hard Southerly, he disposed the ships mostly on the South-coast of the Murray-Firth; sent by the Deal-castle a letter to the Earl of Sutherland, to apprise him of the flight of the Rebels, and to prepare to receive them, in case they should make a push at Inverness; and traced Lord Timmouth and his Associates as far as Port-Sary; where seeing a ship of war ready to intercept them, they despaired of success on the coast, and therefore they joined the Clans on the 10th instant, and took to the mountains. All the ships kept the sea diligently, when wind and weather would permit, and observed the motions of his Majesty's army so carefully, that the Duke of Argyle did not pass through any sea-port town without finding some ship ready to put in execution any service his Grace might have had to propose. On the 21st Sir John Jennings had advice from my Lord Levon, that a vessel with the Pretender's plate, and other effects on board, and a considerable sum of money for his use, had lately put into the Levis; and that many of the Chiefs of the Rebels were making off towards the Isle of Skie, and other North-West Islands: Whereupon he immediately ordered the Drake-Sloop thither, with instructions to cruise about the Orkneys, if the wind should then be contrary; and by express directed Captain Stuart of the Aldborough to dispatch the Happy Sloop thither, and to cruise himself with the Lively for fourteen days about the islands of Islay, Mull, and Canna, to endeavour to intercept the Rebels, or any vessels for their relief.

(2) The first memorial, dated in January 1715-16, was in the following terms:

The underwritten Earl of Stair, Minister of the King of Great-Britain at the Court of his most Christian Majesty, represents to his Royal Highness the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, that although his Royal Highness has several times assured the said Earl, that he would faithfully and punctually observe the treaty of peace concluded with Great-Britain at Utrecht, and that he would not suffer any arms, ammunition of war, officers, or soldiers, to sail from any harbour of France for the service of the Pretender; and that his Royal Highness had accordingly sent strict orders to all the harbours in the Kingdom for that purpose; it is nevertheless apparent, that things of this nature are daily embarked, and shipped off in the Ports of France, without any opposition on the part of the Officers commanding there. The late Duke of Orleans and the Pretender have frequently gone on board ships at St. Malo that were known to be laden with arms and ammunition for the service of the Pretender; and that with so little circumspection, that they have been attended with a whole troop of horse, with their officers of the regiment of Nugent, all of them in their regimental cloaths, arms, and accoutrements, without meeting with any opposition from the commanding Officers of the most Christian King at St. Malo. The Pretender finding it not advisable to venture to embark there, set out through Normandy to embark at Dunkirk; and the late Duke of Orleans, not finding it safe to land in England, returned to Morlaix. During his absence, his Royal Highness did the Earl of Stair the honour to tell him, that he would cause the said troopers of the regiment of Nugent to be punished as deserters, if they returned to France; and the Marshal d'Uxelles assured him, that he would cause them to be hanged. They are now returned, and have joined their regiments: The Sieur Bofsch and his company, the 1715. and being again arrived in France some days after the first memorial was delivered, the Earl of Stair presented a second, to prevent his or any of his Adherents being sheltered in that Court (1).

The Pretender, upon his return to France 1715. from Scotland, being persuaded, that the Lord Viscount Bolingbroke (who had entered into his service as Secretary of State to him, and continued the arms and ammunition, which the late Duke of Ormond had with him for his enterprize, are still at Morlaix, and have been removed only from one ship to another. The commanding Officer is so far from commanding those arms to be stopped, that he refused to cause the ship to be searched, though he was desired to do so by Captain Campbell, Commander of the English man of war lying in Morlaix.

Several ships, with arms, ammunition, money, and officers for the service of the Pretender, are sailed, within these six weeks past, from Dieppe and Havre de Grace, which are actually arrived in Scotland. And lastly, a ship sailed the 17th of this month from Havre de Grace, in sight of an Officer of the King of Great-Britain, who having represented to the Marquis de Roveray, that there were twenty Officers, both at Havre and Harfleur, ready to go on board to follow the Pretender to Scotland; and desired the Marquis to give orders to prevent their embarkation, the Marquis answered, That what he said might possibly be true; but that he could not hinder the Officers from going on board, having no orders from Court to do so. The Earl of Stair has several times represented to his Royal Highness the Regent, and to the Marshal d'Uxelles, that several Generals, Colonels, and other Officers, who are actually in the service of France, designed to go over to Scotland, and join the Rebels, and even has given a list of them to the Marshal; which Generals, Colonels, and Officers are still at Boulogne, Calais, Dunkirk, and other places thereabouts, ready to embark for Scotland, having been detained only by the contrary winds and great frosts; the Commanders of the said places alledging, that they have no orders from Court to hinder the said Officers from embarking. The said Earl of Stair finds himself obliged to represent these things to his Royal Highness, that he may see, whether his orders have been punctually executed, and consider whether Great-Britain has reason to believe, that the treaty of Utrecht is faithfully executed. His Royal Highness is desired at the same time, to cast an eye on the said treaty. Furthermore, the said Earl of Stair finds himself obliged to notify to his Royal Highness, that the said late Duke of Ormond, and several other Conspirators against their King and Country, set out some days since towards Bordeaux and Bayonne; and that they have assembled on the coast of Gascogne a great quantity of arms and ammunition, with ships to make a descent (as the Court of St. Germain's give out) in Ireland, and cause a Rebellion there, which that Court flatters themselves will not only be supported with money, but also with troops from France. The Earl of Stair, who has so ardently desired to establish and maintain a good, sincere friendship between the King his Master and his Royal Highness, finds himself very uneasy to have representations to make about matters of so great importance, which are of so nice a nature, and tend to alienate the affection of the two Nations from each other, and provoke them so far, that dismal consequences may ensue thereupon, if speedy care is not taken to prevent them.

(1) The second memorial ran thus:

The Earl of Stair, Minister of the King of Great-Britain, to his Most Christian Majesty, by express order from the King his Master, notifies to his Royal Highness, the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, the flight of the Pretender, and the dispersion of the Rebels in Scotland; which his Majesty is persuaded will be very acceptable to his Royal Highness, by reason of their near relation, and the strict friendship which his Majesty has carefully cultivated with his Royal Highness.

The treaty of Utrecht being so lately concluded, the King thought himself sure, that his Royal Highness, Regent, would have taken proper measures to hinder the Pretender from setting foot again in France. But since the Pretender has found means to return thither, his Majesty persuades himself that his Royal Highness will oblige him, as soon as he has notice of it, to quit the Kingdom.

His Royal Highness has too much reason and penetration, not to see the whole weight and justice of this demand. Great-Britain cannot be either safe or quiet so long as persons, who have conspired and undertaken with an armed force the ruin and subversion of their Country, are received and supported in its neighbourhood; nor can France itself be sure, that they shall not be again exposed to bear the blame of their evil practices.

The King of Great-Britain and the Nation thought themselves very safe on the side of France by the solemn treaty of Utrecht, which for ever excludes the Pretender from France, and obliges France to give him no succours, nor ships, nor arms, nor ammunition, nor money, nor officers, nor soldiers, nor councils, directly or indirectly. These Gentlemen came over, and demanded refuge and protection in France, where they are no sooner arrived, but, taking advantage of the convenience of the neighbourhood, and the facility of correspondence by letters, they plot and contrive a black and detestable Treason against their Country, which, upon the faith of the treaty, was disarmed and defenceless. And, notwithstanding the treaty, they find means to get entrance for the Pretender into France, and by their intrigues procure him ships, arms, ammunition, officers, soldiers and money; with which assistance the Pretender did actually invade Britain, where he occasioned infinite damage to the Nation.

His Royal Highness may imagine, whether Great-Britain can be easy in a situation so troublesome as they would find themselves in, having these Rebels in their neighbourhood, ready to carry fire and sword into the heart of their Country. In this situation, Great-Britain would be obliged to keep always in arms, tormented with continual suspicions and inquietudes; a condition much worse than an open war. For a people, which love to live in peace with all their neighbours, and is jealous of the preservation of their laws and liberties, his Royal Highness may see by the unanimous addresses of both houses of Parliament to the King, with what an eye the Nation beholds this boisterous and unsettled situation. The King hath the happiness of his subjects too much at heart, not to come with eagerness into their sentiments and interests; and he flatters himself, that upon this account his Royal Highness will not refuse him so just a proof of his friendship, and of the desire he hath to maintain a good understanding between the two nations.

For the same reasons, the King of Great-Britain hopes, that his Royal Highness will be pleased to join effectual instances with those of his Majesty, to the Duke of Lorraine, to the end the said Duke may not permit the Pretender to return into his Dominions.

The Earl of Stair is ordered likewise to put his Royal Highness in mind of the Declaration he made, that the Officers in the service of France, who should follow the Pretender in the Invasion of Great-Britain, should be broke; and the King is persuaded, that his Royal Highness will not suffer the general Officers, Colonels, and others, who have followed the Pretender in the Rebellion, ever to be employed again in the service of France; and that if it happen, that some of the said Officers should return, or be already returned into France, his Royal Highness will punish them in such a manner, that it may appear his Royal Highness and this Government do loudly disapprove of their proceeding, formally contrary to the treaty of Utrecht.

1715. nued in France, in order to send supplies to him into Scotland, had been faulty in the execution of his office, sent the Duke of Ormond to him for the Seals, and removed him from all employments under him. This occasioned a controversy (under his direction) by letters between his Secretary Mr. Brinlden, and Mr. James Murray, afterwards made Earl of Dunbar by the Pretender (1).

The death of Lewis
XIV.

During these proceedings, Lewis XIV. of France died at Versailles on the 1st of September, N. S. 1715, in the 77th year of his age almost completed (having been born on the 5th of September, 1638) and in the 73d year of his Reign, which began May 14, 1643. His death produced a sort of Revolution in the Government of France. The King, by his will, had placed the Administration of the Government in a Council, of which the Duke of Orleans was chief. But the Duke was not, by his authority, to decree any thing, or issue any order in the name of the Minor, without the advice and consent of the Council. The day after the King's death the Duke of Orleans (attended as the Kings of France usually are on the like occasions) came to the Parliament of Paris, and, after the King's will was opened and read, complained of a disposition so contrary to the laws of the Realm, and so prejudicial to his right. He therefore moved, that the will should not be registered, but that the Parliament should adjudge the Regency to him without any restriction. They immediately complied with his motion, and adjudged the Regency to him, with power to nominate such subordinate Councils for preparing all things to be laid before him, as he should think fit. Lewis XIV. was succeeded by his Great Grandson Lewis XV. son of the Duke of

The Duke of Orleans made Regent.

To the end there may be no mistake in so nice and important a matter, the Earl of Stair hath orders to demand an answer in writing to his memorial, which he is earnestly desirous may be such, as may contribute towards the restoring of a good understanding between the two Nations.'

The Regent's answer to this memorial was as follows:

'His Royal Highness, being unfeignedly desirous of advancing the glory and prosperity of the King of Great Britain, heard with so much the greater pleasure of the success of his arms in Scotland, because at the same time that this event secures the tranquility of the Kingdom of Great-Britain, it will put a stop to the false reports that have been spread without foundation by the enemies of the public peace, with design to alter the truth and friendship, which the King is desirous to preserve with the King of Great Britain, and which hath always been one of the principal objects of his Royal Highness's views. And as he will punctually fulfil the treaty of Utrecht, he hath already employed the authority he is intrusted with to make the Chevalier de St. George depart the Kingdom, and will continue to make use of the same authority to oppose his coming into it again at any time, or under any pretence whatsoever.

As for the fugitives, who are come into this Kingdom from England, or who may hereafter come over, though no body is ignorant what the laws of refuge are in foreign States, His Royal Highness being desirous to convince the King of Great-Britain how far the King is from suffering any person whatsoever to abuse the sanctuary of his Kingdom, as to maintain in Great-Britain an intelligence capable of disturbing her tranquillity, he will in concert with the King of Great-Britain, enter into any measures, which shall be thought proper for preventing such an abuse, and for keeping up a good understanding, by removing every occasion of distrust. And to shew besides how far his Majesty is from bearing with the rashness of those, who dare to act contrary to his intentions, he has caused the ordinances to be strictly executed against such of the Officers of his troops as went out of the Kingdom without his leave.

If it be true what the Earl of Stair says, that England was disarmed upon the faith of treaties, it is no less certain, that no person whatsoever can say with truth, that ever his Majesty had a mind to take that opportunity to disturb it, nor that he hath granted any favours to the Chevalier de St. George. It is well known on the contrary, that his Royal Highness hindered the suspected armaments and embarkations, when he had notice of them; and nothing better proves, that the Chevalier de St. George was not assisted by France, than the condition he was in in Scotland, destitute of all things necessary for such an enterprise.

His Majesty sees with pleasure the marks of a perfect intelligence between the King of Great-Britain and his Parliament, since this must be the most solid foundation of the glory of that Prince, and the happiness of his Subjects. His Royal Highness will always have a great concern therein. As he very truly desires to keep his Britannic Majesty's friendship, so he will omit nothing, that may shew him how glad he is of the testimonies he receives thereof; neither will he interpose, directly or indirectly, to hinder the Duke of Lorraine from granting upon the instances of the King of Great Britain, what he shall be pleased to ask of him with relation to the Chevalier de St. George's residence in his territories. And, as he hath a real concern for the satisfaction of his Britannic Majesty, he will see, with a great deal of pleasure, whatever may contribute towards it. But his Royal Highness is persuaded at the same time, that the King of Great-Britain will not desire him to take any measures with a Prince, over whom the King hath no authority, which cannot be grounded on any solid foundation, and which would add nothing to the rendering effectual the powerful instances of his Britannic Majesty. An answer conceived in terms so plain and particular, ought to evince to all mankind, what are the true intentions of the King; and leaves no manner of doubt or obscurity in relation to the sincere desire his Royal Highness has always had carefully to preserve the amity of the King of Great-Britain, and to contribute in whatever depended upon the authority he is intrusted with, to the establishment and preservation of a good correspondence and perfect friendship between the King and that of England.'

(1) These letters were printed at London, 1735, in 8vo. but immediately suppressed. As they contain several curious particulars, it may not be improper to insert them at large with the prefixed charge against the Lord Bolingbroke, sent from London, March 16, 1716, by the Agents of the Pretender, in relation to the affairs of Scotland during the Rebellion of the late Earl of Mar, as contained in the following letters between his Lordship's Secretary, and Mr. Murray. By the afterism [*] is to be understood the Pretender.

I. Lord Bolingbroke was never to be found by those, who came to him about business. If by chance, or stratagem, they got hold of him, he affected being in a hurry, and, by putting them off till another time, still avoided giving them any answer.

II. The Earl of Mar, by six different messengers, at different times, acquainted Lord Bolingbroke, before the * came from Dunkirk, of his being in distress for want of arms and ammunition, and prayed a speedy relief; and though the things demanded were in my Lord's power, there was not so much as one pound of powder 1715. of Burgundy who was Dauphin after the death of his Father) and of Maria Adelaïda of Savoy. Lewis XV. was born the 15th of February 1710, and was between five and six years old when his Great Grandfather died. He was the third successive Minor that came to the Crown of France, since the death of Henry IV.

The Duke Regent was Son of the Duke of Orleans, brother of Lewis XIV. and was then in the 41st year of his age. He was married, in 1692, to one of the late King's natural Daughters.

He began his Regency with an act of justice and prudence. The edicts of the Kings of France formerly had not the sanction of laws, before they were registered in the Parliament of Paris, whose undoubted right it was to examine them; and in case they contained any thing against the laws of the Realm, to remonstrate against them. But the late King had deprived the Parliament of that liberty in the year 1667, since which time they had been compelled to register all his edicts, without being permitted to make any representation against them. The Regent restored this privilege to them by an edict, which was registered a few days after the King's death. At the same time he caused to be registered a declaration, containing a scheme of Government to be observed in the Kingdom during the King's minority. Pursuant to which he named, besides the Council of Regency, six other Councils, and, by that means, a new way of Administration in the Government was introduced.

By the death of Lewis XIV. the affairs between Great-Britain and France stood upon a very different foot than before. The Regent by virtue of King Philip's renunciation, and the death of all the Princes in France, sprung from Lewis XIV. was become next heir to the minor King, and consequently it was his interest to cultivate the friendship of such States as were likely to support his title against the King of Spain, and particularly of England. It was his business to seek all means for weakening the only Prince in the world, that had any right to dispute his Succession, or oppose his views. Hence his Accession to the quadruple Alliance; his promoting, or at least conniving at the destruction of the growing naval power of Spain in 1718; his stipulation in favour of Don Carlos, in order not only to divert Spain from forming designs against his power in France, but to weaken Spain by increasing her expences. To these measures, the Regent was carried, in order to divert and weaken King Philip, and King powder sent in any of the ships which by his Lordship's direction parted from France.

III. The * himself, after his arrival, sent General Hamilton to inform him, that his want of arms and ammunition was such, that he should be obliged to leave Scotland, unless he received a speedy supply. Lord Bolingbroke amused Mr. Hamilton twelve days together, and did not introduce him to any of the French Ministers, though he was referred to them for a particular account of affairs, or in all that time so much as communicated his letter to the Queen or any body else.

IV. The Count de Castel Blanco had for several months at Havre a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, and did daily ask his Lordship's orders how to dispose of them, but could never get any, even to the hour the * landed in France.

V. The *'s friends at the French Court had, for some time past, no very good opinion of his Lordship's integrity, and a very bad one of his discretion.

VI. For at a time, when many Merchants in France would have carried privately any quantity of arms and ammunition into Scotland, my Lord desired a public order of the Regent for the embarkation; which, being a thing not to be granted, is said to have been done, in order to beg a denial.

VII. The * wrote to his Lordship by every occasion, after his arrival in Scotland; and, though there were many opportunities of writing in return, yet from the time he landed there, to the day he left it, he never received one letter from his Lordship.

The Lord Bolingbroke, in his first letter, after he received these articles, wrote as follows:

'The * and Earl of Mar, and the others, who came from Scotland, are so much in want of any excuse for their flight, that they have thought fit to have my Lord Bolingbroke discharged the *'s service in the most abrupt and injurious manner, under the pretence, that the want of powder, which he delayed to send, forced them to abandon Scotland. His Lordship says, publicly, 1. That he is able to prove, that, if they wanted powder, it was not by his fault. 2. That, according to what the * and Earl of Mar both say in their letters, they must have come away as they did, had they had all the powder in France. 3. That, if they had pleaded to have staid in Scotland a few days longer, they would have received near ten thousand arms, and above thirty thousand weight of powder, and other Stores in proportion. And, lastly, That the true reason flows from another source, and that he knew and spoke of the design to inform him, long before the want of powder was so much as talked of. That he is unwilling to enter into the particulars of those general heads for reasons that may be easily guessed, since he is persuaded, that he shall neither pass for a Driveller nor Traitor among his friends.'

The second letter was wrote by Lord Bolingbroke's Secretary in the following terms:

April 4, 1716.

I have communicated to his Lordship what you wrote to me; and it is by his Lordship's order, that I give you the following answer:

The charge that you have sent over, is so full of improbable lies, that his Lordship can hardly imagine it can have any other effect, but the shame and confusion of those that brought it; which is the effect of that villainous and ungrateful treatment, that those people have given, and my Lord has met with in that Country, where they are equally despised for their folly, and detested for their immorality, by all the people of consideration.

My Lord has hitherto had two other reasons for his silence.

The first is, That he cannot very fully explain the articles of his not sending arms and ammunition into Scotland, without betraying the secret of those, by whom he has been trusted, and under whose protection he lives.

And the second is, That he cannot give the true reason of the ill usage he has received, without exposing some characters in such a light, as will shock every body. However, you shall have as much as can be at present given of the state of things on this side of the water; of the method English business is put into; and of the hands that are trusted with it. After which you will pity my Lord, and not blame him.

When he returned last Summer out of Dauphine, and at the desire of his friends engaged in this business, he found himself immediately exposed to a daily struggle with difficulties of three sorts. The first arising from the rivetted prejudices of one person. The second, from the impossibility of keeping the Queen, and the 1715. George undoubtedly went into all his ambitious views, as the only means to retrieve the fatal mistakes of the treaty of Utrecht. But the fruits of all these proceedings were entirely lost by the death of the Regent, and the birth of a Dauphin, and instead of facilitating the Succession of the House of Orleans, and thereby dividing the House of Bourbon for ever, they proved the foundation of all the expensive disputes, which subsisted many years between Great-Britain and Spain, as will appear in the course of the History.

Proceedings of the Irish Parliament.

A Parliament having been called in Ireland, and the Duke of Grafton and the Earl of Galway (who had been appointed Lords Justices upon the Earl of Sunderland's resignation of the post of Lord-Lieutenant of that Kingdom) being arrived at Dublin, the two Houses met there on the 12th of November, and Mr. Connolly was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons. The Peers began with a bill for recognizing the King's title to the Crown, and the Commons with several bills for the further security of his Person and Government; namely, a bill to attain the Pretender and give a reward of fifty thousand pounds for his head; and for attaining the Duke of Ormond, giving the Crown his cf-tate, and ten thousand pounds reward upon his head.

These bills were followed by a retropect upon the Councils of the late Reign; and a resolution was unanimously passed against those, who advised the Queen to prorogue the late Parliament, at a time when a bill to attain the Pretender was depending; and they were voted to be enemies to the Succession, and favourers of the Pretender and Popery. They proceeded in the next place, to bring in a bill to prevent tumults, rebellious and riotous assemblies. All these bills, together with the Supplies demanded, went through the houses in the usual forms, without the least opposition; and, being ratified in Ireland, received the Royal Assent. But they did not end here: For, on the 17th of November, the Commons, while the public accounts which were ordered to be laid before them, were preparing, entered into an inquiry, which brought a great many of their Members on their knees. The last House of Commons, in the Queen's time, had addressed her against Sir Constantine Phipps, at that time Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and one of the Lords Justices of the Kingdom, desiring her to remove him from his employments. But, as this address seemed not to be very whole rabble of the Court of St. Germain's, from meddling in business. And the third, from the cabals of French and English, men, women and children, people for the most part of no name in the world, or else of very bad characters, who had been let into the most secret parts of business, and expected to continue so.

To get over the first of these difficulties, my Lord saw would be the work of time; but he saw likewise, as the later it was begun, the harder it would prove; and that any yielding to those prejudices, increased and strengthened them. He therefore began upon the first, and continued upon every occasion to combat them with great decency, but with great firmness, contrary indeed to the opinion of others, who imagine it will be time enough to talk of those things, when his Lordship thinks it will be too late.

As to the people of the Court of St. Germain's, my Lord knew enough of England, and France too, to know they would be a load upon business, but no help to it. In England they are odious, and in France in contempt. The first is not very strange; for you may depend upon it, that twenty-eight years experience had not made them wiser in any degree. And the latter is so true, that my Lord affirms, that he never yet spoke of English business to any man of figure on this side the water; but, before he would give any answer, he excused, that the Court of St. Germain's (no one person excepted) should not know any thing of it.

With this set of people, and a whole tribe of Jesuits, my Lord therefore avoided all sorts of commerce before the Duke of Ormond arrived. He would not so much as see any of them, before his Grace came, and thought fit to open his door to them. My Lord could no longer avoid seeing them; but he never would enter into any familiarity with them. He chose three or four persons of sense and activity. Some of them were Protestants, and others were very indifferent Roman Catholics. Those he employed were as many as he wanted. During the time that my Lord, much against his will, was obliged to reside at St. Germain's, he observed the same conduct, and never associated with any one man there but the Duke of Berwick, who is not to be reckoned of the Court, though he has lodgings in the house, who has a hundred times more capacity and credit than all the rest put together, in concert with whom my Lord all along acted, and by whose judgment he is willing to stand or fall.

With the other cabal of people, that I mentioned in the third place, my Lord had at first some little communication, for he was thrown into their hands; but as soon as he knew their persons, and informed himself of their characters, he broke all measures with them, and the rather as they were made use of as people, who intended to do nothing, only to amuse those on this side the water, and by that means our friends on the other side: And for this use they were indeed very proper, since they are so inconsiderable, that they may be at any time disavowed, without the least consequence.

But the thing, that principally shocked my Lord, was to find the source of all business, and even the heads of the best and dearest friends, trusted to the keeping of a multitude of people, some of whom, both men and women of the vilest characters.

The third letter was as follows:

April 8, N. S. 1716.

It is easy to imagine all those nests of hornets flew about my Lord's ears immediately, and that with the greater spirit, because the Duke of Ormond observed a quite contrary conduct. It was more than six weeks before the return out of Scotland, and consequently long before the six articles mentioned in your letter were prepared, or any other of the pretences against my Lord invented, that we knew of the union of the several cabals in order to get rid of him; and that he spoke to several of his acquaintance of it. He was not much concerned at it, being from the first resolved to serve upon a Protestant and English bottom, or not to serve at all; and he confesses, that he did not imagine, that the Duke of Ormond, for whom he has always had a very particular respect, would ever have been drawn in to put himself at the head of a party on this side the water, and indirectly (for he is far from designing any such thing) to do the work of the factions above-mentioned. My Lord knew indeed, and knew with great sorrow, that his Grace gave too much ear to them, and suffered the stories they had told him, to make so great an impression upon him.

When the resolution was taken of leaving Scotland, and the principal persons returned hither, it was judged a proper time to make the utmost effort against my Lord; and perhaps there were people, who thought that the loading of him would excuse the precipitation wherewith Scotland was abandoned, if that precipitation needed any excuse. Then were these articles against

fells of that Reign, there were many counter-addresses procured, and sent up from the several Counties and Towns in Ireland, in favour of Sir Constantine, desiring he might not be removed, notwithstanding the address of the Commons. This the House esteemed a breach of the privilege of Parliament, and resolved to shew their resentment against these Addressers, especially such as were Members of the sitting Parliament. Accordingly, they appointed a Committee to inquire who had signed these addresses, and many were censured or brought to acknowledgment upon that account. Then they addressed the Lords Justices for a proclamation against the Popish inhabitants of Limerick and Galway, who, presuming upon the construction they thought fit to put upon the articles of capitation made with King William, for the surrender of those places, had claimed an exemption from the penalties and process upon the other laws against Papists. Upon complaint whereof to the house, this address was founded.

Whilst the bills were sent to England to be ratified, the Parliament adjourned to the 6th of January. Upon their meeting on that day, the Lord Viscount Dillon came into the house of Peers, and delivering his writ, took the oath of allegiance; but, being asked, Whether he could take the other oaths? He said, He would con- der of it, and then withdrew. Upon this, the Lords resolved, that no Peer should have Parliamentary privilege, till he had taken and subscribed the other oaths in the act to prevent the further growth of Popery. This done, the Lords entered into an association to defend the King, and the Protestant Succession; against the Pre-tender, and all his open and secret Abettors. The Commons likewise entered into the like association; and also resolved, That, whatever forces the King should think fit to raise, or what ex-pences he should think necessary for the defence of the Kingdom, they would inable him to make good the same. It was strongly reported, that the day the association was brought into the House of Peers, two Lords, one of whom was the Earl of Anglesey, embarked for England, to avoid signing it. The Archbishop of Armagh and the Bishop of Corke refused also to sign.

Soon after the Commons resolved, That whoever advised the disbanding or breaking a great part of the army, immediately after the unfea-sonable prorogation of the late Parliament, when a bill to attain the Pretender was under confideration, were enemies to the Protestant Succession, and designed to bring in the Pretender and Popery. After which it was voted, That the Earl of Anglesey was one of the principal Advisers to break the army, and prorogue the late Parliament, and was therefore an enemy to
the gainst my Lord formed, and false reasons invented, where the true ones were not to be owned. My Lord was discarded with all the circumstances of provocation possible; He was treated as far as it lay in the power of those whom he served, with an affectation of indignation and contempt: As soon as the step was made, the tongue of every fellow, that could be encouraged to slander, was let loose.

Having thus given a general view of the state of things on this side the water, and the true account of the animosities against my Lord, I shall in very few words, refute the six articles you sent me over.

That my Lord was seldom to be found with any direct answer to their business, is true, if by people is meant any such, as, in the former part of what I have writ, are designed; if by people is meant any one man, who could be of use, or was, or fit to be trusted, the accusation is false. My Lord never looked upon himself to be under any obligation of conversing, in order to carry on business, with a set of people, against whom he would have done his utmost to have shut the door, if the business had gone prosperously on.

As to the second it is true, that my Lord Mar wrote for arms, for ammunition, for money, for officers, and last, for a body of troops; but, till the arrival of Mr. Hamilton, my Lord did not understand there was any particular want of powder, more than of any other species. My Lord used his best endeavours to procure all that was desired, as well as other assistances, much more considerable, which had never been asked for, or thought of, and which would have been procured, had the business of Scotland kept alive a little longer, and had other people done their part as my Lord did his. Most of the vessels sent to Scot- land were barks, fit only to carry passengers, and not capable of transporting arms and ammunition. By these conveyances however, several sums of money were sent, and particularly sixty thousand livres in gold at one time, of which so good care was taken, that every farthing of it was lost: Arms and ammunition were to be got but two ways. They were either to be bought and sent into Scotland, or such quantities, as had been before promised, were to be made use of.
That there was not one farthing to buy them with,
is so true, that my Lord may appeal to those of St.

Germain's, who had the management of the money, upon this head. The little cash that was procured, was either sent in specie to Scotland, or employed in answering the bills that were constantly drawing from the coasts. And besides, if money had not been wanting, the necessary orders for buying, conveying to the coasts, and imbarcking, could not have been procured. My Lord imagines, when the Duke of Ormond reflects, he cannot but be sensible of this truth, since he cannot be ignorant, that a quantity of arms, he thought himself sure of in October, were in February still in the same place, and no nearer being sent than the first day. As for sending such arms and stores as were already provided, my Lord knew of but two parcels; one, and that a small one, might have been in Scotland in October or November, had the directions given by my Lord been pursued. Why they were not, he will not say; but the fault is, that those arms and stores are at this hour rotting in a magazine at Morlaix, where they have lain these five months. As to the other parcel of arms and stores, it is that which you call Count Castel Blanco's, and contains a very large quantity of both. This Castel Blanco is a Spaniard, who, by the merit of marrying Lord Melfort's daughter, sets up for a manager of English business. But that those arms and stores belonged to him, is no more true, than that other report, equally current, of his having advanced one million and seven hundred thousand livres for the service of England and Scotland.
His name had indeed been made use of for buying those arms and stores in the late King of France's time; and his name was to be made use of again, if, at last, on that pretence, the French King would let them go; which is still a doubtful point; and to cover them as arms and stores going for Spain, and intended for the West-Indies. It is silly to say, that orders from my Lord were wanting to send them. These orders could not have been of another kind; and such orders could not be got sooner, or in any other manner than they were got. This is a point my Lord cannot speak plain upon; and it must therefore rest here, whether this Castel Blanco, one Mr. Franc, and such other meddling people, deserve the best credit. I think it proper, however, to add, that in a fortnight's time, after there was the least appearance of being able to

1715. the King and Kingdom. This was followed with an address for the Earl's being removed from the King's Council and Service; which was complied with. The Lords Justices also thought fit, at that juncture, to secure several suspected persons, as the Earl of Antrim, the Earl of Westmeath, the Lord Nutterville, the Lord Calbir, the Lord Dillon, and some others, and then adjourned the two Houses to the 8th of March.

The Parliament met in England on the 9th of January, when the King made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THE zeal and affection to my Government, and the vigilant care for the safety of the Nation, which you have shewn in your respective Counties, have not only fully answered my expectations, but give me assurances, that you are met together, resolved to act with a spirit becoming a time of common danger, and with such a vigour as will end in the confusion of all those, who have openly engaged in this Rebellion, and in the shame and reproach of such, as by secret and malicious insinuations have fomented, or, by an avowed indifference encouraged this traitorous enterprize.

"It is, I doubt not, a great satisfaction to you, to have observed, that the powers, you intrusted me with for the preservation of the public safety, have been employed in the most proper and effectual manner, and made strictly subservient to those purposes only, for which you intended them. And you must have had the pleasure to reflect with me, that as the measures taken for our defence have been just and necessary; so it has pleased the Divine Providence to bless them with a series of suitable success. And I cannot but take this opportunity of doing justice to the officers and soldiers of the army, whose brave and faithful discharge of their duty, has disappointed our enemies, and contributed so much to the safety of the Nation.

"I did hope, that the detestable and preventing the designed insurrections in some parts of the Kingdom, and the defeating in others those, who had taken up arms against me, would have put an end to this Rebellion. But it is plain, that our enemies, animated by some secret hopes of assistance, are still endeavouring to support this desperate undertaking; and the Pretender, as I have reason to believe, is now landed in Scotland.

"It is however with pleasure I can acquaint you, that notwithstanding these intestine commotions, Great-Britain has, in some measure, recovered its influence and reputation abroad. The treaty for settling the barrier for the Netherlands is now fully concluded between to send away the stores and ships, and all other measures necessary, were got ready and prepared, without any noise or the least suspicion, they might have been in Scotland, had they not been at last stopped by the French (which I still say is a doubtful point) in five or six days time, when my Lord Mar and his company from Scotland landed at Gravelin; from whence orders, as I afterwards heard, were sent to every place, to stop all manner of embarkation.

What is said under the second head, may serve as an answer to the fourth, as well as to the second letter.

As to the third article, upon General Hamilton's arrival, my Lord represented where it was proper, all that he brought by letter and by word of mouth, the very next morning. It is therefore a simple lie, and worthy of those, who scribble from this side of the water, to say, that General Hamilton was amused for twelve days, as if, during all that time, the purport of his message had been kept a secret. It is to be supposed, that the Regent's and the *s Ministers would not have conferred with a man of his circumstances, and who came on such an errand; but if supposing they had not these scruples, of what use was it for them to see him, when he could tell them nothing more than they knew already? But, be that as it will, I can assure you, that my Lord, if he could have given him the opportunity, would, which, it seems, so much weight is laid upon.

The fifth article of that letter contains the most impudent falsehood that ever was invented. Without money and the orders above said, no merchant could or would undertake to transport any quantity of arms or ammunition; and I am able to cite some very great bargains of this kind, which my Lord brought to bear, which failed at last for want of money, and the necessary countenance. The latter part of the article is an accusation of incredible weakness; my Lord is said to have insisted on a public order, and to have declined making use of private methods for the embarkation of arms and ammunition. I remember indeed, that when preparation was made for sending away the arms and ammunition from Haere, as if they were going for Spain, and a ship had been provided for that purpose by my Lord, which no man living suspected, he had the greatest difficulties imaginable to keep these wife people from imbarcking part of the stores aboard a vessel, which every body knew to belong to the Chevalier. As to the sixth article, no body is better able to answer it than myself, since I entered all the letters which my Lord writ; and there was no less than five dispatched before Mr. Hamilton came into France, by whom my Lord received the first letter of business after the *s landing there. Some of those were lost at Sea, and the three last packets were brought back to my Lord, the Gentlemen, that carried them, being arrived too late in Scotland.

This, Sir, I give you by my Lord's direction. He ordered me to add, that he employed the utmost diligence he was master of; and he believes it sufficient to carry him through such work as he has been concerned in of late, since it carried him formerly through his business of another-guest sort. That he all along saw, there was nothing but mortification to be met with, and reputation to be lost, among the people with whom he had to do; and that it was impossible for a man to act upon the principles he brought out of England with him, and have kept his ground here. That he never had any correspondence, directly or indirectly, with my Lord Marlborough, or any man belonging to the Court of England, since he engaged in this business. That he defies his worst enemies to advance the least shadow of proof of any thing of this kind. That, as he was incapable of betraying a trust while it subsisted, so it is with the utmost reluctance, that, in his own justification, he is obliged to say what he has said; and that he shall be very sorry, if the same necessity oblige him to say more. That nothing shall ever oblige him to repair his fortune at the expence of betraying any man; but that, since he is treated in this violent manner, he thinks himself at liberty to give his friends a true state of the fact, and to declare, that he never will, upon any account, or upon any solicitation, serve the same people again: That he has withdrawn himself almost intirely from the world; and that in his retreat he shall heartily pray for the prosperity of his Friends and of his Country; and, without very much fear of what is to come, comfort himself with the testimony of a good conscience.

The

1715-16. " the Emperor and States-General under my guaranty. The King of Spain has agreed to a treaty, by which that valuable branch of our commerce will be delivered from the new impositions and hardships, to which it was subjected by the late treaties; and will stand settled for the future, on a foot more advantageous and certain than it ever did, in the most flourishing time of any of my Predecessors; and the treaty, for renewing all former Alliances between the Crown of Great-Britain and the States-General, is brought very near to its conclusion.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" I must rely on your affection to me, and your care and concern for the safety of the Nation, to grant me such Supplies, as may enable me to restore, and to secure the peace of the Kingdom; and I will order estimates of the necessary expences to be laid before you.

" Among the many unavoidable ill consequences of this Rebellion, none affects me more sensibly, than that extraordinary burden, which it has and must create to my faithful subjects. To ease them as far as lies in my power, I take this first opportunity of declaring, that I will freely give up all the estates, that shall become forfeited to the Crown by this Rebellion, to be applied towards defraying the extraordinary expence incurred on this occasion.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" It is matter of the greatest uneasiness to me; that the first years of my Reign, the whole course of which I wished to have transmitted to posterity, distinguished by the fair and endearing marks of peace and clemency, should be clouded and overcast by so unnatural a Rebellion; which, however impotent and unsuccessful a due care may render it in all other respects, does most sensibly afflict me, by the calamities it has brought on many of my faithful subjects, and by those indispensible returns of severity which their sufferings, and the public safety do most justly call for. Under this concern, my greatest comfort is, that I cannot reproach myself with having given the least provocation to that spirit of discontent and calumny, that has been let loose against me, or the least pretence for kindling the flame of this Rebellion.

" Let those, whose fatal counsels laid the foundation of all these mischiefs, and those, whose private discontents and disappointments disguised under false pretences, have betrayed great numbers of deluded people into their own destruction, answer for the miseries in which they have involved their fellow-subjects. I question not, but that, with the continuance of

The fourth letter was as follows:

Paris, April 14, 1716.

I hope you have received my last of the 9th instant, which, with my former, will give you a light into affairs here, and be an answer to the articles you sent. There are abundance of things more my Lord could say to clear himself, but he rather chuses to be silent.

Those on this side, who first raised the storm, begin to be sensible of their folly. My Lord all along has acted like a wife, prudent, and honest man: They quite the contrary. And would they have staid a very few days longer in Scotland, (which every body now agrees they might have done) they would have had such afflictions, which in all probability must have restored them.

There are many more circumstances, which I am not at liberty to mention. All is referred to, &c.

A reply to the foregoing letter:

S I R,

I had the favour of yours, and return you thanks for the copies you inclosed of the letters writ by the Lord Bolingbroke's orders, the first of which was without a date; the rest of the 4th, 8th and 18th of April. I was pleased to find the *'s conduct, in removing his Lordship, thoroughly cleared by the weakness of his defence. And when I read the scurrilous passages of his letters, as that he was turned out in the most abrupt and injurious manner, and had met with villainous and ungrateful treatment, I was filled with indignation to see the best of Princes insulted by an unworthy subject, a negligent Minister excusing his faults at the expence of his Master's honour, and wiping off his own guilt by throwing it on the Dukes of Ormond and Mar, who had given such unquestionable proofs of their P—y and loyalty.

Though you desire a particular answer to his Lordship's letters, I am persuaded, that it is your opinion, that they do not deserve it. However, to gratify your curiosity, I will put his management of the *'s affairs in so true a light, as must convince every loyal subject of the necessity of displacing him.

His Lordship's letters are not calculated so much to clear himself, as to weaken the *'s interest in England, and to discourage all correspondence with him. He has given general answers to particular charges. There are evident marks of guilt and concern at the discovery of his actions in every line; and an innocent man with his Lordship's pen, could have made a more plausible defence. Before I enter into particulars, I cannot but observe, that his narrative of facts is as true as the accounts he gives of himself, that he was 'with-drawn from the world: That in this retreat he will heartily pray for the prosperity of his friends, and comfort himself with the testimony of a good conscience.' The goodness of his conscience will appear from the discharge of the trust reposed in him: And they, who are acquainted with his Lordship's character, must be surprized at his reflection on the immorality and bad characters of others.

The substance of his Lordship's apology for himself is, 'That, if they wanted arms and powder in Scotland, it was not his fault: That he had neither money to buy them with, nor could he obtain orders for imbarcking them. That without money, and the necessary orders to the Officers of the ports, no private Merchant could or would undertake to ship off any quantity. That the * and Duke of Mar say in their letters, they must have left Scotland, had they had all the arms and powder in France: And that, if they had staid a few days longer, they would have had ten thousand arms, thirty thousand weight of powder, and other stores in proportion.' And he modestly concludes, 'That he has all along acted like a prudent, honest, and wise man, and they (that is, the * and Dukes of Ormond and Mar) quite the contrary.'

There are other particulars observed by his Lordship, which shall be remarked in their proper place; and you may be assured, that I will give you an impartial narrative of facts: That I will mention nothing but what the Dukes of Ormond and Mar will attest upon 1715-16. " of God's blessing, who alone is able to form good out of evil, and with the cheerful assistance of my Parliament, we shall, in a short time, see this Rebellion end, not only in restoring the tranquillity of my Government, but in procuring a firm and lasting Establishment of that excellent Constitution in Church and State, which it was manifestly designed to subvert; and that this open and flagrant attempt in favour of Popery, will abolish all other distinctions among us, but of such as are zealous assertors of the Liberties of their Country, the present Establishment, and the Protestant Religion, and of such, as are endeavouring to subject the Nation to the revenge and tyranny of a Popish Pretender."

Proceedings of the Parliament.

The Lords and Commons presented severally very loyal addresses of thanks for this speech. The Commons declared, they thought themselves obliged, in justice to their injured Country, to prosecute, in the most vigorous and impartial manner, the Authors of those destructive counsels, which had drawn down these miseries upon the Nation. They began with expelling Mr. Forster, General of the Northumbrian Rebels, and after a remarkable speech, to shew the necessity of proceeding by way of impeachment, Mr. Lechmere impeached the Earl of Derwentwater of High-Treason, and undertook to make the impeachment good. Mr. Pulteney impeached the Lord Widdrington; Mr. Boscaawen, the Earl of Nithisdale; Mr. Hampden, the Earl of Wintoun; the Lord Finch, the Earl of Carnwarth; the Earl of Hertford, Viscount Kenmare; and Mr. Wortley Montague, the Lord Nairn. Then Mr. Lechmere, and the rest, were ordered to carry up their several impeachments to the Lords; which being done, a Committee was appointed to draw up the articles against the seven impeached Lords. Mr. Lechmere, Chairman of the Committee, in less than two hours reported, that the articles were drawn up: which being agreed to, were carried by him to the Lords the same day.

The next day, the impeached Lords were all brought to the bar of the House of Lords, where the articles of impeachment against them were read, and they were ordered to put in their answer on the 16th, and, upon their request, such persons, as they should think proper to assist them in their defence, were allowed to come to them.

The impeachments being lodged, the Commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to continue the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act for six months longer; which was opposed by Mr. Shippen. He said, 'It invaded the most valuable right of Englishmen; encouraged malicious informations, and gave a handle to those in power to oppress innocent people.' Mr. Secretary Stanhope appealed to the whole House, Whether the King or his Ministry had made an ill or wanton use of the power which the Parliament upon their honour: And if there wanted any additional proof, that the truth of every article might be confirmed by the testimony of several Gentlemen of probity, who were employed.

The printed letter from an Officer in the *'s army, after it had marched Northwards from Aberdeen, will inform you of the state of affairs in Scotland; and the extreme want they were in of arms and ammunition. The Duke of Mar, by six several expresses, solicited Lord Bolingbroke for an immediate supply. In all his letters he assures him, that numbers of men would join him, if he had arms for them; and that he wanted powder for the few arms that he had. His Lordship's excuse, that, till General Hamilton's arrival, he did not know, that there was a particular want of powder, more than of any other species, is false and frivolous; for the want of powder was specified in several letters; and his Lordship understands English too well not to know, that powder is principally intended by the word ammunition.

The want of money to provide arms is as groundless, as his other pretensions. For, though the * did not abound in money, there was always a sufficient sum for that service. Ten shillings is the price of a new musket, and, since the reduction of the troops in France, serviceable arms were to be had at 20 d. a piece; and his Lordship probably means such second hand arms by the great bargains he brought to bear, but failed for want of money.

His Lordship declines answering the charge of his infitting on a public order, and neglecting private methods of embarkation; and slides off into an idle story of a ship at Hevre de Grace, which, supposing it true, is nothing to the purpose. He knew, that a public order would not be granted; and he owns, that a connivance from the Officers might be depended upon; and therefore it may be presumed, that his conduct in this case was to amuse the *'s friends in Scotland, and cover his wilful neglect of them. His Lordship's first excuse, though not mentioned in any of his letters, for not sending arms, was, 'left the going of many ships through the channel should draw the attention of the enemy's fleet that way, and endanger the *'s passage.' But, what reason can be given why arms and ammunition were not sent in the ships, that went to Scotland before the *, or in those that followed him? Why some arms and powder were not put in every one of them that parted from France? And as a dozen ships arrived safe, they might have carried a sufficient supply of every thing that was wanting. The smallness of the ships is a poor plea; for, if they were fit to transport passengers, they might also have carried some powder, and some arms; and supposing they could not, why were such useless vessels provided for that service? Of what moment was it to send Officers to command men, who, as his Lordship knew, were neither furnished with powder nor arms? Besides, those ships, which arrived in Scotland, were each of them of sufficient bulk to carry arms and ammunition.

His Lordship appeals to the Duke of Ormond for the truth of a passage in his third letter, 'That a quantity of arms, which his Grace thought himself sure of in October, were in February still in the same place, and no nearer being sent than the first day; and that a small parcel might have been in Scotland in October or November, had the direction given by his Lordship been pursued; and that these arms and stores are now rotting in a magazine at Morlaix.' Though his Lordship pretends an unwillingness to mention where the fault of not sending this supply lay, he strongly intimates, that the Duke of Ormond was blameable in it; and with what sincerity that reflection on his Grace was made, will be best judged from a true account of the circumstances of that affair.

The ship laden with the arms above-mentioned arrived in the river of Morlaix the 24th of December, when the Duke of Ormond returned from his second attempt to land in England. W—n, the master of the vessel, said he was too deeply laden, and too small to undertake a voyage to Scotland in that rigorous season of the year. It was then resolved to put them on board of another ship, commanded by H—s, and the only vessel that could be procured in that port at that time. H—s's ship was foul, and hauled ashore to be cleaned. His crew were afraid of being taken at sea, and on that account

1715-16. Parliament had thought fit to intrust his Majesty. And Mr. Hungerford himself owned The Government had used that power with great moderation. After which, the bill passed both Houses.

On the 16th of January a bill was brought in to attain the Earl of Mar, William Murray, commonly called Marquis of Tullibardine, the Earl of Linlithgow, and John Drummond, commonly called Lord Drummond. The bill was prepared by Mr. Smith, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Lord Coningsby, and Mr. Lechmere, and had an easy passage through both houses.

On the 21st of January the King came to the House of Peers, and gave his assent to the Act for continuing the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus. Then the Lord Chancellor read the following speech of his Majesty to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Had reason to believe, when I spoke last to you, that the Pretender was landed in Scotland. The accounts I have received since put it beyond all doubt, that he is heading the Rebellion there, and does assume the style and title of King of these Realms. His adherents do likewise confidently affirm, that assurances are given them of support from abroad. This Parliament hath on all occasions expressed so much duty to me, and so true a regard for the religious and civil rights of my people, that I am persuaded, this day ring presumption of our enemies will heighten your just indignation against them, and begot such further resolutions, as, with the blessing of God, will enable me to defeat their attempts.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The most effectual way to put a speedy end to these troubles will be to make such a provision, as may discourage any foreign power from assisting the Rebels. I do therefore hope, that every sincere Protestant, and true Briton, will look upon the extraordinary expence, which a preparation may require, to be the best husbandry; since it will, in all human probability, prevent that desolation and those calamities, which would unavoidably ensue, if the Rebellion should be suffered to spread, and be supported by Popish forces from abroad.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The world must be convinced by all you have already done, that you have nothing but the honour and interest of your Country at heart: And, for my own part, I rely intirely upon you, and doubt not but you will take such resolutions at this juncture, as will be most for the present safety, and future ease of my people."

mutinied, and most of them deserted; and while another crew was providing, on the 3d of January, the Adventure, and the Charles-Galley, two English men of war, came into the river, and anchored near her. Information was given to the Captains, that H—'s ship belonged to the *, and that W—'n was laden with arms for his Majesty's service. Whereupon W—'s vessel was unloaded in the night, and the arms were privately conveyed to a magazine. The two men of war remained in the river till the beginning of March; and it was impracticable for H—'s to sail while they were there, because out of the river is narrow, and it was impossible to pass the men of war unobserved, even in the night. In the mean time, the utmost endeavours were used to remedy this accident: It was resolved to carry the arms a few leagues by land, and an agreement was made for a ship, that lay out of the reach of the men of war to carry them to Scotland; but afterwards the owner's heart failed him, and he peremptorily refused to stand to the bargain. The truth of these particulars is attested by his Grace the Duke of Ormond, and Captain Gamcock's journal; and when his Lordship recollects himself, he cannot be ignorant of them.

Thus you see the true reasons of the miscarriage of the supply, that the accidents could neither be prevented nor remedied; that this 'parcel of arms might have been in Scotland in October or November, if his directions had been pursued,' though these directions were dated from Paris the 16th of December, and the ships that were to carry them, arrived in the port the 24th: That his Lordship's exactness in other points may be judged of by this small instance; and that a mistake of two months in a fact of so late a date can hardly be excused as a failure in point of memory.

That ships might have been privately sent without a public order, is evident, because that quantity of arms, which Lord Bolingbroke lays were still rotting in a magazine at Morlaix, were sent by the * to Scotland soon after his return to France, and a month before the date of his Lordship's letter; and two other ships laden with arms and stores were also sent from another port.

And this was done at a time when the *'s affairs were desperate, and without the privacy and consent of the French Court.

In short, Lord Bolingbroke's defence on every particular of this head is weak and superficial. Several private Merchants would have supplied the * with arms, if they had been applied to by his Lordship. Neither the * nor the Duke of Mar affirm in their letters, that they must leave Scotland, though they had all the arms and ammunition of France. The eight thousand arms, &c. lying at Havre, would have been sent by a Gentleman, who was zealous for the *'s success, if he had not been amused for several months, and diverted from applying for an order, by his Lordship's saying, that he would obtain one: And the ten thousand arms, and the thirty thousand weight of powder, which he says would have been sent to Scotland, if they had staid a few days longer, were not procured by his Lordship, but by a Gentleman, who was sent by the * from Scotland, and who, being convinced of his Lordship's former neglects, applied for a supply of arms elsewhere, and upon his own credit obtained it.

About the same time the Duke of Ormond procured fifteen thousand arms with a proportionable quantity of ammunition without the privacy or assistance of the Lord Bolingbroke.

Another remarkable circumstance of his Lordship's conduct was, the variety of excuses he made to those Gentlemen, who came express from Scotland, for not sending arms and ammunition. In September and October he said he was providing them. In November, that the sending them through the channel would endanger the *'s passage: In December and January, that the Court of France would neither grant arms nor ammunition; and his Lordship had probably pretences in reserve for every month in the year. What reason then had his Majesty to expect a supply of arms after so many repeated delays? And with what injustice does his Lordship charge the * and the Duke of Mar with precipitation in leaving Scotland, when the necessity they were in of coming away was intirely occasioned by his neglect?

His

1715-16. Both Houses presented addresses to his Majesty; full of expressions of duty and affection, and the most hearty assurances of their assistance against the daring presumption of the Pretender and his Adherents.

The impeached Lords plead guilty.

The impeached Lords having, on the 16th of January, petitioned the House of Peers for longer time to put in their answers to the articles of impeachment; they were allowed time till Thursday the 19th, upon which day all of them, except the Earl of Wintoun (who upon his petition had till the 23d allowed him) were brought from the Tower to the bar of the House of Peers, where they severally pleaded guilty to the articles of their impeachment, but urged some things, by way of answer, to extenuate their guilt. The Earl of Derwentwater's answer was in writings, as were also the answers of the Lord Widdrington, and the Earl of Nithsdale. The answers of the Earl of Carnarvon and the Lord Kenmore were delivered viva voce ; and the Lord Nairn delivered in a petition to the Lords in writing. Having thus pleaded guilty, the 9th of February was appointed for their receiving sentence. Upon which day they were all brought to the bar of the Court erected in Westminster-Hall, and had sentence, as in case of High-Treason, pronounced against them by the Lord Chancellor Cowper, Lord High-Steward on that occasion.

They are condemned, Feb. 9.

The Commons having put the case of the Rebel Lords in a course of Justice, they turned their thoughts to the rest of the Prætor prisoners, who were brought up to London; and, to prevent the formality of sending them into Lancashire to be tried, they brought in a bill to remove those difficulties, which obstructed the course of justice; and, as this was only to be a temporary law, so the occasion was specified in the title, which was, An Act for the speedy trial of such persons, as have levied war against his Majesty during the present Rebellion.

About the same time Mr. Lechmere moved for an address to the King, for a proclamation, offering a general pardon to such as were yet in arms in Scotland, who should lay them down within a certain time, with such restrictions and limitations, as the King should think fit. This motion was strongly opposed by Mr. Pulteney, the Lord Coningsby, and some others, who represented the ill effects which such a proclamation might have both at home and abroad, in the present juncture of affairs. What had most weight in this debate was urged by Mr. Walpole, who contented himself with saying, he would not inquire into the reasons of this motion, but he had been offered sixty thousand pounds for the life of one single person. This gave Mr. Lechmere an occasion to vindicate his integrity and honest intentions; but finding, what he had proposed was not thought consistent with the King's and the Nation's service, he did not insist upon it. The next day, Major Stuart, Aid de Camp to the Duke of Argyle, and Captain Morton, Aid de Camp to General Cadogan, arrived at St. James's with advice, that the Rebels

His Lordship answers the articles of accusing General Hamilton by calling it a simple lie. Whether his Lordship represented the contents of his message, where it was proper, depends upon his own word. 'Tis probable, that the person hinted at by his Lordship would not have scrupled to have the state of affairs in Scotland from the mouth of one, who was so fully instructed in it; and that such an interview would have been attended with a good effect. And it may reasonably be inferred, that his Lordship was faulty in that case, because he did not communicate the *s letters, which that Gentleman brought, to the Queen or the Duke of Ormond, for several days after he had received them, though the * had commanded him to shew them to her Majesty; and before he went to Scotland, had given his Lordship positive instructions to act in concert with his Grace, and to communicate every particular of his affairs to him.

His Lordship endeavours to refute the charge of his being often denied to those, who came about business, with a groundless and malicious distinction; for he was seldom to be found by those who were sent by the Duke of Mar to him, by Officers of distinction, who daily pressed him to be dispatched to Scotland, and even by persons, whom he himself employed. And were it proper to mention names, particular instances might be given of his conduct in this point.

His Lordship, in what he falsely calls a general state of things on this side the water, has represented the Duke of Ormond in the blackest terms, that malice could devise, 'as an associate with a nest of hornets; as heading a faction composed of persons of the vilest characters, who are despised for their folly, and detested for their immorality'; and he qualifies this heavy charge with a profession of a very particular respect for his Grace, and by saying, 'that his Grace was drawn indirectly in to do the work of the faction here, and was far from designing any such thing.'

With what view this virulent slander on his Grace was framed, may be easily conjectured, and to beat down his Grace's reputation, if it were possible, would be acknowledged by the— as a considerable service to him. His Grace's character is too well known in England to stand in need of a justification, and what Lord Bellingbrooke intended as a reflection on the Duke of Ormond will be acknowledged by every honest man here, that his Grace observed at Paris a quite contrary conduct from his Lordship. His Grace, it is true, opened his doors to every Gentleman, who came to wait upon him: He thought it was for the *s service to receive those persons with civility, who cheerfully offered to embark in it: That those Gentlemen, who were ready to hazard their lives in the same cause with his Grace, ought not to be treated with contempt: And that his Lordship's conduct was imprudent and unseemly.

The sincerity of his Lordship's profession of respect for the Duke of Ormond will appear from his behaviour to his Grace here; and you are not a stranger to the design, that was formed by his Lordship in July 1714, to set Lord Churchill at the head of the army. His Lordship laboured upon all occasions to vilify his Grace, and to paint him in the foulest colours to his Majesty. Upon his Grace's first expedition into England, he endeavoured to persuade a Gentleman, who had promised to accompany him, not to go; he told him, that the Duke of Ormond would certainly be never heard of more; and that it was a rash and foolish enterprise he was going upon: And by the discovery of his Grace's designs at that time, and his Lordship's conduct since, it may be presumed he had good reasons to be assured, that the attempt would miscarry.

When the Duke had returned from his second voyage to England, and waited on the coast of France, for another opportunity, Lord Bellingbrooke wrote to him to come nearer Paris, and promised to meet his Grace, in order to concert measures with him. His Grace complied with the proposal, named a place at twelve leagues distance from Paris, and was punctual to the time appointed. Lord Bellingbrooke came about ten days after: Instead of discoursing about business, he drank to excess, and early on the second day after his coming, he returned to Paris, without saying any thing to the purpose. Though his Grace had great reason to resent this, 1715-16. bels had abandoned Perth, and were flying before the King's forces: And therefore the publishing a proclamation for a general pardon, at such a juncture, would have shewed a weakness in the Government, and encouraged foreign powers to support the Rebels. About this time the Pretender sent a letter to the Lord-Mayor of London, with orders to proclaim him King of Great-Britain; which was communicated to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Baron Bury, Mr. Justice Eyre, and Mr. Baron Mountague, having been appointed to try the Rebels at Liverpool, there were a considerable number found guilty; and Richard Shuttleworth of Presfon, a Papist; Roger Moncaster of Garfham, an Attorney; Thomas Cowpe, William Butler, and William Ackworth, were executed at Presfon, on the 28th of January; and John Rowbotham, James Blundel, James Burne, James Knub, William Whalley, and John Mac Gillivray, were executed at Wigan on the 10th of February; Richard Charley, Esq; James Drummond, William Black, Donald Macdonald, Rorie Kennedy, and John Ord, executed at Presfon on the 9th of February; and Thomas Sydal, William Harris, Stephen Seager, Joseph Porter, and John Finch, executed at Manchester on the 11th of February.

About one thousand of the Rebel prisoners at Lancaster, Liverpool, and Chester, submitted to the King's mercy, and petitioned for transportation.

In the mean time, great solicitations were made with the Court, and with the Members of both Houses of Parliament, in behalf of the six condemned Lords, particularly in favour of the Earl of Derwentwater. On the 13th of February, the Counts of Niubisdale and the Lord Nairn's Lady, watching an opportunity, when the King went thro' the apartments of the palace at St. James's, behind a window-curtain, without being presented by the Lord of the Bed-chamber in waiting, as usual, on a sudden threw themselves at the King's feet, begging mercy for their husbands. This abrupt and irregular application could not but surprize the King, and those about him, and therefore proved as ineffectual as those which had been made in a more becoming and less artful manner. For, a few days after, a resolution was taken in Council, to cause the sentence passed on these Lords to be executed; for which purpose, the necessary warrants and orders were, on the 18th of February, sent, both to the Lieutenant of the Tower, and to the Sheriffs of the City of London and Middlesex. The next morning, the Counts of Derwentwater, attended by her Sister, and accompanied by the Duchesses of Cleveland and Bolton, and several other Ladies of the first rank, was by the Dukes of Richmond and St. Albans introduced into the King's Bed-chamber, where she humbly implored his clemency for her unfortunate consort; and then withdrew.

this usage, he resolved at that juncture to submit to it, and complied with another proposal of his Lordship's to come to Paris, because that the thought, when he was in the same place with his Lordship, he could not easily find an opportunity to amuse him longer. His Grace, was for four days in Paris, before he had a visit from his Lordship, tho' he sent repeated messages to him. At length he came, when dinner was on the table. Before dinner was half done, he rose up hastily, and pretended urgent business to call him away. For some days after his Grace could not possibly find him out.

Can it be imagined, that such insolent treatment of his Grace could proceed from any person, who had not a quite different interest in view? And, as the Duke of Ormond, it was a stronger motive to induce his Majesty to remove him.

I am not surprized at the Lord Bolingbroke's appealing to the Duke of Berwick, and that he is willing to stand or fall by his judgment; for I believe that Duke will for the same reasons appeal to his Lordship to clear himself. No part of his behaviour is more wonderful than his sudden intimacy with the Duke of Berwick. He formerly mentioned, on all occasions, that Duke with disregard, and would neither allow him capacity for business nor credit. But, soon after his Grace had disobeyed his Sovereign's commands to go to Scotland, there became a close union betwixt them, which still continues, though the Duke had commanded his Lordship not to communicate any part of his business to him; And it may be observed, that his Lordship did not reside at St. Germain's, where he owns that he held the closest friendship, till two months after his Grace's refusal to go to Scotland. If his Grace had a hundred times more capacity and credit than the rest of the Duke's subjects in France, he has lost some part of his credit by his undutiful behaviour to his Royal Master; and a person, who refuses to serve in his province at a time when his service is required and wanted, may be reputed not to be of that Court, as his Lordship observes, though he has lodgings in it; and he should have added, that he had at that time a considerable pension from it. I am persuaded, his avarice, as he calls it, with the Duke of Berwick owes its original to another cause, than the opinion he had of his Grace's capacity; and that his Grace was the channel of correspondence betwixt his Lordship and a certain Lord in England. For though his Lordship denies his having any correspondence with him, or any of the Court of England, there are good reasons to suspect him of it, as the old intimacy between them; his Lordship's leaving England upon his advice; and the visit he paid him the evening before he left London; not to mention the sneaking letter, he sent from France to Mr. Stanhope: And even his Lordship qualifies the denial of such a correspondence, by saying, that he held none since he engaged in the Duke's business, which, by the way, was three months after his coming to France.

This correspondence with a person, who had upon several occasions betrayed the Church of England, and sacrificed his own Country to a foreign Prince, is a pregnant instance of his Lordship's resolution to serve the Duke upon a Protestant and English bottom, or not to serve at all.

His Lordship's assertion, 'That the source of all business, and the heads of his best friends, were trusted to the keeping of a multitude of people, some of whom were of the vilest characters,' is as groundless as his other calumnies; and it may be easily guessed for what end this slander was invented. And though his Lordship is pleased to charge others with want of secrecy, I can assure you, that in the midst of his wine he discovered secrets of the greatest importance to some of the very persons, whom he now represents in such black characters, and that they expressed a concern at his imprudence.

I am confident his Lordship's design to cut off all correspondence with the Duke's subjects at home will fail of success, when they consider they are in less danger by his removal; and that his Majesty has been pleased to chuse one in his stead, who is not only incapable of betraying a trust, while it subsists, as his Lordship speaks, but an inviolable observer of a trust for ever, and of tried prudence and secrecy in business.

His Lordship, to heighten the charge on the conduct of business, is here pleased to add, that it passes through the hands of a whole tribe of Jesuits, though his Lordship cannot be ignorant, that no person of

It is very probable, the Countess of Derwentwater received no favourable answer from the Court; for, on the 21st of February, she, with the Ladies of some other condemned Lords, and about twenty more of distinction, went to the Lobby of the House of Peers to beg their intercession: But the Lords did not then think fit to take notice of their petitions. The next morning, the Ladies in distress, with a still greater attendance than the day before, went to Westminster, to petition both Houses of Parliament, where, by this time, not a few Members appeared inclined to mercy. Sir Richard Steele, among the rest, offered one of these petitions, and made a long speech upon that subject, and was seconded by Mr. Farrar, Mr. Shippen, and some others; but they were opposed by all the leading Members of the prevailing side; and, though a great many, who used to vote with them, went over on this occasion to the other party, yet a motion being made, and the question put for adjourning to the 1st of March, the adjournment was carried by a majority of seven voices only, a hundred and sixty two, to a hundred and fifty-five.

The Ladies of the condemned Lords were more successful with the Peers than with the Commons. The Duke of Richmond, a near relation of the Earl of Derwentwater, and one of the Lords allowed by the House to assist him, could not refuse presenting a petition in his favour, but at the same time he declared, he would be against it. The Earl of Derby, out of pity for the numerous family of the Lord Nairn, charged himself with a petition in his behalf, as other Lords did upon the like or different motives, with other petitions. The question being put, Whether these petitions should be received and read, there arose a great debate, in which the Lord Townshend, and several other Lords, who upon all occasions had given undoubted proofs of their affection to the present settlement, were against it, but the Earl of Nottingham, to their great surprize, declaring for it, his weight, as President of the Council, drew to that side several Peers; so the question was carried by nine or ten voices. After the reading of the petitions, the next question was, Whether, in the case of an impeachment, the King has any power to reprieve? This being also carried in the affirmative, the same was followed by a motion for an address, to desire the King to grant a reprieve to the Lords, who lay under sentence of death. This was opposed by the firmest friends of the Government; and even an Earl, who was for the two first questions, represented, 'That though clemency was one of the brightest virtues that adorn and support a Crown; yet, in his opinion, the same should be exercised with discretion, and only on proper objects.' And therefore moved, 'That they should address the King to reprieve such of the condemned Lords, as should deserve his mercy.' This, after some further debate, was carried. Then the Earl of Stamford moved, That the time of respite be left to the King, which was readily agreed to; and then the address with these amendments was carried by a majority of five voices only. To this address the King answered, 'That on this and all other occasions, he would do what he thought most consistent with the dignity of his Crown, and the safety of his people.'

This wise and resolute answer proved, the next day that order was ever employed in business by the * or Queen.

His Lordship's insinuation, of the riveted prejudices of one person, has the same malicious view; and tho' his Lordship affirms, that from the very first, he began to combat them with great decency and firmness, it is certain he never spoke of his having such a design, till a few days before the * had fixed his departure for Britain. And it must be owned, that several worthy men, who were then at Paris, thought it an improper time to press his Majesty on that head, when he had not leisure to inquire into it; and that his Lordship was not the most proper person to talk of religion.

Another slander, in his Lordship's letter, is, that he was * discarded with all the circumstances of provocation possible, and treated, as far as it lay in the power of those whom he served, with an affectation of indignation and contempt; for the * dismissed him by a letter, without assigning any reason for his pleasure, and commanded the Duke of Ormond to carry it. His Majesty, in tenderness to his Lordship, of whom he had once a good opinion, took this course; and, besides, he thought it below his Royal dignity to descend to a paper quarrel. And if his Lordship had followed the advice that was given him, to lie quiet, his Character would not so soon have been exposed in its true light.

I could give many other instances of his Lordship's neglect of the *'s business, at a time when he had the sole management of it; and to name but one: His Lordship for ten days neglected to send the Duke of Mar's new commission, to command in Scotland, which was so much wanted, upon an idle pretence of sending a long and trifling memorial in cyphers along with it.

His Lordship's behaviour to his equals and inferiors was not only contemptuous, but his treatment of the Queen was insolent to the last degree. To insult Majesty in distress aggravates the crime; and such a carriage to the *'s mother is an evident proof of want of duty to his Majesty. And though his Lordship's friends industriously reported, that he was dissuaded by her advice, and from thence drew malicious inferences; you may be assured, that it was the concurrent opinion of the Duke of Ormond, and all the *'s friends here, to displace him, and that her Majesty had no hand in his removal.

What the principles were, his Lordship says, he brought out of England with him, I don't know, having never had reason to believe, that he gave himself much trouble about any. That they were not the principles of the Tories, is plain, from his representation of that party to the French Court, and his expressions in conversation, that he never expected much good from the Tories.

His Lordship concludes, that there are abundance of things more, that he could say to clear himself, but, by the scurrility of his letters, it may be presumed, that he has omitted nothing, in tenderness to any person whatsoever. And the reason given for saying no more, that those on this side, who first began the storm, are sensible of their folly, is notoriously false. And, as his actions are better understood here, than they possibly can be on your side, every honest man in France is thoroughly convinced of his ill conduct, and that his Majesty had just and wise reasons to remove him.

This letter has swelled to a greater bulk than at first I imagined. Upon the whole, I leave you to judge, whether the *, the Dukes of Ormond and Mar, or his Lordship, deserve most to be credited. And, if so many instances of his mismanagements have been proved, it may be concluded, they would appear more clearly, if it were reasonable to speak plain upon several of them. I have avoided all unnecessary bitterness of expression against his Lordship, and the least imputation of flattery to others; and I shall embrace every opportunity of shewing you, that I am, &c.

1715-16. day, a great mortification to the Jacobite and discontented party, who were extremely elated by the inclinations to mercy, which appeared in both Houses, and which occasioned various reflections. Whatever was the secret spring of these inclinations, it is certain, that in the Council, held the same evening, about the execution of the condemned Lords, there was a contest between the Earl of Nottingham and some other Lords; and, four days after, that Earl was removed from being President of the Council, the Earl of Aylesford, his brother, from being Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; the Lord Finch, son to that Earl of Nottingham, from being one of the Lords of the Treasury; and the Lord Guernsey, his cousin-german, from being Master of the Jewel-Office. This change however sudden, was not unforeseen by men of observation; and it justified Mr. Hampden's reflection, not many days before, in the House of Commons, on a Motley or mixed Ministry.

The Earl of Nottingham and Aylesford removed.

Three Lords ordered to be executed, and three reprieved, Feb. 23.

Derwentwater and Kenmure executed, Feb. 24.

Pursuant to the resolution taken in the Council, orders were dispatched for executing the next morning, the Earls of Derwentwater and Nithisdale, and the Lord Kenmure; and for respiting the Lord Widdrington, the Earl of Carnwarth, and the Lord Nairn, till the 7th of March. The same evening the Earl of Nithisdale found means to make his escape out of the Tower in a woman's apparel brought to him by his mother who came to visit him with some relations. The next morning, early, three detachments of the guards took their several posts round the scaffold erected on Tower hill, and, a little before ten o'clock, the Earl of Derwentwater and the Lord Kenmure were carried in a hackney coach from the Tower to the Transport-Office, on Tower-hill, where there was a room hung with black for their reception. From this room to the scaffold (which was also covered with black) there was a passage or gallery railed in. The Earl of Derwentwater was first led to the scaffold; and it was observed, that in his going thither, and ascending the steps, his countenance appeared very pale. But, after he had been a few minutes on the scaffold, his behaviour appeared resolute and sedate. Having spent some time in prayer with a book, he then addressed himself to the Sheriff, and desired, he might have liberty to read a paper, which he had drawn up. This request being readily granted, he went to the rails of the scaffold, and read what follows:

“ Being in a few minutes to appear before the Tribunal of God, where, though most unworthy, I hope to find mercy, which I have not found from men now in power; I have endeavoured to make my peace with his Divine Majesty, by most humbly begging pardon for all the sins of my life: And I doubt not of a merciful forgiveness, through the merits of the passion and death of my Saviour Jesus Christ; for which end I earnestly desire the prayers of all good Christians.

After this, I am to ask pardon of those, whom I might have scandalized by pleading guilty at my trial. Such, as were permitted to come to me, told me, that having been undeniably in arms, pleading guilty was but the consequence of having submitted to mercy; and many arguments were used to prove there was nothing of moment in so doing; among others, the universal practice of signing leases, whereof the preambles run in the name of the person in possession.

But I am sensible that in this I have made bold with my loyalty, having never any other but King James the Third, for my rightful and lawful Sovereign. Him I had an inclination to serve from my infancy, and was moved thereto by a natural love I had to his person, knowing him to be capable of making his people happy. And, though he had been of a different Religion from mine, I should have done for him all that lay in my power, as my ancestors have done for his predecessors, being thereunto bound by the laws of God and Man.

Wherefore, if in this affair I have acted rashly, it ought not to affect the innocent. I intended to wrong no body, but to serve my King and Country, and that without self interest; hoping, by the example I gave, to have induced others to do their duty; and God, who sees the secrets of my heart, knows I speak truth. Some means have been proposed to me for saving my life, which I looked upon as inconsistent with honour and conscience, and therefore I rejected them; for with God's assistance, I shall prefer any death to the doing a base unworthy action. I only wish now, that the laying down my life might contribute to the service of my King and Country, and the re-establishment of the antient and fundamental Constitution of these Kingdoms; without which no lasting peace or true happiness can attend them. Then I should indeed part with my life, even with pleasure. As it is, I can only pray, that these blessings may be bestowed upon my dear Country; and, since I can do no more, I beseech God to accept of my life as a small sacrifice towards it.

I die a Roman Catholic. I am in perfect charity with all the world, I thank God for it, even with those of the present Government, who are most instrumental in my death. I freely forgive such as ungenerously reported false things of me; and I hope to be forgiven the trespasses of my youth, by the Father of infinite Majesty, into whose hands I commend my soul.

J. A. DERWENTWATER.

P. S. If that Prince, who now governs, had given me my life, I should have thought myself obliged never more to have taken up arms against him.*

After the reading of this paper, he delivered it to the Sheriff, telling him he might do with it as he pleased; and that he had given a copy of it to a friend. Then turning to the block, he viewed it close, and finding in it a rough place, that might offend his neck, he bid the executioner chip it off; which uncommon presence of mind was observed with admiration by some of the standers-by. Having prepared himself for the blow, by taking off his coat and waistcoat, he laid down to fit his head to the block, telling the executioner, that the sign he should give him was, Lord Jesus receive my soul; and, at the third time repeating it, he was to do his office; which he did at one blow. It was reported, that, the night before, the Earl of Derwentwater having sent for Mr. Stephen Roome, an undertaker for funerals, and discoursing with him about his own; he told him, he would 1715-16. would have a silver plate upon his coffin, with an inscription importing, That he died a sacrifice for his lawful Sovereign; but, Mr. Roome, scrupling to comply with it, he was dismissed. This was the reason, no hearse was provided for him at his execution; so that his head was only taken up by one of his servants, and put into a clean handkerchief; and, the body being wrapped in black cloth, they were both together carried to the Tower.

Soon after the Lord Kenmore was brought to the scaffold in the same manner, accompanied by his Son, and some Friends, and attended by two Clergymen of the Church of England. He shewed a great resolution and firmness in his gate and countenance, though some nice observers pretended he was not so calm within as the Earl of Derwentwater; which however was contradicted by others. On the scaffold he said, 'He had so little thoughts of dying so soon, that he had not provided a black suit, that he might have died with the more decency; for which he was sorry.' He appeared very sincere and fervent in his devotions, often lifting up his hands and eyes to Heaven; but (contrary to what he had declared in his speech to the Lords, when judgment was pronounced against him) he prayed for the Pretender, and repented of his having pleaded guilty. He embraced and kissed very tenderly most of the Officers and Gentlemen on the scaffold, and his Son and some Friends twice of thrice. He had with him Mr. Roome the Undertaker, who was to take care of his body, and a Surgeon, who was to direct the Executioner in doing his office. Having prepared for the block, he laid down his head upon it, then raised it up again, still continuing on his knees; gave the executioner some money, and told him, 'He should give him no sign, but, when he laid his head down again, he might do his work as he saw good.' Then, having lifted up his hands in prayer a short time longer, he laid down his head again, which the executioner severed at two blows. Both the head and body were put into a coffin, and conveyed in a hearse to Mr. Roome's, where they were embalmed, in order to be sent into Scotland, and buried with his ancestors. He neither made nor delivered any speech on the scaffold; but in a letter found after his execution, which he wrote to the Pretender, (by the title of King James) he declared, 'That he died for his faithful services to his Majesty, but hoped the cause he died for would thrive and flourish after his death: And as he suffered for his service, he hoped his Majesty would provide for his wife and children, who were in a miserable condition.'

On the 15th of March, the Earl of Win-The Earl of Win-toun's trial came on. The long trouble and de-toun can domed. lay he had occasioned by petitions for time, upon the pretence of witnesses being on the road, made people expect, that a considerable defence would be made, and something very particular be urged in his behalf, either by himself, or his Council; but they were surprized; that when he came to the bar, and the Managers of the House of Commons had spent two days in opening and enforcing the articles against him, and replying to what was offered, his answers were so weak, and what his Council had to offer so trifling, that it could not be called a defence. This gave some confirmation to what had been suggested, that he was a lunatic. However, the Lords were unanimous in their judgment, and brought him in guilty; and, on the 19th of March, judgment was pronounced against him by the Lord-Chancellor Cowper, Lord High-Steward upon this occasion.

Two days after, the King having received advice of the Pretender's flight out of Scotland, came to the House of Peers, and giving his assent to the land-tax bill (1), made the following speech to both Houses of Parliament.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Take this opportunity of acquainting you, that my forces have obliged the Pretender to fly out of Scotland; and he is since, as I am informed, landed near Gravelin. But I do not yet know, whether any Country in amity

(1) This bill had like to have raised a dispute between the two Houses. The bill being sent up to the Lords, a debate arose about the preamble, which was in these words:

'We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled, having hearts filled with the utmost gratitude to your Majesty, for the tender concern your Majesty, on all occasions, expresses for the extraordinary burden this unnatural Rebellion makes necessary to be laid on your faithful subjects, for preserving all their rights, both sacred and civil, and for your Majesty's unprecedented goodness in giving up all such estates for the use of the public, and in ease of your people, as shall be forfeited by this Rebellion; the raising, or the dreadful consequences whereof, cannot, by the most implacable of your Majesty's enemies, be ascribed to any one act done by your Majesty, since your happy accession to the Throne of your Ancestors; but even they will allow, that all the mischiefs, burdens, and calamities, which shall attend this horrid Rebellion, are, in truth, owing to the fatal and pernicious counsels given by some persons in the late state-administration, when, under pretence of procuring peace abroad, the present destructive war was projected to be brought into the very bowels of our native country at home, when a Popish army (part of which God has delivered into your Majesty's hands) was designed to be the Protector of our holy Religion; and when, under the false colour of paying the public debts, though their true design was to deliver us bound into the power of the antient Enemy of these Kingdoms, the same evil Counsellors contrived unnecessarily to incur, for a long time to come (if not for ever) several considerable branches of the public revenues, which, for many years past, had, from time to time, been useful to support the public expence; which revenues, in former administrations, had been carefully reserved for that purpose, to the end that, upon the conclusion of a happy peace, which we had then reason to expect, the subjects of these Realms might have reaped the fruit of a successful, though expensive war: And we, your Majesty's said dutiful and loyal subjects, being fully resolved to maintain your Majesty's just title to the Imperial Crown of these Realms, against all enemies and traitors whatsoever; and, for that end, purposed to raise such supplies, as are necessary to defray your Majesty's public expences, have cheerfully and unanimously given and granted, &c.'

Some Lords being offended at this preamble, the Earl of Abingdon moved, that all the Peers in town might be summoned to attend the Committee; which was done accordingly. And, on Monday, the 13th of February, the Lord High-steward went early to the House of Peers, 1715-16. " amity with us will give him protection, " after having so publicly invaded our King" doms.

" The dangers, to which the Nation was ex" posed, made me determine, that neither the " extraordinary rigour of the season, nor any
" fallacious proposal of the Rebels, should di" vert me from using all possible endeavours " towards putting a speedy and effectual end to " this unnatural Rebellion.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" I must return you my thanks for the great " progress you have made in the supplies. The " necessary dispositions are made for raising ad" ditional forces. But, as I shall always consult " the ease of my people, as far as is consistent " with their own security, I shall not make use " of the confidence you have placed in me, un" less the restless malice of our enemies should " make it necessary to go on with those " levies.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I promise myself, from the zeal and wif-
" dom of this Parliament, that the future hap" piness and tranquillity of my subjects will be " established on a solid foundation; and such " measures taken, as may deprive our enemies
" at home of the power (since that alone can " deprive them of the inclination) again to at" tempt the disturbance of my Government.
" This therefore is what I think myself oblig" ed to recommend to you, as a deliberation of " the utmost importance to the future safety,
" ease, and prosperity of my people."

From this time to the 9th of April (when the Septennial Bill was brought in) little else was done in both Houses, but presenting such bills as were ready, and voting for the supplies.

In the mean time the new Commission for trying the Rebels met on the 7th of April, the first time, at the Court of Common-Pleas. Sir William Thompson, Recorder of London, opened the meeting with a speech to the Grand-Jury, by whom Bills of High-Treason were found against Forster, Brigadier Mackintosh, and twenty others (1).

It was on the 14th of April that Forster was to have been arraigned, in order to his trial; but on the 10th, about midnight, he made his escape out of Newgate, with one servant only.
The manner was variously reported; and Mr.
Pitts the Keeper of Newgate, was not only committed for it, but was afterwards indicted for High-Treason, as being wilfully guilty of the escape, and tried for his life at the Old-Baily; but was acquitted. There was a proclamation immediately published, offering a reward of a thousand pounds for the apprehending
Mr. Forster; but it appeared afterwards, that his escape was so concerted, and all other things prepared, that as soon as he got out, he had horses ready; and riding directly to Lee, near Rockford in Essex, he had a vessel laid ready also, which took him on board, and landed him in France the very same day.

However the Court sat according to its ad-journalment, and Mr. Forster being absent, Mr.
Mackintosh, Mr. Gascoigne, Mr. Charles Wogan, and others, being arraigned, pleaded not guilty;
and upon a motion for time, had three weeks given them to prepare for their trials; which favour, on the contrary, some of them made use of to prepare, not for their trial, but for their escape.

Peers, and caused the Journals to be diligently searched for precedents of amendments, made by the Lords, to a money-bill. But few, if any, could be found, at least, since the Restoration; from which time the Commons would never suffer the Lords to make any amendments to bills of that nature. When the Grand Committee was sat, several Lords spoke against the preamble in question, as 'pre-judging matters of a very high and important nature, the cognizance and determination of which properly belongs to the House of Peers.'

Upon this, an expedient was proposed and admitted, that they should enter in their Journal a kind of Protest or Declaration, importing in substance 'That though the preamble was derogatory to the privileges and authority of the House of Lords; yet their Lordships in consideration of the King's and Nation's service, in this dangerous conjuncture, were willing to give their concurrency to the bill, without amendments; but that the same should not be drawn into a precedent for the time to come, or construed to be any diminution of the judicial authority of the House of Lords.' The Lord Chancellor Couper and the Lord Harcourt were appointed by the Lords to draw up the Protest or Declaration, which was entered in the Journal of the House.

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

S E C T. II.

From the End of the Rebellion to the Death of King GEORGE I.

The Sep-tennial
Bill proposed

THE Rebellion was now quelled, and the strength of the Rebels intirely broken, but the disaffection of the people was not yet conquered. The Parliament was the Bulwark of the Crown; the vigour and unanimity of the King's friends, and their superiority in the House, was the support of the whole affair. But the Parliament being only of three years continuance, by virtue of the Triennial Act, made in the 6th year of King William and Queen Mary; all the hopes of the other party seemed to be centered in this, that the Parliament would expire; and that they should be able by their influence in the Country, to chuse a majority of their party at the next election; or raise such a ferment at that juncture, as might make way for a successful Invasion from abroad. This the persons at the helm observed with concern; and therefore resolved to baffle these hopes of the enemies of the Government, by prolonging the sitting of the present Parliament. It is said, it was first proposed only to suspend the Triennial Act for once, whereby this Parliament would have continued three years beyond the time, at which it was to determine; but it was afterwards thought, that a bill for enlarging the time of continuance of Parliaments, in general, would be less liable to exceptions. The next thing, that fell under consideration was, Whether this intended bill should be set on foot in the House of Lords, or in the House of Commons? The first was judged the properer for several reasons, particularly because, the Court being more sure of a majority in the House of Commons, if the bill miscarried with the Lords, the odium of this project, which carried a face of unpopularity, would not rest upon the Commons, nor consequently prejudice future elections.

On the 9th of April in the evening, about thirty of the Court Lords met at the Duke of Devonshire's, where, after a short consultation, it was resolved to begin this matter the very next day; and the Duke was desired to move it in the House of Lords. The Duke readily complied with the desire of the assembly; and the next day, after the Lords had dispatched some private business, the Duke stood up, and made a speech on the inconveniencies, that attend Triennial Elections, suggesting, in particular, that they keep up party divisions, raise and foment feuds and animosities in private families; occasion ruinous expences; and give occasion to the cabals and intrigues of foreign Princes. It therefore became the wisdom of that august assembly to apply a proper remedy to an evil, which might be attended with the most dangerous consequences, especially in the present temper of the Nation. For, though the Rebellion was happily suppressed, yet the spirit of it remained unconquered, and seemed only to wait for an opportunity to shew itself with more violence. That, the election of a new Parliament, which by the Triennial Act was not far off, being the most favourable juncture, which the disaffected could expect, he thought it absolutely necessary to deprive them of it. For which purpose he had a bill to offer to the House for enlarging the continuance of Parliaments, and moved, that the same might be read. The Duke was seconded by the Earl of Rockingham, and supported by the Duke of Argyle, the Earl of Dorset, the Lord Townshend, and some other Lords. The Duke of Bucks, the Lord Trevor, the Earls of Nottingham and Aylesford, and some Peers of the other side did not directly oppose the bill, but made long speeches for putting off the reading of it to another time. They owned, that every Member has the privilege of offering what bill he thinks fit, without asking leave; but that the House is likewise at liberty either to read it or not, as they think convenient; and that the matter now offered was of so high a nature, that it well deserved to be maturely weighed and considered before the same was debated: And therefore they moved, that the bill might lie for some days on the table. To this it was answered, that nothing was farther from their thoughts, 1716. thoughts, than to carry any thing by surprize: That, by the ordinary method of proceeding, every Member has sufficient time to weigh, and consider what is offered in the House; and to shew how fairly they intended to act in this affair, the Earl of Dorset proposed, that, after the bill had been once read, the second reading of it should be put off for some days, and that all the Members in and about London should be summoned to attend. The Lords of the opposite side, finding themselves the weaker, acquiesced in this motion; so the bill was read the first time, and ordered to be read a second on the 14th of April.

upon it.
Fr. H. L.

On that day the bill was read (1), and a warm debate arose which lasted five hours (2). The Earl of Abington said, 'The bill was of a very extraordinary nature, since it repealed the Triennial Act, which the people justly looked upon as the great security of their rights and liberties; and that, if it passed this House, and the Commons agreed to it, the same would be a breach of that trust, which was reposed in them by those whom they represented.' The latter part of this assertion was denied by the Duke of Kingston, who urged, 'That the business of the Legislature was to rectify old laws, as well as to make new ones.' Earl Powlet declared, 'That he would be for it, if he thought it for the King's service and interest; but that, before they went any farther in so important an affair, some method should be taken to know the sentiments of the Nation.' He urged, 'That this bill shewed a distrust of the affection of the people, without which no King can be either safe or easy. That King William gained the hearts of his subjects by the Triennial Act; and it would look somewhat strange, that the most popular of our laws should be repealed a year after the Protestant Succession took place.' After this he endeavoured to answer what was suggested in support of this bill, viz. 1. That frequent elections occasion ruinous expences. 2. That they raise a great ferment, and foment animosities, which are of the most dangerous consequence after the late Rebellion: And 3. That they obstruct foreign Alliances. He said, 'That no stress ought to be laid on the first of those objections, expences at elections being voluntary. That, as to the second, he was sorry there had been a Rebellion; but that the same was now happily suppressed. And, as to the third suggestion, the same was of no weight with him, it being his opinion, that in a matter, which so nearly concerns our Constitution, we ought to have regard to ourselves only, and not to foreigners.' Upon all which considerations he was against the committing of this bill. The Earl of Dorset said, among other things, 'That they, who now spoke against this bill, would be for it, if it served their turn. That the Triennial Act was a new law, and an alteration of the old Constitution. That, the experience of twenty years having shewn a thousand inconveniences, attending that law, they ought to apply a remedy to it. That it sowed the seeds of corruption, it being notorious, that great numbers of persons had no other livelihood, than by being employed in bribing Corporations. That we had lately a sad experience of it; since by those methods a Parliament was procured by the last Ministry, which gave sanction to most of their ill measures, and went near to give up the trade and liberties of the Nation. That Triennial Elections destroy all family interest, and subject our excellent Constitution to the caprice of the multitude: And, in short, that by Triennial Elections we have but a Triennial Government, which is little better than no Government at all.' For which reasons he was for the bill. The Lord Trevor said, That the question now lying before them was, Whether the law they were going to make, tended to the good or prejudice of the Constitution? That, for his own part, he looked upon the Triennial Act as an essential part of our ancient Constitution, according to which frequent and even annual Parliaments were to be held. That he might easily prove, that long Parliaments were always pernicious. That, when King Charles I. had given up his prerogative of dissolving Parliaments in 1640, he gave himself up into the hands of traitors, and had nothing but destruction to expect from them. That after the Restoration, King Charles II. that very good Prince, found the inconvenience of a long Parliament. That, as soon as the Nation had opportunity, by the Revolution, to assert their just rights and liberties, the Triennial Act was insisted on, and gained, at last, with a great deal of opposition. That there were very good and cogent reasons for making a law, to support the Constitution, and prevent incroachments, either of Parliaments on the Crown, or of the Crown on the rights and liberties of the People; and to correct abuses and exorbitances committed through the ambition and avarice of Ministers. That he would not be thought to reflect on the present Administration; but that, in his opinion, frequent elections were a necessary right of the subject to remedy abuses. That, for his own part, he had ever been against the bill for limiting the number of Officers in the House of Commons: But, if the Triennial Act were repealed,

(1) The substance of the bill was: It has been found by experience, that Triennial Parliaments are grievous, by occasioning much greater and continued expence, and more violent and lasting heats, than were ever known before. And if the Triennial act continue, it may probably, at the present juncture, when a restless and Popish faction are designing to renew the Rebellion at home, and an Invasion from abroad, be destructive to the peace and the security of the Government. Be it therefore enacted, that this present and all future Parliaments shall have continuance for (seven) years, to be accounted from the date of the writ of summons, unless this or any such Parliament shall be sooner dissolved by his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, 1716. ed, he thought that bill would become very necessary, because the long sitting of Parliaments would give the Crown both an opportunity and temptation to multiply the number of Officers. That some reflections had been cast on the last Parliament: But that, in his opinion, that Parliament was chosen by the same method, as the present was, by great expences. That he owned this to be a great abuse; but that laws might be made to rectify the same. That if this bill passed, How could any Member of the other House expect to preserve his interest with those, who chose him, when this bill would certainly be interpreted both a violation of their right, and a breach of the trust reposed in him? That if this House of Commons continued themselves beyond the time, for which they were chosen, they were no more the Representatives of the people, but a House of their own making. That he was sorry there were dissenters in the County; but he apprehended this bill would rather increase than abate them. He owned, that the majority of this House of Commons were honest Gentlemen, who had the interest of their King and Country at heart; but that, in his opinion, those, who went before them, did not come short of them in point of duty and affection to his Majesty; for it was they, who established the King on his Throne, and settled his revenue with all clearness imaginable. That what he had suggested flowed from the dread of the ill consequences of this bill, which might rise to such an height, as to render the Crown uneasy to his Majesty. That he owed so much to the Protestant Succession, that, if he could believe this bill to be of any service to the King and Royal Family, he would be intirely for it; but, as he was of a contrary opinion, he would not have a bill, obtained in the best of reigns, repealed in the first year of this Protestant reign. And therefore he was against the committing of this bill.' Lord Carteret, who spoke next, owned, 'That frequent Parliaments are a great security of the people's rights and liberties; but he observed, that this bill was not against frequent Sessions, but only against frequent elections. That they ought maturely to weigh and consider what was suggested in the preamble of the bill, That there is a restless Popish faction designing and endeavouring to renew the Rebellion within this Kingdom. That of all Rebellions this last was the most monstrous and unnatural; for all other Rebellions were carried on under pretences of liberty, whereas this last was a Rebellion for slavery. That, as to our Allies abroad, though he could not say, that they expected this bill, yet it was reasonable to suppose, that they would be glad to see it pass into a law; for having found by sad experience, that great changes may be made in the best concerted measures by different Parliaments, inflamed by different Ministries; so, if they had not some security for the treaties his Majesty was now entering into with them, a strong tide might come upon a new election, that might overturn all. That in short, this bill would fix the King, and the present happy Settlement, on a lasting foundation; and therefore he was for committing it.' The Earl of Cholmondeley said, 'That he made no doubt, but the Legislature is vested with a supreme power to rectify any inconveniences, to which any former law may, by experience, be found to be subject; and this being the case of the Triennial Act, they ought to remedy the same. That what had been suggested, in relation to the Long Parliament in King Charles the Second's Reign, was, in his opinion, rather an argument for, than against the bill. For though, in that Parliament, the King had many pensioners, who, at first, complimented him with money, yet at last, when the interest of the Nation came to be at stake, they voted for a war with France, and prosecuted the Popish Plot with the utmost vigour. That they had lately seen what a corrupt Parliament may do, and by what means such a Parliament may be got: And every one might guess how there came to be a debt of 500,000 l. upon the Civil List. That he did not mention this to irritate against persons, but against things. That, in his opinion, there was no better remedy against corruptions, than the suppressing frequent elections. That he thought this bill the more necessary, because our Allies will thereby have a security, that they shall not again be left in the lurch. And, in consideration of the great benefits that will accrue from it both at home and abroad, he was for the committing it.' Lord Foley made a long speech, in which he enlarged upon the excellency of our Constitution; took notice, that the different branches of the Legislature are to check one another, which prevents exorbitancies in the Administration, and dragging as in Turkey and other arbitrary Governments; suggested, that the pensionary Parliament made King Charles II. uneasy, by making him neglect the affections of his people; and concluded, that he was afraid, that the repealing the Triennial Act would have the same effect and therefore he was against it.'

The Duke of Newcastle answered, 'That it had already been rightly observed, that, though the Long Parliament of King Charles II. at first complimented that Prince, yet they afterwards vigorously opposed destructive measures, and insisted on a war with France.' Then passing over less material objections, which had been fully refused, he urged, 'That the present happy settlement could not be maintained without taking away the seeds of corruption. That no cause ever miscarried in so many instances as that of the Rebels. But, notwithstanding their defeat at Preston and Dumbain, their being driven out of Scotland, with their King at their head, their disappointments in other parts, and the execution of some of their leaders, the Jacobites were as insolent as ever. That this was the reason, why in a late debate in this House he was against lenity; and the rather, because no Prince was ever more naturally inclined to mercy than his present Majesty; for no Prince ever had so many Rebels in his power, and never were so few punished. My Lords (added he) you must now strengthen yourselves, and disarm your enemies. It is not to be doubted, but the late unnatural and monstrous Rebellion was raised and fomented by large contributions of a restless Popish faction. The same means, my Lords, will be used to renew the Rebellion as soon as a proper opportunity offers. Their emissaries are busy every where to keep up the spirits of the people for a year longer, and then they hope to retrieve all by a new election.' He concluded, 'That, though the Allies would not make any thing done among us an article of their treaties, yet, having the sad experience 1716. of being left in the lurch, they would certainly enter into Alliances with us with more confidence, if they saw, that our Government was not precarious.' Upon all which considerations he was for the bill (1).

The Duke of Strebury spoke with some vehemence against the bill; after which the Lord Parker enlarged on the Constitution with relation to the calling, election, sitting and prolonging of Parliaments. He was followed by the Lord-Chancellor Cowper, who resumed all the arguments that had been urged in the debate; rectified some mistakes as to the constitution and nature of Parliaments; gave a clear account of the Triennial Act; and vindicated the King and the Government as to the present disaffection; appealing to the Lords and Commons, 'Whether the least provocation had been given either by his Majesty or his Ministers?' and asserting, That, if there was any fault on the King's side, it was too much lenity; and that the only crime that could be charged on his Ministers, was their zeal and vigilance in defence of his Majesty's Person and Government.'

The Earl of Aylesford having answered part of the Lord Chancellor's speech, the Bishop of London said, 'That, when he came to the House, he knew not which way he should give his vote, and hoped to be guided and determined by what should be offered on both sides on this important subject: But, now he owned he was confounded between dangers and inconveniencies on one side, and destruction on the other.'

The Earl of Anglesey spoke next with great vehemence against the bill; and the Duke of Bucks closed the debate with saying, 'That he was for the bill, but did not think it seasonable.' At last, the question, That the bill be committed, being put, it was carried in the affirmative by ninety-six voices against sixty-one. But thirty Lords entered their protests (2).

Two days after, the Lords considered of the bill in a Grand Committee, and most of the former Speakers exerted themselves for and against it; and among others, a Bishop, who had not yet spoken on the subject, said, 'If this bill

(1) After several other speeches, the Earl of Nottingham, having made large professions of duty and affection to the King, said, 'That he was against this bill, because he thought it would rather exasperate than quiet the minds of the people. That this bill shewed a distrust of the affections of the people, and an intention of governing by fear, which, in his opinion, was the worst way of government: And God forbid his Majesty should have no prospect of gaining the affections of his subjects. That the King came in universally beloved, and was received with general acclamations of his people; and, though he could not assign the true cause of the present dissatisfaction, yet some secret cause must have been given for it. That he hoped, the people's dissatisfaction was not so great, as it was represented. That the Rebellion was intirely suppressed, and at an end; but, if any ferment yet remained, this bill was a very improper way to allay it, and would rather rivet the disaffection in their prejudices against the Government, than make them change their opinion. That one of the arguments urged for this bill was, that it would encourage foreign Princes and States to enter into Alliances with us; but that, in his opinion, the same might have a contrary effect. For foreign Potentates may be deterred from entering into measures with us, when they shall be informed by the preamble to this bill, that the popish faction is so dangerous, as that it may be destructive to the peace and security of the Government; and may apprehend, from this bill, that the Government is so weak as to want so extraordinary a provision for its safety; which seems to imply, that the Gentlemen of Great-Britain are not to be trusted in a new election, and that the good affections of the people are restrained to so small a number as that, of which the present House of Commons consists. That frequent and new Parliaments are required by the fundamental Constitution of the Kingdom; and that the practice thereof, for many ages, was sufficient evidence of this Constitution. That this bill was so far from preventing corruptions, that it would rather increase them; for, the longer a Parliament is to last, the more valuable to be purchased is a station in it, and the greater also is the danger of corrupting the Members of it. That, whatever reasons there may be to continue this Parliament for several years, they will be at least as strong, and, by the conduct of the Ministry, may be made much stronger, before the end of seven years, continuing it still longer, and even to perpetuate it, which would be an absolute subversion of the third estate of the Realm.' But, what was most taken notice of in his Lordship's speech, was, that, in order to shew the danger of enlarging the prerogative, he instanced in the precedent of King Henry VIII., who persuaded his Parliament to give him the Abbey-lands, under pretence, that they would bear part of his expences, which would ease them of taxes, and improve trade; but that, soon after, he demanded and obtained great subsidies, and made use of those lands to inflame the Nation.

The Duke of Argyle answer'd among other particulars: 'That he could by no means agree with the noble Lord that spoke last, either as to the beginning or end of the Rebellion. That it had been suggested, that the King had been received with the general acclamations of his people; but that it was certain, and has since manifestly appeared, that, whatever arts were used by the last Ministry to blind and deceive the people, designs had been laid to bring in the Pretender, long before the King's happy accession to the Throne. That the disappointment of these designs was intirely owing to Providence; for, had the Conspirators thrown off the mask sooner, and improved the ferment their emissaries had raised in the Nation, at the Election of the last Parliament, it is very probable their wicked schemes for setting aside the Protestant Succession had taken place. That he wondered, therefore, that his Lordship could be puzzled to find out the cause of the present disaffection, for it was plain, it proceeded from the false representations of things and persons, that were industriously spread abroad both before and since his Majesty's coming in.' As to what had been suggested, that the Rebellion was at an end, his Grace observed, 'That the Rebels had only shifted their head-quarters from Perth to Paris, or St. Germain's; but that their emissaries were still as busy and insolent as ever in Great-Britain, and wanted only an opportunity to renew the Rebellion, and favour an Invasion.' As to what had been hinted, that this bill would rivet the Jacobites in their opinion, he said, 'That was no good argument against it, for he had seen some persons shift sides often, and change their opinions, and be very zealous for both.'

The Earl of Nottingham taking this reflection to himself, readily owned, 'That he was for some time against the abjuration oath, because he thought a multiplicity of oaths would make the Nation unsafe; but, that, as soon as he was convinced of the necessity of that oath, he readily came into it.' The Duke of Argyle thereupon stood up, and said, 'He was sorry that noble Lord took to himself what he said only in general.'

(2) They were as follow:

Dissentient.

I. Because we conceive, that frequent and new Parliaments are required by the fundamental Constitution of the Kingdom, and the practice thereof, for 1716. was never so good in itself, it was very unseasonable, because very unpopular, and altogether useless, the Rebellion being crushed, and the power of France not to be feared; now especially, when we have a glorious standing Army, and a Ministry, that knows how effectually to engage the affections of the people.' The Committee having gone through the bill, and ordered the blank before the word years to be filled up with the word seven, the question was put, Whether the same should be reported, in order to be ingrossed, which was carried by seventy-four voices against thirty-nine. The next day the bill was reported, and, without dividing, ordered to be ingrossed, and being read the third time, on the 18th of April, there arose a debate, which lasted about two hours. Near half of that time was taken up by the Earl of Nottingham, who, among other things, by a long historical detail, endeavoured to shew, 'That Counsels for enlarging the prerogative were ever pernicious to the Crown.' To this the Duke of Argyle answered, 'That, not being so well read in history as that noble Lord, he would confine himself to what had happened in his own time; and, that he had observed, that his Lordship had, by turns, opposed all that had been offered, either for the interest of the Crown, or the liberties of the people; of which he might easily produce several instances.' adding, 'That he did not much wonder there appeared already so much joy among a certain party over a repenting sinner.' Upon the whole matter, the question being put, Whether this bill shall pass? It was carried in the affirmative by a majority of sixty-nine voices against thirty-six; but twenty-four Lords protested against it.

The bill being sent down to the Commons, the Lord Guernsey moved for the rejecting of it without being read; but his motion was declared to be unprecedented, and the bill read. Upon the question for a second reading, there arose a debate, of which the most remarkable passage was, that an eminent Member, who had been in the most difficult times very zealous for the Protestant Succession, spoke against the bill, and, among other things suggested, 'That it was an imposition of the Lords to take upon them to direct the Commons in a matter which solely concerns them, as Guardians of the rights and liberties of the people.' He was seconded by Mr. Shippen; but the Lord Coningsby made them sensible, 'That their objection was altogether groundless, and the result of their want, either of experience or memory; for, had they, like himself, been Members of that House, when the Triennial Act was made, they might have remembered that the same was begun in the House of Lords, who, as part of the Legislature, are no less Guardians of the liberties of the subject, than the Commons themselves.' Mr. Fuller and the Lord Guernsey spoke afterwards many ages (which manifestly appears by our Records) is a sufficient evidence and proof of this Constitution.

II. Because it is agreed, that the House of Commons must be chosen by the people; and, when so chosen, they are truly the representatives of the people, which they cannot be so properly said to be, when continued for a longer time than that for which they were chosen; for, after that time, they are chosen by the Parliament, and not by the people, who are thereby deprived of the only remedy, which they have against those, who either do not understand, or, through corruption, do willfully betray the trust reposed in them; which remedy is to choose better men in their places.

III. Because the reasons given for this bill, we conceive, were not sufficient to induce us to pass it, in subversion of so essential a part of our Constitution.

1. For, as to the argument, that this will encourage the Princes and States of Europe to enter into Alliances with us, we have not heard any one Minister assert, that any one Prince or State has asked, or so much as insinuated, that they wished such an alteration.

Nor is it reasonable to imagine it; for it cannot be expected, that any Prince or State can rely upon a people to defend their liberties and interests, who shall be thought to have given up so great a part of their own; nor can it be prudent for them to wish such an experiment, after the experience that Europe has had of the great things this Nation has done for them under the Constitution, which is to be altered by this bill.

But, on the other hand, they may be deterred from entering into measures with us, when they shall be informed by the preamble of this bill, that the Popish faction is so dangerous, as that it may be destructive to the peace and security of the Government; and may apprehend, from this bill, that the Government is so weak, as to want so extraordinary a provision for its safety; which seems to imply, that the Gentlemen of Britain are not to be trusted or relied upon; and that the good affections of the people are restrained to so small a number, as that, of which the present House of Commons consists.

2. We conceive, this bill is so far from preventing expences and corruptions, that it will rather increase them, for, the longer a Parliament is to last, the more valuable to be purchased is a station in it, and the greater also is the danger of corrupting the Members of it. For, if there should be a Ministry, who shall want a Parliament to screen them from the just resentment of the people, or from a discovery of their ill practices to the King, who cannot otherwise, or so truly, be informed of them, as by a free Parliament, it is so much the interest of such a Ministry to influence the elections (which by their authority, and the disposal of the public money, they, of all others, have the best means of doing) that, it is to be feared, they will be tempted, and not fail to make use of them; and, even, when the Members are chosen, they have a greater opportunity of inducing very many to comply with them, than they could have, if not only the Sessions of Parliament, but the Parliament itself, were reduced to the ancient and primitive constitution and practice of frequent and new Parliaments; for, as a good Ministry will neither practise, nor need corruption, so it cannot be any Lord's intent to provide for the security of a bad one.

3. We conceive, that whatever reasons may induce the Lords to pass this bill, to continue this Parliament for seven years, will be, at least, as strong, and may, by the conduct of the Ministry, be made much stronger before the end of seven years, for continuing it yet still longer, and even to perpetuate it; which would be an express and absolute subversion of the third Estate of the Realm.

1716. wards against the bill, but were answered by the Lord Stanhope, eldest son to the Earl of Chesterfield; and a second reading was at last carried by a majority of two hundred and seventy-six against a hundred and fifty-six.

In the mean time, several petitions were prepared in the Country, and presented to the House against the bill, particularly from Hastings, Marlborough, Cambridge, and Abingdon. Then the bill being read the second time, there arose a warm debate, which lasted from about two in the afternoon till near eleven at night.

Mr. Lyddal spoke a long speech for the bill, and, among other things, said, 'If this opportunity be lost, you may possibly never have another, or at least so good a one, not only to conquer, but even to eradicate that spirit of Jacobinism, which has dwelt long amongst us, and has more than once brought this Nation to the very brink of ruin and destruction. Since, therefore, with much danger and difficulty we have at last secured our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, when all was at stake from the treachery of the late Ministry, and the unaccountable proceedings of the last Triennial Parliament, why should you run the risk of having a new one so soon, first chosen by French money, and then voting by French directions, since the King and his Parliament exert their united power for the good of the Public, and to retrieve the honour of the Nation? Why should they not continue longer together, that they may finish what they have so unanimously and happily begun? Upon the whole, the Electors and People of all the Boroughs in England having, for several years passed, been bribed and preached into the Pretender's interest, and a dislike of the Protestant Succession, it becomes rather necessity than choice, to apply an extraordinary remedy to an extraordinary disease.'

After this and several other speeches, it was carried for committing the bill (1); and, the next day, a petition from the Borough of Horsham was presented to the House, setting forth, 'That they looked upon the bill as an overturning the Constitution, and an infringement of their Liberties; at which expressions the House being offended, it was resolved, that the petition should be rejected. Then Mr. Lechmere moved, 'That the Committee have leave to receive a clause, to disable persons from being chosen Members of either House of Parliament, who have pensions during pleasure, or any number of years.' But Mr. Secretary Stanhope having represented, that such a clause would but clog the bill, and endanger its miscarriage, part of it being derogatory to the privileges of the House of Lords; and that, if any jealousy were entertained of the Members of the House of Commons having pensions from the Crown, a bill might be brought in, to exclude them; the motion for the clause was rejected, and a separate bill against Pensioners sitting in the House was ordered to be brought in, which, having passed both Houses, received the Royal Assent. When the Septennial Bill had gone through the Committee of the whole House, it was read the third time, and the question for passing it being put, a debate of two hours ensued. Those, who spoke against the bill, were Mr. Freeman, Mr. Hungerford, Mr. Fuller, Mr. Wykes, the Lord Finch, eldest son to the Earl of Nottingham, and some others. They were severally answered by Sir Richard Steele, Mr. Comptroller, Sir William Thompson, Captain Erle, Mr. Tufnel, Mr. Morris, and Sir John Brownlow (2). After which, the bill passed by a majority of two hundred and sixty-four, against one hundred and twenty-one; and, being sent back to the Lords, received, soon after, the Royal assent.

On

(1) Mr. Haddon, a Scotch Member, having spoken for the bill, Mr. Snell, one of the Representatives for the City of Glocester, said, 'It was no wonder, that they, who had betrayed the liberties of their own Country, should be so ready to give up their's.' Mr. Smith animadverted upon this injurious reflection, and said, 'That the Member, who made that speech, would not be so bold as to utter those words any where else.' He was seconded by Lord Coningsby; and, the dispute being like to grow warm, the Speaker interposed, and said, that, all the Members of the House having the privilege of explaining themselves, Mr. Snell ought to enjoy the same. Hereupon Mr. Snell said, 'That he meant no personal reflection on Mr. Haddon, and that he only spoke of the Scots Nation in general.' By which pretended excuse Sir David Dalrymple being provoked, said, 'That this explanation, instead of extenuating, did but aggravate the offence; for which he demanded satisfaction. Some other Members calling to the bar, Mr. Snell prevented any further proceeding, by begging pardon for any unguarded expression he might have let fall.'

(2) Mr. Hampden spoke for the bill, part of whose speech was as follows:

'A principal argument for continuing the Triennial Bill is, that it is agreeable to the antient laws of this Nation, that there should be frequent Parliaments. I find, by the laws I have looked over, that Parliaments ought to be frequently held: But I found it no where laid down as a fundamental position of the nature of this Constitution, that there should be frequent elections. If Gentlemen will look to the beginning of Parliaments, they will find, in the 4th, 5th, and 36th of Edward III., that, for redress of divers mischiefs and grievances which daily happen, a Parliament shall be holden every year, or oftner, if need be. Let it then be considered, in what manner those Parliaments were held: When a King met his Parliament, they used to sit ten or twenty days, and then were prorogued or dissolved; and there were frequent intermissions of Parliaments, none being called for several years. By looking over the Journals, we find the prorogations and dissolutions of Parliaments.

To come down to the time of Henry VIII., few of his Parliaments sat more than twenty days, though there was not a Parliament met every year; and, from the 7th to the 25th of Henry VIII., there are no Journals, and consequently we cannot tell in what manner Parliaments were held. Afterwards, there were several Parliaments, but not every year, to the end of his Reign.

A Parliament was called the first year of Edward VI., and, in five years, sat but four months. In Philip and Mary there were four Parliaments, but the Sessions extremely short. From the 2d to the 5th, and from the 7th to the 13th of Queen Elizabeth, no Parliament met; and, from the 14th to the 25th of Queen Elizabeth, the Parliament sat only from the 8th of May to the 30th of June; and, four years after, from the 8th of February to the 8th of March following; and, in eight years after, never sat to do business, but were then dissolved. There were six other Parliaments called in Queen Elizabeth's time; but never sat long, unless that in the 39th of her Reign, which sat four months.

The Parliament, the first of James I., sat about four months, and, in three years after, sat about eight days.

Death of Lord Sommers.

Mackintosh and others ef-cape out of Newgate,
May 4.

On the 26th of April, died that great man, and great patriot, the Lord Sommers, whose character is drawn with great force and elegance by Mr. Addison in his Freeholder.

The escape of the Earl of Mithildale, and of Mr. Forster, had given sufficient warning to the Government, and ought to have doubled the vigilance of the Jaylors; yet Brigadier Mackintosh, John Mackintosh his son, Charles Wogan, James Talbot, Robert Hepburne, William Dalmaboy, Alexander Dalmaboy, and John Tasker, servant to Mr. Butler, having knocked down the Keeper and Turn-key, and disarmed the Centinel, broke out of Newgate between eleven and twelve at night. Six more of the Rebels went out of the prison with them; but being unacquainted with the streets, and turning into Warwick-Court, where they found no passage, they were forced to return into Warwick-Lane, and so fell into the Hands of their pursuers. Mackintosh and some others were to have been tried the day after. The Judges met in Westminster-Hall for that purpose, but, receiving a message, that the Keepers of Newgate were employed in searching after the Rebels, who had made their escapes, the Court and Juries adjourned. James Talbot, one of the fugitives, was retaken at an house in Windmill-Street in Piccadilly, and sent back to Newgate.

When

That Parliament was not dissolved till the 9th of James, but sat twice or thrice only. There were three other Parliaments in his Reign, but they met very seldom.

The Sessions in King Charles I. were much shorter than of late days, and very frequent prorogations; and, in the 16th of his reign, an act was passed, for preventing inconveniences by long intermission of Parliaments; by which it was provided, that a Parliament should meet every three years; which law we find repealed in the 16th of Charles II, by reason that the provisions in the former law were looked upon as a derogation to his Majesty's just and undoubted Prerogative for calling and assembling Parliaments, and might be an occasion of manifold mischiefs, and might endanger the peace of his People. This said Act is repealed, and a provision made therein, that because, by the ancient Laws of this Realm, in the Reign of Edward III, Parliaments are to be held very often, the sitting and holding of Parliaments shall not be intermitted above three years. In this King's Reign, the Long Parliament was held; and, whatever corruptions they were tainted with, they could never be accused of favouring the Cause of France, or attempting to inflame their own Country.

In King James II, that unfortunate Prince, a Parliament was held in May 1685, and sat about two months, and was, at several times, prorogued to November 1687. Then the happy Revolution took place; and, in the Bill of Rights, 1. Guil. & Mar. it is declared and enacted, That all the Rights and Liberties, asserted and claimed in the said Declaration, are the true, ancient, and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this Kingdom, and ought to be firmly and strictly maintained. And, in the same bill, among this long catalogue of grievances, which precedes the said Declaration, there is not the least mention made of want of frequent elections, but only, that Parliaments are to be held very often. In the sixth of King William, this now-favoured bill for Triennial Parliaments was passed; and, upon this occasion, I cannot help observing, that it is some satisfaction, that the people abroad, who look upon the Reign of that Prince, as an Usurpation, should be fond of any one act that was passed in that time; and, I hope from hence, they may in time, be more reconciled to the Protestant Succession, which is in consequence of that happy Revolution.

If Gentlemen will look over the writs of summons, and the returns to those writs, they will find no mention how long any Parliament is to last; but the return makes mention of the persons who are to serve in the Parliament that is to meet and be held at such a time at Westminster. But it must be allowed, that the Parliament is subject to the Triennial Act while it subsists; and therefore the advantages or inconveniences of that law ought chiefly to be considered, in the matter now before us: And, in case an act be found prejudicial, if such a veneration is to be paid to a law, as not to alter it from any conviction of its being insufficient, or attended with ill consequences, I think the Legislature will become, in a manner, useless. I take the principal matter to be, to examine what benefit has accrued to the Nation by virtue of this bill, and if the inconveniences do not outweigh the advantages?

It is pretended, that by Triennial Elections, the people have an opportunity of laying aside those persons with whose behaviour, in Parliament, they are dissatisfied, or such, whom they apprehend to be under Court-influences: I desire it may be considered, how very few examples there are, of persons who, having accepted places, have not been re-elected. The reason is very obvious; because the people who love expences, judge, that a man, who has a place of profit, is much more capable of making an expence, than he that has none. But, supposing any Gentleman so wickedly disposed, as to sacrifice his opinion to the lucre of a place; does not such a person who has spent five or six hundred pounds at his election, and his circumstances not very able to bear it, come more prepared for a Court-temptation, than if he had enjoyed his seat in Parliament, and been free from the trouble and expence of frequent elections? I appeal to Gentlemen, if expences are not increased? And, if any instance can be produced, where they are abated, many more may be, where they are increased; so that the end of the bill, in this respect, is no way answered.

It is said, that, expences being voluntary, it is the fault only of those, who make them; but, when we observe the contagion of expences to be universally spread in the Kingdom at the time of elections, and a dissolution of manners occasioned by such expences, it is time for the Legislature to interpose, and prevent the dangerous consequences of such an evil. Do, Gentlemen, consider the distractions occasioned by elections, and the impossibility, considering the small interval of elections, to heal up those wounds, which the animosities of parties have occasioned; so that it is little better than living in a continual state of warfare. This is a no less fatal, than undeniable consequence of this bill, which was calculated for the ease of the subject.

It is said, the reason of this Expedient, as it is called, is, because the majority of this Parliament are Whigs: And, though it is allowed, that this Parliament has acted for the service of his Majesty and the Nation, the proceedings of the last Parliament are said to be as meritorious of the King's good opinion, and the Nation's, as what this Parliament has done.

It is much insisted on, That the Tories gave the Civil List: That is true; but, had they not given it, I believe, the King would not long have been deprived of it. It is said, the King was received here with the universal joy of his people: Why did that satisfaction cease so soon? Has the King done any thing to lose the affection of so many of his people? or, Have his Ministers? If his Ministers, Why has the spirit of Patriotism been so much wanting in Gentlemen, as not to represent to the King, or in this House, the crimes of those he employs in his service? But, if no real handle for these discontents has been given, by King, or Ministers, then those who pretended such a zeal for the King and his Service, at his arrival here, acted a hypocritical part, and meant nothing less than what 1716. When the Court sat the next time, thirteen of the Rebels (1) were arraigned, and pleaded not guilty; but upon application for time, some of them setting forth, that they had evidence upon the road, they had three weeks allowed to prepare for their trial.

Rebels tried. Mr. Richard Gascoigne was set to the bar, but by the indulgence of the Court had ten days allowed him for bringing witnesses to town. His trial came on the 17th of May; and besides the evidence of Mr. Patten, Mr. Forster's Chaplain, who deposed that he saw Mr. Gascoigne in Mr. Forster's company at Preston, Mr. Wye made oath, 'That, coming once to the Duchess of Oamond's, he saw the prisoner Gascoigne in her Grace's closet. That being introduced, he told her Grace he was just come from France, and had seen the Duke but six days before, who was well, and would be here quickly from Bayonne, and the Pretender from some other place. Upon which her Grace called for a map, to find whereabouts St. Sebastian lay. That he was asked by her Grace what people said at Paris, especially in relation to Sir William Wyndham; and asked Mr. Gascoigne, Whether it was true, which was said in the public news, that he had letters found in his pocket of dangerous consequence? Mr. Gascoigne said, He could not tell, but if it were so, a school-boy would deserved to be whipped for carrying such papers in his pocket.' It being at that time generally discredited about town, that Sir William Wyndham had surrendered himself, Gascoigne said, 'He had sent or carried him one of the Proclamations (but the evidence could not be positive which) and added, If he was taken, their design was ruined, for there were an hundred Gentlemen, who waited only for a signal, and Sir William would be at the head of eight or nine thousand men.' That the Lady Rochester having asked him (Mr. Gascoigne) where Sir William was? The prisoner replied, 'Whether, if he should tell her Ladyship, she would not make use of it to persuade him to surrender? But, if it were only to give Sir William notice of the Proclamation, he told her, that he had already sent him one.' Mr. Wye further declared, 'That, when he was in the Duchess's closet, he saw a Gentleman dressed in laced scarlet clothes; whom he understood to be one of the Cotton's; and, having since seen Mr. Cotton, knew it to be the same person.' There were some other circumstances, which Mr. Wye said Mr. Gascoigne told him, particularly, that the prisoner said, 'He came to London to learn whether Sir William Wyndham made any discovery.' The Jury, after a considerable stay, brought in Mr. Gascoigne guilty of High-Treason.

Henry Oxburgh was tried May the 7th, and made a very weak defence. His Council, Serjeant Darnel and Mr. Kettleby endeavoured to serve him by insisting on a misnomer in the indictment, wherein he was called Oxborough, whereas his true name was Oxburgh: But that being overruled, the Jury brought him in guilty of High-Treason.

On the 26th of May, Mr. John Hall of Otterburne in Northumberland was brought to the bar. This Gentleman had been a Justice of the Peace in his Country, and taken the oaths of allegiance and abjuration. He was found guilty by the Jury, and gloried in his guilt at his execution. Oxburgh was the first of those who suffered at Tyburn. Gascoigne had been a common sharper, and having been bubbled by gamesters out of the money he had raised by the sale of a small estate in Ireland, supported himself afterwards by defrauding others. He was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn on the 25th of May, and died a Papist.

John Hume, brother of the Earl of Hume, was tried, and found guilty, May the 8th; John Farquharson not guilty; and Alexander Menzies guilty. On the 12th Thomas Farquharson and John Ennis were brought to their trials. There was a great uproar in the Court upon the Jury's bringing in Farquharson not guilty, though the evidence was positive, 'That he was in arms with the Rebels at Kells, and at Lancaster, where the Pretender was proclaimed, and also at Preston.' Two persons who clapped and shouted were apprehended. One of them, who was summoned as a Juryman, was fined 100l. the other 50l. and a year's imprisonment. The same Jury, contrary to as full evidence as that against Farquharson, acquitted Ennis likewise.

The

what they now make professions of. Let us consider the present situation of the minds of the people, how exasperated one set of them are at the necessary prosecutions of those who so fatally concerted the ruin of their Country; and to what degree that restless spirit influenced the people in the late Rebellion; and how industriously a false and mistaken Cause of the Church has been of late propagated in this Nation.

From these and many other circumstances of affairs, and symptoms of the ill temper of the Nation, I think the disposition of the people's minds far from being suitable to the business of an election, but rather for a reformation of that Person, who, the deluded people have been taught, has alone a right to the Crown, and came to free you from the oppressions you now lie under.

He concludes with saying, 'The reasons why I am now for the bill are, To dispose the people to follow their callings, and to be industrious, by taking from them, for a time, the opportunity of distracting one another by elections. To prevent such who have the will, from the power of giving any new disturbance to the Government. To prevent another Rebellion;

there being just as much reason to expect one this year as there was the last. To check that evil spirit in those who have sworn to the King, and rose in arms against him, or abetted such who have. To discountenance that spirit, which lately did so far prevail in this Nation, as to approve of a most ignominious conclusion of a successful war, by a ruinous peace. To render fruitless any concerted project of the Regent, or any other foreign Princes, to disturb this Nation, at a time, when elections, or the approach of them, have raised a ferment in the minds of the people; and to procure to the Clergy an interval from being Politicians, that they may be better able to take care of their flocks, in the manner the Scripture has prescribed.

1716. The same day five Rebel prisoners pleaded guilty; the two Mr. Douglas's, Captain Macquean, Mr. Scrimshaw, and Mr. Skean, who received sentence of death. Three days after came on the trials of Richard Townley and Edward Tildesley. It was sworn against Mr. Townley, that he was not only among the Rebels at Preston, 'but that there was a troop called Mr. Townley's troop, in which rode his Coachman, his Butler, and Postilion. It was sworn against Mr. Tildesley, 'That a troop of the Rebels went by his name also; and that he rode at the head of them with his sword drawn.' These two Gentlemen had nothing to say for themselves, but that they were forced to do what they did; and upon this slight defence, the Jury acquitted them both.

Two days after Mr. Baron Montague came to the Marshalsea Court, and discharged the Surrey Jury, after having reprimanded them for their behaviour in the late trials, especially in the case of Mr. Townley and Mr. Tildesley. The same day Mr. Wogan was tried, and found guilty; and Major Blair, retracting his former plea, pleaded guilty. Captain Lancelot Mackintosh and Charles Kadeliffe, brother to the late Earl of Derwentwater, were likewise found guilty, and received sentence of death.

Alexander Menzies petitioned the King for mercy, and was relieved, as were the rest of the persons hitherto condemned on the like submission, or the intercession of their friends, excepting those who are already mentioned to have been executed.

On the 30th of May came on the trial of Mr. John Dalton. The evidence against him being positive, the Jury found him guilty; upon which he desired the Court to intercede with the King for mercy.

Mr. William Tinsal pleaded guilty as to the being taken in arms, but not, as in the Indictment, of any design of murdering the King, which (he said) never entered into his heart. But the Court told him, 'That he, being a man of sense, could not but know had the Rebellion succeeded, it could not have ended otherwise, since it was certain that his Majesty would not have run away, as the Master they had declared for had already done.' The Lord Chief Justice Parker advised him to draw up the state of what he had to say in a petition, and he would recommend it to the King.

The next day Philip Hodgeson, uncle to the Lord Widdrington, Charles Widdrington, Peregrine Widdrington, Donald Robertson, Alexander Macruder, Thomas Errington, John Nairne, son to the Lord Nairne; George Seaton, who, before the battle of Dunklaim, went by the name of the Earl of Dunferling; John Stewart, Dr. Patrick Blair, James Robertson, William Grierson, son of Sir Robert Grierson, of Lagg; and John Carnegie, pleaded guilty to their Indictments. But Francis Anderton, Basil Hamilton, Archibald Rutter, William Shaftee, and William Paul, Clerk, pleaded not guilty; which plea some of them afterwards retracted, and pleaded guilty, while others were tried and found guilty. The condemned Rebels were reprieved from time to time; but, on the 13th of July, John Hall, and William Paul the Clergyman, were executed at Tyburn.

Hall in his dying speech declared, 'that he died a true and sincere member of the Church of England, but not of the Revolution Schismatical Church, whose Bishops had so rebelliously abandoned the King, and so shamefully given up the Rights of the Church, by submitting to the unlawful, invalid Lay-deprivations of the Prince of Orange; but of the true Catholic Non-juring Church of England.' Mr. Paul likewise professed himself a son of the Church of England, but not of the Schismatical Church, whose Bishops set themselves up in opposition to those orthodox Fathers, who were unlawfully and invalidly deprived by the Prince of Orange. I declare, says he, 'that I renounce that Communion, and that I die a dutiful and faithful member of the Nonjuring Church, which has kept itself free from Rebellion and Schism, and has preserved and maintained true orthodox principles, both as to Church and State.' Yet this same man, in a petition to the Lord Chief Justice King, after sentence, had declared, 'That, through the Grace of God, he had a deep insight into, and a lively sense of his crimes; which he did now at last detest and abhor from the bottom of his soul, and begged pardon of God, and King George, and his native Country, against all which he had highly offended, and did now sincerely repent, and declare his unfeigned sorrow, in having been instrumental towards encouraging and promoting the same.'

And, in a petition to the King, 'He humbly begged leave, in all sorrow of heart, to acknowledge his great and heinous offence, and did, from the bottom of his heart, ask pardon of God, his most sacred Majesty, and the Church and Nation.'

General Cadogan, whom the Duke of Argyle had left in Scotland, had now extinguished all remains of the Rebellion, both by securing the Chiefs, and disarming their Dependants. About the middle of April, the Marquiss of Huntley, eldest son of the Duke of Gordon, the Lord Rollo, Sir Thomas Calder, and the Laird of Tannaclue, were brought from the North of Scotland to Edinburgh, and committed to the Castle. Glengary, a famous leader of the Rebels, surrendered himself to the Duke of Athol, which inclined many of the Highlanders to submit, as did the greatest part of the Earl of Seaforth's vassals; and all the Clans, except those of the western Isles, being reduced, two detachments, one of six hundred, the other of three hundred men, were sent to those Isles, under the command of Colonel Clayton, and Lieutenant-Colonel Cholmondeley, upon which all the Rebels in the Isle of Skie submitted to mercy. The Rebels in the other Islands following their example, General Cadogan returned to Edinburgh, and from thence to London, where he arrived the 18th of May, having left the command of the forces in Scotland with General Sabine, and ordered the Dutch troops to march back into England, where they embarked for Holland, after having received, both officers and soldiers, marks of the King's bounty for their good services.

A Court-martial sitting at Edinburgh, made an order for the following Scots Officers, who had deserted from the Dutch service to the Pretender, to be hanged in effigy at the Market-Cross, 1716. Crofs, in the Cannon-Gate, Edinburgh, and their names to be infcribed round the Gallows (1).

Congratulatory addreffes were prefented to the King from the City of London, and moft of the Communities in the Kingdom, upon the intire fuppreffion of the Rebellion; and the 7th of June was appointed to be kept as a day of thankfgiving.

On the 3d of May, Mr. Harvey of Combe, who had been in the Meffenger's hands fince he flabb'd himfelf, was examined before a Committee of the Council, and fent to Newgate. About a week after, Mr. Thomas Harley, who had been formerly committed to the Gatehoufe by order of the Houfe of Commons, for his prevaricating answers to queftions, that were put to him concerning his Negotiations abroad, and was fupposed to have been ftill a prifoner, was found in a houfe in St. Martin's-Lane by Meffengers, who were fearching for fome of the Rebels, that had lately efcap'd out of Newgate. Mr. Harley had a great parcel of papers before him, which were feiz'd, and himfelf committed to the Gatehoufe.

go abroad.

The King, ftrengthened by his late treaty with Spain, and by that which he was now certain of concluding with the Duke of Orleans, and fecure of having fo faithful a Parliament for five years more, thought he fhould run no rifk in vifiting his German Dominions this fummer, where affairs of fecrecy and importance required his prefence. But it being provided, by the act for the further limitation of the Crown, &c. that no perfon, who fhould thereafter come to the poffeffion of the Crown, fhould go out of the Dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without confent of Parliament; the Court was fome time in fufpence, which way to get over that reftriktion. The afking the Parliament's confent by a meffage, or otherwife, being thought too derogatory to the Royal prerogative, and fome leading Members of the Houfe of Commons being made fenfible of it, Sir John Cope moved for repealing this reftriktion; which being agreed to, a bill paffed both Houfes for that purpofe (2).

When the King came to the Houfe of Peers to pafs this, and many other bills, and to put an end to the Seffion, the following fpeech was by his order delivered to both Houfes by the Lord Chancellor.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's Speech.

I Cannot put an end to this Seffion, without expreffing to you my fatisfaction in the proceedings of this Parliament. The wholefome and neceffary laws, which have been paffed with fo much fteadinefs, refolution, and unanimity, will, I truft in God, anfwer thofe good ends, which, it is evident, you have had in view, by defeating the defigns, and reducing the fpirit of our enemies, by encouraging our friends, and raifing the credit and reputation of the Nation abroad to fuch a degree, as that I may reasonable expect the fruits of a fettled Government; efpecially being fupported by a Parliament, zealous for the profperity of their Country, and the Proteftant intereft of Europe.

"I am confident, my conduct hitherto in fuppreffing the Rebellion, and punifhing thofe concerned in it, has been fuch, as demonftrates, that I defire rather to leffen their numbers by reclaiming them, than by making examples; but I am forry to find, that the numerous inftances of mercy, which I have fhewn, have had no other effect, than to encourage the faction of the Pretender to renew their infults upon my authority, and the laws of the Kingdom, and even to affect, with the greateft infolence, to diftinguifh themfelves from my good and faithful fubjects, acting with fuch folly and madnefs, as if they intended to convince the world, that they are not to be reduced to quiet and fubmiffion to my Government, by fuch gentle methods, as are moft agreeable to my own inclinations.

Gentlemen of the Houfe of Commons,

"I return you in particular my thanks for the fupplies you have given; which, altho' they fall fhort of the fums you found neceffary, and have voted for the fervice of the whole year; yet, by the encouragement you have given to make them effectual, may, I hope, be fo managed, as to carry on the current fervice till another Seffion of Parliament.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I am very fenfible, there are matters of great confequence ftill depending before you; but, as they have hitherto been poftponed out of abfolute neceffity, by intervening affairs of a more preffing nature, and of the moft immediate concern to the peace and fafety of the Nation, I thought the feafon of the year required, I fhould defer your further proceedings till the next Seffion, rather than 1716. "you should be detained out of your respective Counties longer than could be consistent with your private concerns.

"I cannot doubt but that, during this recess, you will use all your best endeavours to preserve the peace of the Kingdom, and to discourage and suppress all manner of disorders, since, as the first scene of the late Rebellion was opened and ushered in by tumults and riots, so you may be assured, upon what pretence soever they are raised, they can have no other tendency, but to support a spirit of faction, restless and unwearied in their endeavours to renew the Rebellion, and to subvert the religion, laws, and liberties of their Country.

"I design to make use of the approaching recess, to visit my Dominions in Germany, and to provide for the peace and security of the Kingdom during my absence, by constituting my beloved Son, the Prince of Wales, Guardian of the Realm, and my Lieutenant within the same."

After this speech, the Parliament was prorogued to the 7th of August.

Addison's Freeholders.

Thus ended this long Session of the first British Parliament called by King George. This Parliament, by the excellency and reasonableness of the laws made by them, recovered their Country in a great measure, out of its confusions, and provided for its future peace and happiness, under the present establishment. Their unanimous and regular proceedings; the absolute necessity of some acts, which were passed, and their disinclination to extend them any longer than that necessity required; their manifest aversion to enter upon schemes, which the enemies of the Nation had insinuated to have been their design; together with that temper so suitable to the dignity of such an assembly at a juncture, when it might have been expected, that very unusual heats would have arisen in an House of Commons so zealous for their King and Country, were sufficient to quiet those groundless jealousies and suspicions, which had been industriously propagated by the ill-wishers to our Constitution.

St. H.

The King had but too just cause to complain of the fresh insults of the disaffected, notwithstanding the many instances of his clemency. For on the 29th of May (King Charles's Restoration) the Jacobite and Tory factions had distinguished themselves by wearing oaken boughs, and on the 10th of June, the Pretender's birth-day, by wearing white roses. But the spirit of disaffection shewed itself no where more openly than at Oxford. On the 28th of May, the King's birth-day, all the windows that were illuminated there, were broken to pieces, as were all the windows that were not illuminated the next day, being the Anniversary of the Restoration. (1) To prevent the ill effects of this disaffection, soldiers were quartered there, who, as they were cheerfully and peaceably celebrating the Prince of Wales's birth day, were insulted by both the Scholars and Townsmen. Stones were thrown into the windows of the Star-Inn, where the Officers and some loyal Gentlemen were met, who were attacked by the disaffected party when they came out to drink the King's and the Royal Family's healths at the bonfire. Provoked by these affronts, the soldiers broke the windows of the disaffected, and committed some other disorders. When the Vice-Chancellor and the Mayor sent up their depositions to Court, they took no notice of the insults the Officers and Soldiers had met with, but only of what the soldiers had done by way of reprisals. As this affair came before the Parliament, it will be mentioned more largely hereafter.

On the 13th of June, General Maccartney, Maccartney who had returned to England, some time before, took his trial for the pretended murder of the Duke of Hamilton. Colonel Hamilton, who, in the Queen's time, had given such a positive evidence, that he saw General Maccartney give the Duke his mortal wound, now deviated from it, and only averred, that he saw his sword over the Duke's shoulder. The falsehood of which appeared by the evidence of the two Park-keepers, who stood firm to their former depositions, 'That they had taken the swords from General Maccartney and Colonel Hamilton, when they went to the relief of the Duke and Lord Mobun.' And one of them deposed, that he had been offered two handfuls of gold, and a place of 100*l.* a year, by the Lord Bolingbroke, if he would swear, that Mr. Maccartney killed the Duke. The Jury acquitted Mr. Maccartney of the murder, and he was discharged of the manslaughter by the formality of a cold iron immediately made use of to prevent appeal. He was soon after restored to his rank in the army, and had the Earl of Orrey's regiment given him.

The King before his departure appointed the Prince of Wales Guardian of the Realm, and his Lieutenant, during his absence. The titles of Duke of York, and Albany, and Earl of Ulster, were given to Prince Ernest, Bishop of Osnaburg, the King's Brother, who with Prince Frederick, was also made Knight of the Garter. The Duke of Devonshire was made President of the Council, and his place of Lord Steward of the Household was given to the Duke of Kent. The Earl of Portland was made Marquis of Titchfield, and Duke of Portland. These promotions were attended with unexpected disgraces. The Duke of Argyll and his brother, the Earl of Illy, were removed from all their employments (2). They had both distinguished themselves by their zeal and services for the Govern-

(1) At the next Assizes, among others, Wood, mancipal of Balliol, and Mr. Stirling of the same College, were tried for cursing the King: But Stirling was acquitted. Mr. Frank Nicholls, a Commoner of Exeter College, about fifteen years of age, was tried for crying out, Ormond for ever; and fined and imprisoned for the same. The Political State for July 1716, says, that he was tried for cursing the King and Government: But it is a mistake, for he was tried only for the fact above mentioned, as appears by the Record.

(2) A list of the Duke's posts and employments was made public, to this effect:

Governor and Commander in Chief, of all his Majesty's forces in Scotland; General of the King's armies; Lord-Lieutenant of the shire of Dumbarton; Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Surrey; Privy-Counsellor; Colonel of the Royal Blue Regiment of Horse; Governor of the Island of Minorca; Governor of Port Mahon, in the said Island; first Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, 1716. Government; and the King had in some measure put his Crown into their hands, by placing them at the head of his armies in Scotland. They had all along voted in the House of Lords on the Court-side; and therefore their removal was the more strange. Whatever might be the cause, their posts were disposed of, to shew there was no room to expect being restored. General Carpenter was made Commander in Chief of the forces in Scotland, and Governor of Minorca and Port-Mahon, and the Duke of Montrose was appointed Lord Clerk Register of Scotland, in the room of the Earl of Illy.

The King goes abroad.

On the 7th of July, the King set out from St. James's, took water at the Tower, and arrived about two in the afternoon, at Gravesend, where he went on board the Carolina Yacht (1). He was attended by Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Mr. Boscawen, Comptroller of the Household, the Officers of the Green Cloth, and most of his German Ministers, who embarked in other yachts. In Margate Road they met a squadron of men of war, commanded by Admiral Aylmer; and they all made the coast of Holland the 9th of July in the morning. About four in the afternoon, the King went ashore, and passed through Holland incognito; lay at Voorts, the Earl of Albemarle's seat, and arrived at Hanover the 15th of July; and on the 20th, set out for Pyrmont, to drink the waters.

Proceedings in the King's absence.

The King was absent six months, during which, the situation of affairs in Great-Britain remained much the same, and all was at last quiet, as if he had himself been present. The Prince (doubtless by his orders) set several prisoners at liberty, and reprieved others (2). The passage from Dover to Calais was opened, and passports no longer required to go from England to France. The King's enemies affected to believe and give out, that these proceedings were all owing to the Prince's good disposition, of which he would have shewn many more proofs, had it been in his power. This was carried so far, that addresses were preparing at Oxford and Glocester, and other places, to be presented to the Prince, to extol his wisdom in the Administration of affairs, and in particular, his affability and graciousness to all persons without distinction of Parties. It was soon perceived, that this insinuated a reflection upon the King and his Ministry, and therefore it was declared, the Prince would receive no addresses that were not directly made to the Throne.

The papers and speeches of some of the Rebels that were executed, particularly of Mr. Hall papers and and Mr. Paul, made great impression on many people. Their execution, instead of lessening, rather increased the number of the Jacobites; nor were they deterred from declaring themselves. Seditious sermons were preached, and libels against the Government were published (3). By these means a spirit of mutiny and rebellion was kept up among the disorderly rabble. So great was the disaffection to the Government at Oxford, ber, and Groom of the Stole to the Prince of Wales; and Knight of the Garter. Whether he was Governor of Edinburgh Castle at the time of his being thus dismissed, is a doubt; but to all these is to be added a pension of 2000 l. per annum, granted him by the King. His Brother was likewise Chief Lord of the Judiciary, and Lord Clerk-Register in Scotland. The hereditary Governments, Sherifdoms, &c. which the Duke and Earl possessed in Scotland, they could not be deprived of; neither could the Earl be removed from his place in the Judiciary, which was, as those of the Judges are in England, quam diu se bene gesserint, or rather, for life. Of these preferments, posts, and trusts, the Duke was dispossessed at once.

(1) The Duke of Argyle, it was observed, waited that morning on the King, and was for a few minutes in private Conference with him. Pol. Stat.

(2) On the 4th of August the Earl of Wintoun made his escape out of the Tower. On the 15th Mr. Farquharson of Invercald was set at liberty out of the Marshalsea, as was likewise the same day the Laird of Mackintosh, out of the Fleet-prison. Mr. John Mackintosh, a Lawyer, under sentence of death, was also released from Newgate; and Mr. James Drummond, who was taken prisoner at Dumblain, from the custody of a Messenger. About the same time pardons passed the Seals for some other prisoners, and in particular for Charles Radcliffe, brother to the late Earl of Derwentwater, and for Mr. Wogan; as likewise a further reprieve of three months was granted to the other Rebel prisoners under sentence of death. But Mr. Radcliffe, making some difficulty of accepting the pardon, was detained in Newgate till he made his escape from thence on the 11th of December following; as Mr. Bruce another of the Rebel prisoners had done on the 20th of August. The Lord Duffus, who, as Captain of a man of war, must have abjured the Pretender, and afterwards entered into his service, by joining with the Rebels in Scotland, was from Hamburg brought prisoner to London, examined by Mr. Secretary Methuen, and committed close prisoner to the Tower. Some time after fourteen of the Rebel prisoners were discharged out of Newgate, George Seton, Charles Max- well, Edmund Maxwell, William Dalnaboy, Alexander Forster, Alexander Milne, Francis Congleton, Alexander Congleton, Thomas Anderson, David Hall, George Skinner, William Dundas, Merchants; and Mr. Lyon. The same day the following persons were released from the Marshalsea; Mr. Winram, senior, Mr. Crow, Mr. Cunningham of Wall, Mr. William Scot, Mr. Carruthers, Mr. Murray, Mr. Grierison, and Mr. William Maxwell. Butler and Samburne, two of the Rebel prisoners, died in Newgate; and another Samburne made his escape out of it.

(3) The most noted pamphlet was published by Lawrence Houel (a Nonjuring Clergyman) intitled, The Case of Schism in the Church of England truly stated; wherein are the following passages:

'The authority of the Church of England, and consequently the Church of England itself, was with the deprived Bishops and Clergy, and remains still with their Successors, who alone have immediately adhered to her true constitutions and principles. That all, who depart from them, are at least, in a state of Schism.

That the canonical Metropolitan, Archbishop Sancroft, was not only displaced, but a Subject-presbyter of his (Dr. Tillotson) was hoisted into his room; and, when God had removed him, another (Dr. Tennison) was set up in his place, as head of the Schism. And under the Bishops, who actually did this, or those, who approved what they had done, by joining in communion with them, in opposition to the true canonical Bishops, have all the parochial Clergy acted, and joined with them, against the canonical Bishops; and being thus joined with them, they become Schismatics; and those, who have, or do still continue to join with these parochial Clergy, do join in the Schism, and thereby become guilty of Schism. Let them therefore have been never so canonically ordained, and placed over a flock, yet by cloving with Schismatics, they have forfeited all, and cannot dispense the Ordinances of God with any benefit; God's Grace and Influence, then and now, forsaking them. And to join communion with them is not only to lose the benefit of the Ordinance, but to join in the Schism, is to join with those, whom they ought to oppose with all their might, as viola-1716. Oxford, that soldiers were quartered there, to keep the Scholars and Townsmen within bounds. Nor were these riotous proceedings confined to England; for the Pretender's Friends at Edinburgh had like to have freed a great number of Lords and Gentlemen imprisoned there on account of the Rebellion (1).

Progress of the Prince. Few occurrences happened during the King's absence worth noting. The Prince of Wales, in September, took a progress into the Country. He set out the 24th, from Hampton-Court, and arrived at Knowle in Kent, the seat of the Earl of Dorset, before noon, and at Tunbridge-Wells about five in the evening. From thence he went to Halstead in Sussex, the seat of the Duke of Newcastle, where he lay, and came to Lewes about ten the next morning, and about nine in the evening to Stansted, the Earl of Scarborough's seat. The next morning, he proceeded to Portsmouth, and, having viewed the fortifications, docks, yards, and magazines, reviewed the regiments there, and went on board the guardship and bomb-ship, dined at Lieutenant-General Erle's, and returned in the evening to Stansted, where Archdeacon Boucher, one of the Canons Residentiary of Chichester, accompanied by the Prebendaries and Vicars of that Cathedral, with many of the neighbouring Clergy, were presented to him by the Lord Lumley. On the 27th, about nine in the morning, the Prince left Stansted, and, on a Common near Rake, reviewed Wynn's dragoons. He came to Farnham about one, and near that place reviewed Evans's dragoons. In the evening he arrived at Guildford, and, about eleven at night returned to Hampton-Court. Two days after, the Venetian Ambassador had a private audience, to notify the success of the arms of that Republic against the Turks, and the raising of the siege of Cypris, owing chiefly to the conduct of General Seydlitz.

tors and grand enemies of the unity and peace of God's Church.

In the conclusion, the Author cites the second Canon of the Church of England, and then proceeds to affirm:

That by King, mentioned in this Canon, is to be understood (according to the undoubted principles of the Church of England) that person, who is possessed of the Throne, according to the civil institution of the English hereditary Monarchy. Whosoever disowns his authority, &c. by the Canon, incurs the sentence of excommunication, ipso facto.

If King James II. had a Right, the Revolutionists and Compilers were excommunicated by this Canon; for, in depriving their rightful King, they disowned his Authority, &c. That he had a Right, and continued claiming to his death, none can deny: Witness his personal assertion of his Right in Ireland, his public Manifesto at the treaty of Ryswick (wherein he declares to the world, that that peace was founded upon the usurpation of his Kingdoms,) and other Declarations to the same purpose; and his Son (whose Right, as a Son, is as incontestable as his Father's) hath often repeated the same. Now, the violation of this second Canon, by the Revolutionists transferring their allegiance from their lawful King to an Usurper (which is disowning the lawful and rightful King's authority) renders them ipso facto Excommunicated; and the Nonjurors, who have faithfully adhered to the doctrine and principles, are the only true Church of England.

The State of the case plainly appearing, it is no difficulty to find out the guilty persons, who must be no other than those, that violated the Canon, by breaking through their allegiance, and consequently are in an immediate state of excommunication, and, as such, they ought to be deemed, and treated by all, though no declaratory sentence be pronounced by the proper Judges.

The words of the Canon being positive, there is no farther occasion to enlarge on it. The only question then is, Whether there is such a notoriety in our case? And, truly, I think, there scarce ever appeared in the world, a more notorious and manifest case. The matter of fact is evident to all; for, who is ignorant of the unnatural treatment of King James II. from his children and subjects? How his authority was trampled on, despised, and denied; and, after several attempts to recover his undoubted Right, how he was forced to live and die an exile? Nor is the case in the least altered now; for they, that pertinaciously continued and gloried in their sin then, do the same now; which makes the case so notorious, that these offenders ought to be treated as Excommunicated, ipso facto, upon the authority of the Canon, without waiting for the declaratory sentence of a Judge.

Let us now consider the state and condition of an excommunicated person, which is dreadful to any man; but, when it falls to be a Clergyman's lot, it makes fatal work; for, 1st, it divests him of the power of exercising any ecclesiastical jurisdiction; which, if he should presume to do, it renders his acts invalid and null. 2. Excommunication renders a Clergyman, so long as he continues in that state, incapable of any ecclesiastical benefit, or promotion; and, if he assume any, his institution is void. 3. It makes the whole administration of his ministerial office ineffectual. You can expect no return of prayers with him, with whom you ought not to communicate. He cannot, authoritatively, bless the people of God, who is himself, under a curse, and excluded from being a part of them. And here, I think, all those, who have joined with such Clergymen, ought to consider what they have done, in communicating with them, hitherto, and, whether they think they can, with safety, continue therein; for, in communicating with them, as Schismatics, they make themselves Schismatics; and, in communicating with them, as Excommunicated, not only all their labour is lost, but, instead of a blessing, they get a curse.

Mr. Howel was apprehended in Bull-Head Court, Tewin-Street, and, with him, was seized a large impression of his pamphlet. Among his papers, was found an original instrument, of his being ordained a Priest, by Dr. Hicks, who fills himself Suffragan Bishop of Thetford; and also, the form of abolition and reception of Converts to Jacobitism. He was committed to Newgate for High-Treason. Upon the publication of this charge of Schism on the Church of England, a controversy arose between the Members of that Church, and the Nonjurors. Howel being brought to his trial, and the pamphlet proved to be his, he was fined 500*l.* and three years imprisonment, and sentenced to be twice whipped. Upon which, he asked if they would whip a Clergyman? And was answered by the Court, 'They paid no deference to his cloth, because he was a disgrace to it, and had no right to wear it; and they did not look upon him as a Clergyman, in that he had produced no proof of his ordination, but from Dr. Hicks under the denomination of the Bishop of Thetford; which was illegal, and not according to the Constitution of this Kingdom, which knows no such Bishop.' As he received his sentence with an air of haughtiness, and behaved himself contemptuously to the Court, he was ordered to be degraded, and stripped of the gown he had no title to wear; which was done in the Court, by the Executioner. But, a few days after, upon his petition to the King, the corporal punishment was remitted.

(1) The most remarkable riot was that in London in the month of July. Some time before the breaking out of the Rebellion, many of the well-affected to the Government, in order to be ready on any proper occasion to quell the outrageous mob, that disturbed the peace

1716. lenberg, Commander of their army, though a Protestant, and brother to the Duchs of Kendal.

In the beginning of November, the Prince of Wales was in extreme danger, having been several days in labour, but at last was delivered of a dead Prince, who was privately deposited in a vault in Henry VII's Chapel.

About the same time the Duke of Mariborough was taken ill at Blenheim-House. His distemper being apoplectic, the fit so far impaired his health, that he never after could be said to be perfectly recovered.

The State prisoners that were in Edinburgh Castle being removed to Carlisle, a Commission was issued to try them at that place. The prisoners gave the Court little trouble, almost all of them pleading guilty. Some were condemned, and the rest discharged; but, however, not one was executed. In December, Brigadier Colin Campbell, the most obnoxious of all the prisoners made his escape in disguise. The last of the Rebels, who were executed at Lancaster and Preston, were Captain John Bruce, Gentleman of the Horse to the Duke of Hamilton, Thomas Shuttleworth, John Minkley, George Hodgson, and William Charnley; these were hanged in October.

On the 6th of December, an accident happened, which gave occasion to various conjectures. The Prince of Wales being in one of the Stage-boxes at the Theatre in Drury-Lane, to see the Tragedy of Themistocles, Mr. Freeman a Gentleman of Surrey, who had for some years past been troubled with fits of lunacy, came booted and spurred, and would have pressed into the Stage-box, near the place where the Prince was. Being in a mean riding habit, he was stopped by the Boxkeepers; and a Grenadier, who was upon duty; whereupon he drew out a pistol, and shot the Centinel in the shoulder. With great difficulty he was secured; and, being searched, two or three other loaded pistols were found about him; which, together with his man's waiting for him with two horses, at the end of the Play House passage, did not a little increase the suspicion of a treasonable design against the Prince. The report of the pistol, and the disturbance that followed it, occasioned a great alarm within the house, particularly among the Ladies; and, none rightly knowing the cause of the confusion, the Gentlemen and Officers about the Prince, and almost throughout the house, drew their swords; so that the Players were a considerable time at a stand. But, Mr. Freeman being sent prisoner to the Guard at St. James's, all was quiet again; the Prince having all this while preserved a great presence of mind, and appeared to be under no apprehension. The soldier's wound did not prove mortal; but Mr. Freeman's attempt of forcing the Prince of Wales's Guard coming within the statute of treason, after he had been examined before the Council, he was committed to Newgate, the rather, because he was said to have either killed, or mortally wounded a man two days before, in the Country.

A considerable change began now to be made in the Ministry. The Earl of Sunderland, who had gone beyond sea, under pretence of travelling for his health, had taken the opportunity of waiting upon the King at Hanover, and by his intrigues with the German Ministers there, particularly the Barons Brubner and Bernstorff, and Monsieur de Robelton, infused a jealousy into him of the Lord Townshend and Mr. Walpole; so that, on the 11th of December, an express arrived in England from Hanover, and the next day it was publicly known that Lord Townshend was removed from his place of Secretary of State. This was however softened with an account that his Lordship was to be advanced to the post of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; the Duke of Grafton, first Lord Justice of that Kingdom, being appointed Colonel of the Royal regi-

peace of the City of London, met in several public houses, which from the vessel in which the drink was sold, were called Mug-Houses. The two most noted of these societies were the Mug-House, in Long-Acre, and the Red-Buck in Chancery, being set up before the King's Accession. Their example produced several others of the like Houses in Salisbury-Court, Tavistock-Street, Southwark-Park, Covent-Garden, and other places. As these societies were a terror and mortification to the dissipated, so were they the object of their fury, of which they gave many instances. The day before Mr. Paul, the Clergyman, was hanged, they fell upon the Mug-House, in Southwark-Park, with their usual cry of High-Church and Ormond; but the society falling out upon them, after the windows of the house had been all broke, the mob retired. The execution of Mr. Paul, who declared himself at the gallows to be their Martyr, exasperated them yet more, and the society at Mr. Read's in Salisbury-Court, having distinguished themselves by demonstrations of duty and respect to the Prince and Princess of Wales, at their return from Greenwich; the Jacobites took so much offence at it, that on the 20th of July, they attacked Mr. Read's house, and would have demolished it, had not the company within sent for a reinforcement from Tavistock-Street, with which being joined, the mob fled with great precipitation. But they continued hovering about the house the following days; and hearing that Mr. Archibald Butler, a young Scots Gentleman, who had been in the Rebellion, but had received the King's pardon, was in the Temple-Walks, they ran thither crying out, High-Church and Ormond.

Mr. Butler got away from them as fast as he could; and presently one Vaughan a Small-coal-man, proposed to them to go and revenge the affront they had received three days before at the Mug-House in Salisbury-Court. The mob, assenting to his proposal, followed him to Mr. Read's house, on which they fell furiously; but, meeting with a vigorous resistance, they gathered recruits from the multitudes, that crowded thither. Upon this alarm, and hearing they were determined to demolish the house, Mr. Read appeared, and bid them keep off; otherwise he would shoot amongst them. The Bridewell-Boys, of whom Vaughan had been one, and the rest of the mob, regardless of this fair warning, pressing forwards with great clubs and sticks, Mr. Read discharged a musket, and shot Vaughan, their leader, who died on the spot. The riot continuing, the Sheriffs of London repaired to the place, who caused the Proclamation appointed by Act of Parliament against riots to be read; but this not availing, and the Rioters being become Rebels, a party of Horse-Guards was ordered by the Privy-Council to march to Salisbury-Court to suppress them; and, upon their appearance, the mob dispersed and fled from the pursuit of justice; which, however, overtook some of them; for John Love, Thomas Bean, a servant to Cassils and Carnegie, two condemned Rebels, then in Newgate, George Price, Richard Price, and William Price, five of the most active of the rioters, were seized, imprisoned, and tried upon the statute, which makes it felony to demolish, or begin to demolish any house. The evidence against them proved their breaking the windows with stones and sticks, pulling 1716. regiment of Horse-Guards, lately commanded by the Duke of Argyle; and the Earl of Galway, the other Lord Justice of Ireland, being to enjoy an honourable pension during life. Two days after, the Duke of Roxburgh was made Secretary of State, and Keeper of the King's Signet in Scotland. The Lord Poleworth was appointed Lord Clerk Register, in the room of the Duke of Montrose, who was made Keeper of the Great-Seal of Scotland. The Duke of Kington was appointed Keeper of the Privy-Seal, and the Earl of Sunderland sole Treasurer of Ireland for life.

In this disposition things remained till the King's return; and the Lord Townshend's removal affected no more for the present than himself; though the divisions in the Ministry seemed irreconcilable (1).

During these transactions at home, the King was not idle abroad. One of the principal ends of the King's journey to Hanover, was to provide against any future attempts of the Jacobite party, by endeavouring to make Alliances with all those powers from whence the Pretender might expect any support. But this was an impossible undertaking, in the then situation of the affairs of Europe. The King of Spain pretended to have numberless complaints against the Emperor. The evacuation of Catalonia had given great offence, as to the manner of doing it. A Tribunal had been erected at Vienna for the affairs of Spain, and the estates of the Flemish, who had served King Philip, were confiscated. But these were slight grievances in comparison of what was now in agitation. Sicily had been granted to the Duke of Savoy, by the Utrecht treaty, on condition of returning to Spain, in case of failure of heirs. The Emperor had looked upon this grant with the utmost concern. He had almost persuaded the Duke of Savoy to accept Sardinia in exchange, without the participation of the Court of Madrid, and without any regard to the clause of reversion. To all these occasions of rupture were added the pretensions of the two Courts to the Succession of the Tuscan Dominions.

As to France, with respect to Spain, the two Nations were united, but their Governors were not so. King Philip and the Duke of Orleans were ready to contend for the Crown of Lewis XV, in case death should remove him out of the world. Philip had renounced that Crown, and upon that alone was founded the Duke of Orleans's title. But, besides that, the Renunciation was generally considered in France as of no great force; the Emperor's constant refusal to cease styling himself King of Spain, seemed entirely to annul it, as it was not reasonable that one contracting party should be obliged to stand to mutual engagements, to which the other refuses to submit. King George therefore could not be attached to France without offending Spain, nor could he be united to Spain, without giving offence to both the others.

The case was much the same with the Northern Powers, and it was still more difficult for King George to manage them, so as to draw none of them upon himself. Denmark and Sweden were at war: The Czar had entered into

ing down the sign, entering the house, fetching out the goods, treading upon them, and breaking them. It was sworn at their trial, that one of the mob brought three bottles out of Mr. Read's house, kneeled down, by the Swan Ale-house door, and drank the Pretender's health, by the name of King James the Third. The evidence against these five rioters being very strong, they were all found guilty, and received sentence of death. The Prince was very much inclined to shew mercy to one or two of the youngest of them; but, the dangerous consequences of riots and tumults, in the heart of the Metropolis, and the necessity of preventing the same, by exemplary punishment, being represented to the Prince, he acquiesced in the course of justice; which had the good effect, that was foreseen and intended, the putting a stop to the desperate outrages of an enthusiastical multitude. The five rioters were executed on a gibbet, erected, on the 21st of September, at the end of Salisbury-Court, near the place where the crimes, for which they died, were committed. George Purchas acknowledged himself greatly guilty, and his sentence just; praying God to forgive him this and all other his sins. This, he said, he rashly committed, not considering, then, the unlawfulness and dismal consequences of such a rebellious sedition, as that was, which so much tended, not only to the ruin of private persons, but to the great disturbance of, and dishonour to, the whole Government.

However, some party-zealots prosecuted Mr. Read for the death of Vaughan, who had led on the mob to destroy his house. The witnesses against him, at his trial, swore very strongly against him. John Bill deposed, That he believed, Vaughan did not belong to the mob in Salisbury-Court, and had no stick in his hand. Charles Tuckey swore, that Vaughan had no stick. The same was sworn by Catherine Bennet. Joseph Harris deposed, that Vaughan told him, He could not be concerned, but go to work. This being so directly contrary to the fact, known to so many hundreds of spectators, and fully proved by several of them, the Jury acquitted Mr. Read, who had 400 l. paid him at the Treasury, to make good his losses and charges: And Mr. Gill, at the Roebuck in Cheapside, had 200 l. allowed him, on the same account, his house having been several times attacked by the mob, of whom, one, the apprentice of Mr. Heptinstall, a Printer, was shot, pressing on as Vaughan did, notwithstanding repeated warnings to keep off.

Edward Southwell, James Vernon, and Andrew Carlton were appointed Commissioners of the Privy Seal, in the absence of the Earl of Sunderland.

Mr. Bruce, a Scotch Prisoner, changing cloaths with his sister, made his escape out of Newgate.

In August there blew so strong a Westerly wind (which forced back the tide, and drove forward the ebbing water) that the Thames lay perfectly dry above and below bridge, except a narrow channel about four foot deep, and twelve foot over.

Several of the School-masters of the Charity schools, in London, were removed for disaffection to the Government. Dr. Wolsten, Rector of White-Chapel, was deprived also for disaffection to the Government, and was succeeded by Dr. Shippin, of Brazen-nose-College in Oxford.

Margaret, eldest daughter of the Lord Comingsby, was created Baroness and Viscountess of Comingsby, of Hampton-Court, in Hertfordshire, with limitation to her heirs male.

January the 4th, the triple league between Great-Britain, France, and Holland was signed at the Hague.

Three days after the King's return, January the 22d, came on the famous trial of Francis the Jew, for corresponding with the King's enemies. He was acquitted.

Thirty of the Preston Rebels having been put on board a ship to be transported, affidavits were made before the Mayor of Liverpool, that they had mastered the ship's crew, and carried the ship to France. One hundred of the same Prisoners who had been confined in the Savoy, were shipped off for the West-Indies.

1716. into a confederacy, which had taken from the Suede his German Dominions: The Princes of the Empire beheld with regret the Russians in their Country. It was the business of those who had called them in, and made use of them, to send them away. The acquisition of the Duchies of Bremen and Verden, which King George had gained as Elector of Hanover, had enraged King Charles of Sweden. He durst not as King of Great-Britain, declare war against him (though he had done it as Elector of Hanover) nor could he be reconciled with him, unless he restored the two Duchies. The only way therefore was to compel that warlike Prince to make peace. In this situation, it was necessary for King George to make Alliances, and unite with those who could most annoy him in case they became his enemies. Being sure of the good disposition of the Regent of France, he trusted to his Ministers the Negotiations with that Prince, and undertook himself the affairs of the North, where it is plain, he knew some enterprize was contriving in favour of the Pretender.

With France and the States. The Negotiation with France succeeded to his wish. The Duke of Orleans, who had still more need of a support to mount the Throne, in case of a vacancy, than the King had to maintain himself on that of Great-Britain, granted all that was desired. The States-General, who aimed only at peace and security, readily came into a treaty, which embroiled them with no Power they were concerned to manage, and which laid upon them scarce any fresh obligation. General Cadogan, the Abbot du Bois, and Pensionary Heinsius negotiated this affair with such secrecy, that the treaty was finished almost before it was known to be in hand.

The treaty with France. By this treaty, the Pretender, that his near-ade might not encourage commotions in Great-Britain, was to depart immediately from Avignon, and go beyond the Alps; nor was he to be suffered at any time to come to return thither, or to pass through the French Territories under pretence of going to Lorrain, or even to set his foot in any place within the Dominions of France, much less to stay there on any pretence whatsoever. This was accompanied with the renewing of the promises made at Utrecht, of absolutely refusing protection to the Chevalier de St. George, and of assisting him in any manner directly or indirectly. No refuge was to be given to the subjects of either party who should be declared Rebels. All that had been formerly agreed, concerning Dunkirk, was to be fully executed, and nothing was to be omitted that the King of Great Britain should think necessary for the intire demolition of the harbour, and for the removing all suspicion that a new harbour was intended to be made on the canal of Mardyke. This treaty referred to a memorial signed at London in September, by Monsieur Iberville, Resident of France, and the Lord Townsend and Mr. Melbuen, Secretaries of State, containing the particulars required by King George to make him easy, and cure his suspicions.

After these Preliminaries (which might be considered as the purchase given by France for this Alliance) it was added, that the true design of this treaty being to strengthen the friendship established by the late treaties at Utrecht, the articles of those treaties, as far as they concerned the contracting parties, were confirmed and ratified, particularly that the Succession, to the Crown of Great-Britain, in the Protestant Line, and to the Crown of France, in the family of Orleans, exclusive of the House of Anjou, should remain in full force. A mutual Guarantee was also given for the performance of these, and all the other articles, and for the defence of the Dominions possessed by the three powers at the time of signing the treaty. Then was settled the succours each should give the party attacked, after fair means had been used to induce the aggressor to desist from his enterprise. France and England were to furnish each eight thousand foot, and two thousand horse, and the States half that number. It was free to demand ships or money instead of troops, and, to prevent all occasion of dispute, it was agreed that a thousand foot should be valued at 10,000 Dutch florins a month, and a thousand horse at 30,000. The succours at sea were to be valued in the same proportion.

The chief end of this treaty being to support the Successions to the two Crowns, that article was very largely explained. It was agreed, that if the Kingdoms, Countries, or Provinces of any of the Allies were disturbed with intestine Divisions, or by Rebellions, on account of these Successions, or any other pretence, the Ally so disturbed should have a right to demand aid, as in case of being attacked by a foreign Power; that this aid should be sent within two months after demand, and the necessary expences advanced by those of whom it was demanded, and no repayment to be required till a year after the troubles should cease. In case this aid should not be sufficient, it was added, the whole forces of the other parties should be employed, and if, occasion required, war should be declared against the aggressors.

As soon as this treaty was made public, it raised great murmurings, especially in France, where it was openly said, that the Regent sacrificed to his ambitious views, the honour and advantage of the Nation; the condescension hitherto shewn for England on account of the Chevalier de St. George had been too great, but the present proceedings were shameful and mean: The demolition of Mardyke would be an eternal monument of the subjection of France to England: Lewis XIV. would never have consented to it, and the unsettled State of Great Britain did not put her into a condition to impose Laws: A Prince, who had no other interest but that of his people, would have taken the opportunity to finish a work so important and necessary: The expressions in the treaty, of doing whatever the King of Great Britain shall judge necessary to remove his suspicions, were of a very high strain, and derogatory to the sovereignty of the Crown of France.

The King of Spain was highly offended at this Alliance, and complained of it bitterly, affirming, it belonged to the States of the Realm, not to Foreigners, especially the English, perpetual enemies to France, to decide pretensions to the Throne, in case God should, in his anger, call the young King to himself: And from that time he took measures to disconcert this Alliance.

This strict Alliance with France was found fault with even in England, where it was pretended, that the Succession was sufficiently secured by the treaty of Utrecht, and there was no occasion

1716. occasion for so many foreign troops, which might be called in on pretence of an Invasion, and perhaps be used for very different purposes. The King and Regent disregarded these murmurs, being satisfied that their mutual interest would oblige them to an inviolable performance of their engagements. The character of these two Princes had a great resemblance in many particulars, they had both great talents for Government, and may be said to have equally had an occasion for them in their respective circumstances, which were much the same. Alike dissatisfied with the late Administration of affairs, they observed the same conduct. None of the friends and creatures of Lewis XIV. were in favour with the Duke of Orleans; as none of the friends and creatures of Queen Anne were in favour with King George. The difference, in their manner of treating them, entirely flowed from the different usages of the Nations they governed. King George delivered himself up to the Whigs, who had been persecuted in the late Reign: The Duke of Orleans seemed to give himself up to the Janfenists, whom Lewis XIV. had constantly ill-used: They changed Ministers almost as often one as the other: Their Competitors inspired them with the same views, and almost the same precautions: They were alike even in their death, for Both died suddenly. The Duke of Orleans is said to have had a more prompt and ready genius: The multitude and difficulty of his affairs never hindered him from pursuing his pleasures, whereas King George was always attentive, always serious, and seemed an enemy to all amusements; and therefore he was, beyond comparison, more regular in his manners and conduct; besides, he was more constantly attached to the party he had espoused, and was never seen to waver between the Whigs and Tories, as did the Duke of Orleans between the Janfenists and Molinists.

Negotiations in the North almost fruitless. General Cadogan had much better success in his Negotiations with France, than the King had in his with the Northern Powers. Notwithstanding all his endeavours, he could engage them neither to be reconciled, nor even to suspend their resentments. He seemed, however, to have succeeded in spite of the King of Denmark's desire to preserve his advantages, and the King of Sweden's eagerness to revenge and repair his losses. His Swedish Majesty had presented to the Emperor and the Diet pacific memorials, and even sent Plenipotentiaries to assist at the Congress of Brunswick; but all these hopes quickly vanished. King George had, however, made that Prince all the advances imaginable: Had strongly pressed the Emperor, the Kings of Denmark and Prussia, and even the Czar himself, that the Russians might march out of the Empire: Nay, it is said, he had proceeded so far towards a separate peace with the King of Sweden, as to offer to join with him against the Muscovites, on condition only that he would renounce all pretensions to the Duchies of Bremen and Verden. King Charles XII. was intractable; incensed at the war made against him, when he could not defend himself; and still more at the peace, which they would compel him to make, on conditions, as he thought, both dishonourable and hard, he breathed nothing but revenge, and was as much offended with the King of Great-Britain, as with the Czar and the King of Denmark.

As King George could not obtain the cession he desired, he took the best measures to secure his new acquisitions, and compel the King of Sweden to remain quiet. It was given out, that the Confederacy he had entered into was formed purely for the sake of peace. It was agreed by the Confederates, that each should furnish a certain number of forces and ships, not to make new conquests upon Sweden, but to oblige his Swedish Majesty to sit easy under his losses, and not endeavour to recover them. This rupture with Sweden was not only detrimental to the trade of Great-Britain, but had like to prove fatal to the King; for, whilst he was labouring for a peace in the North, in order to secure his German possessions, a scheme was contriving to deprive him of his British Dominions.

The dissatisfied in England, still pursuing their designs in favour of the Pretender, turned their eyes on the King of Sweden to accomplish it. They knew how exasperated he was against King George, and how glad he would be of a revenge: Count Gyllenburg was the Swedish Resident at London. The Count was applied to, or perhaps made the first overtures. The affair was carried on not only at London, but by Baron Gortz, the Swedish Ambassador at the Hague, and by Baron Sparre at Paris, with the English Jacobites there, and other Friends of the Pretender. Baron Gortz, who was the projector of this plot, went to France, in order to bring things to the point he desired, and because the secret could be kept better at Paris than at the Hague. The Czar was also treated with, who was known to be offended with King George.

These Negotiations could not be so privately managed, but that they were suspected by the Court of England. In April, when the Septennial Bill was in hand, intimations had been given that a second Invasion was to be feared, and this apprehension was made one of the motives for continuing a House of Commons, in which the King had so much reason to confide. These suspicions were indeed not very clear, but, in the situation of Europe at that time, it was not difficult to guess from what quarter the danger was to come. The good disposition of the Duke of Orleans had removed all uneasiness with respect to France. The King of Spain, wholly intent on his projects against the Emperor, could not be suspected of quarrelling with England. The North therefore was the only Place from whence the storm could be thought to proceed: This conjecture, the only reasonable one that could be formed, determined King George to repair to Hanover, where he could best discover the intentions of his enemies. He succeeded in his design; at least the public was, in a few days after his arrival at London, informed of the plot, by the seizing of Count Gyllenburg.

The King, having finished all his affairs abroad, set out from Hanover the 19th of January, N. S. The King's return to England. and in ten days landed at Margate, from whence he proceeded to London.

It was expected, the Parliament would have immediately met, but their meeting was put off for some time, on account of a surprising event. On the 29th of January, Mr. Secretary Stanhope communicated to the Privy Council the informations, the King had received of a Conspiracy, which had, for some time, been carried on to excite a new Rebellion, and to favour a foreign Invasion. The same night Major Smith,
The Swedish Resident seized

1716-17. an Irish Officer, who was no longer in the service, and who, that very evening, had been playing at Basset at the apartments in St. James's, was seized at his lodgings; and, about twelve o'clock, Lieutenant Colonel Blakeney, with a detachment of the Foot-guards, secured the House of Count Gyllenburg, the Swedish Resident. Not long after, Major-General Wade, attended by the Colonel, went and knocked at the door of the Swedish Minister, and being admitted, found him making up some dispatches. Having, in a few words, made him a compliment, and acquainted him with his Commission to put a guard upon his person, and to secure his papers, he laid hold on such, as were on the table, and demanded those, that were in his scrutoire. Count Gyllenburg's surprize raised in him an extraordinary emotion, which made him expostulate with some warmth about the law of Nations being violated in his person; but having somewhat recovered his temper, he desired leave to send for the Marquis de Monteleone, the Spanish Ambassador, that he might consult with him, how to act on such an occasion. But General Wade, having positive orders not to let him speak with any person, could not grant his request. On the other hand, the Count's Lady having refused the keys of the scrutoire, upon pretence, that there was nothing in it but linen and plate, the General caused it to be broke open; and having found in it a great many papers, he sealed them all up, and left a strong guard upon the Resident. The same morning Charles Caesar, formerly Treasurer of the Navy, and Member of Parliament for the Borough of Hertford; and Sir Jacob Banks, formerly Member of Parliament for Minehead, were apprehended, upon suspicion of being in Confederacy with Count Gyllenburg.

There were several conjectures as to the means of this important discovery. Some affirmed, the King had long before notice of the design from France; others, that the discovery was owing to an intercepted letter from Count Gyllenburg to the Lord Duffus, prisoner in the Tower: And others asserted, the Lord Duffus accidentally revealed the Conspiracy to an English Lord, his fellow prisoner, who discovered it to the Government, and thereby merited his pardon. Be this as it will, it is certain, that the King and his Ministers had long before entertained suspicions of the Count's clandestine practices; which were not a little increased upon the publication of a libel about September 1716, intitled, An English Merchant's remarks upon a scandalous Jacobite paper published in the Post-Boy, under the name of, 'A memorial presented to the Chancery of Sweden, by the Resident of Great-Britain.' Of which libel Count Gyllenburg was suspected to be the Author, as afterwards appeared by his letters*.

The securing the person and papers of a public Minister being an affair of an extraordinary nature, and some foreign Ministers having expressed their sentiments of it at Court, they were given to understand, that in a day or two they should be acquainted with the reasons for proceeding against the Swedish Minister in such a manner. Accordingly, the Secretaries of State, Mr. Stanhope and Mr. Melbuen, wrote a circular letter to the foreign Ministers of their respective districts, who were pretty well reconciled to the proceedings of the Court; only the Marquis de Monteleone, the Spanish Ambassador, last, in his answer to Mr. Stanhope: 'That he was sorry no other way could be found out, for preserving the peace of his Majesty's Dominions, without arresting the person of a public Minister, and seizing all his papers, which are the sacred repositories of the secrets of his Master; and in whatever manner these two facts may seem to be understood, they seem very sensibly to wound the law of Nations.'

Not many days after the seizing of Count Baron Gyllenburg, Baron Gortz, Minister and Favourite of the King of Sweden, was likewise secured in Guelderland, in the following manner: Mr. Leathes, the British Resident at the Hague, received the King's orders to desire the Regents of that State to consent to the seizing of Baron Gortz, with his two Secretaries Mr. Stamcke and Mr. Gustavus Gyllenburg; the Baron having for some time been concerned in carrying on a correspondence, and concerting measures with the British Rebels in France, and with several persons in England, by means of Count Gyllenburg, for raising a Rebellion in England, to be supported by a foreign force. Mr. Leathes went immediately to Amsterdam, and disposed the Magistrates of that place to consent to the securing of Baron Gortz, in case he should come thither from France; and returned back to the Hague. The same night Baron Gortz arrived there, having heard at Calis of Count Gyllenburg's being put under arrest, which prevented his going over to England, as he intended. He had, on the 18th of February, a Conference with the Imperial Minister, wherein he extolled the inclination of the King of Sweden to peace, and insisted on a resolution about his last propositions; but the next day, he set out, a little before noon, in a post chaise, accompanied by General Pontasowski, having as it is believed, had some notice, that orders were given to secure him, which, indeed, he narrowly escaped. For upon Mr. Leathes's application, the Council of the States of Holland met, and passed a resolution for seizing the Baron and his Secretaries; but before it could be executed, the Baron and Mr. Stamcke were gone that morning for Amsterdam; so that only Mr. Gyllenburg was then taken. A party of horse was immediately sent after the other two, and Mr. Leathes followed them to Amsterdam, and learning where Baron Gortz was lodged, he went, accompanied with the proper Officers, to the house of M. Teilsen, a Swedish Merchant, and searched it; but the Baron had left it some hours before. However a box was found, in which were twelve large packets of letters; and informations being given which way the Baron had taken, some persons were dispatched after him, who seized him and Mr. Stamcke at Arnhem, by leave of the Magistrates of that place, as they were taking coach to go on from thence. Mr. Leathes, being returned to the Hague, waited on the Deputies of the Province of Guelderland, who thought fit to write a letter to the Magistrates of Arnhem, ordering them to cause the Baron and M. Stamcke to be kept in safe custody. On this occasion, all those of the Regency, who were applied to, entered readily into the reasonableness of the King's demands, and gave all the assistance and dispatch, that was consistent with the known forms of proceeding in that Country. It is observable, that, when Baron Gortz was seized, he

1716-17. owned himself to have been the projector of the intended Invasion of Great Britain by the King of Sweden, and that he had actually provided ten thousand arms, and other necessaries for this service, valuing himself very much upon what he had done in this affair, as thinking it extremely for the interest of his Master, and a noble and glorious enterprize (1).

The second Session of the fifth Parliament of Great-Britain.

The Parliament of Great-Britain met on the 20th of February, according to their last prorogation; and the King being come to the House of Peers with the usual solemnity, and delivering a speech into the Lord Chancellor's hands, it was by him read to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's Speech.
Pr. H. C.

"I Was in hopes, that the success which it pleased God to give us, in defeating the late Rebellion, should have secured to the Nation peace, plenty and tranquillity.

"My endeavours have not been wanting, during your recess, to improve the happy prospect, which was in view, by entering into such Negotiations, as I judged most conducive to those good ends: And it is with pleasure I can acquaint you, that many defects in the treaties of Utrecht, which very nearly affected the trade, and even the security of these Kingdoms, have been remedied by subsequent Conventions, the happy consequences of which have already very sensibly appeared by the flourishing condition of our trade and credit.

"By the Alliance lately concluded with France and the States-General, we are soon to be eased of all future apprehensions from Dunkirk and Mardyke. The Pretender is actually removed beyond the Alps: His adherents are deprived of all hopes of support and countenance from France; and even the assistance of that Crown is stipulated to us in case of exigency.

"It seemed reasonable to expect, that such a situation of affairs at home and abroad should have recovered from their delusion all such of our subjects, as had unhappily been seduced by the craft and wickedness of desperate and ill-designing men, and thereby have afforded me the opportunity, which I desired, of following the natural bent of my own inclinations to lenity, by opening this Session with an Act of Grace. But such is the obdurate and inveterate rancour of a faction a"mongst us, that it hath again prompted them to animate and stir up foreign Powers to disturb the peace of their native Country: They will choose rather to make Britain a scene of blood and confusion, and to venture even the putting this Kingdom under a foreign Yoke, than give over their darling design of imposing a Papish Pretender.

"I have ordered to be laid before you copies of letters, which have passed between the Swedish Ministers on this occasion, which contain a certain account of the projected Invasion: And I promise myself from your experienced zeal and affection to my Person and Government, that you will come to such resolutions, as will enable me by the Blessing of God, to defeat all the designs of our enemies against us.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I did hope, the putting an end to the late Rebellion would have so far secured the peace and tranquillity of the Nation, that I might, consistently with the safety of my people, have made a considerable reduction of the forces. But the preparations, which are making from abroad to invade us, oblige me to ask such supplies, as you shall find absolutely necessary for the defence of the Kingdom.

"You are all sensible of the insupportable weight of the national debts, which the public became engaged for, from the necessity of the times, the pressures of a long and expensive war, and the languishing state of public credit. But, the scene being now so happily changed, if no new disturbances shall plunge us again into treights and difficulties, the general expectation seems to require of you, that you should turn your thoughts toward some method of extricating yourselves, by reducing, by degrees, the debts of the Nation.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have an intire confidence in you, and have therefore nothing to ask, but, that you would take such measures, as will best secure your Religion and Liberties. While you preserve those inestimable Blessings, I shall sit easy and safe on my Throne, having no other view but the happiness and prosperity of my people (2).

The

(1) To justify this Invasion, it was urged, that King George, as Elector of Hanover, had assisted the Princes in Confederacy against the King of Sweden, proclaimed war against him, aided the King of Denmark to take Bremen and Verden, and afterwards purchased these two Duchies of him. And this year had given instructions to Sir John Norris to join the Danish and Russian fleets in the Baltic; which the Admiral did accordingly.

(2) Besides the treaty of Commerce with Spain (by which the three articles tacked to the treaty of Utrecht were revoked, and all other grievances in trade removed) and the Triple Alliance between Great-Britain, France, and the States, the King had concluded another treaty with the Emperor, May 16, 1716, which he did not think fit to mention to the Parliament. By this treaty, there was to be perfect unity between them, and each was to reckon the advantages and losses of the other as his own. They were to defend one another in the possession of all their present Kingdoms, Provinces, and Rights, and in case either of them was attacked, the other was to assist with eight thousand foot and four thousand horse, or with ships in proportion. No Prince was to be admitted without common consent; but the States were to be admitted, and even invited without delay, to accede to it. By a separate article this treaty was not to extend to the Emperor's wars with the Turks.

The design of this Alliance was to rouse the jealousy of France, and incline the Regent to hasten a treaty with England. Accordingly, when he heard of this treaty, he resolved to enter into an Alliance with Great-Britain and Holland, and the treaty (as hath been said) was concluded at Hanover the beginning of the next year.

(1) The

1716-17. The King being withdrawn, and the Com-Scheme of an intend- ed Inva- sion and Rebellion.
mons returned to their House, Mr. Secretary Stanhope laid before them copies of the letters which passed between Count Gyllenburg, the Barons Gortz and Sparre, and others, relating to a design of raising a Rebellion in Great-Britain, to be supported by an Invasion from Sweden. By these letters it appeared, that a design was formed to dethrone King George, and conducted in such a manner, as almost to warrant success. Artful papers were published to foment and increase discontent and division; the apparent tranquillity, enjoyed in Great-Britain, was to be an occasion of requiring and obtaining the reduction of the national, and dismissal of the foreign forces; ships, bought at different places, were to assemble at Gottenburg by the end of March, when the East-winds usually blow, on board of which eight thousand foot, and four thousand horse were to embark, with artillery, ammunition, and arms for fifteen thousand men. The great number of the Disaffected had been so far relied on, that the secret of the Negotiation had been trusted in England but to very few persons; nothing was transacted in writing; no treaty was made; the mutual concern for the success of the undertaking was, as it were, the warrant for the promises that were given.

This method of treating prolonged the Negotiation, but withal was a security against the ill consequences of a discovery. Both sides were equally desirous of being concealed. The King of Sweden absolutely refused to appear in the affair, till the time of execution; and the Pre-tender's friends, with whom Count Gyllenburg treated at London, would not engage for any thing till they had his Master's word. They did not care to labour in vain; but as soon as they should have the assurance of his assistance, money should not be wanting; nor means to support the affair. Upon this, Baron Gortz spoke out more plainly. He sent word, he had done nothing but upon the knowledge of his Master's intentions, and had lately been impowered in form to prosecute the enterprize. He sent a copy of his full powers which were unlimited, and it was visible they were so extensive, only because there might be no occasion to mention the affair, which was to be concealed from the Ministers at Stockholm.

This assurance removed all uneasiness and in-resolution; money was given; views were explained; means of substituting the foreign troops were particularised; a person was procured, who was perfectly acquainted with the coasts where it was resolved they should land; ships of war were provided, from sixty to seventy guns; Merchant-men, that were to carry corn to Gottenburg, were to serve for transports. The scheme was well laid, and the execution seemed infallible; especially, if the army had been reduced, and the Dutch forces sent home. Twelve thousand chosen Swedes, in a condition to receive those that were ready to join them, would have quickly formed a powerful army: Encouraged by such an army, the people would have risen on all sides:
The Highlanders would have all been in arms:
The torrent would have increased without ceasing, and a battle would have decided the affair. Thus much is certain, the project was infinitely better concerted than the last year's:
The continual motions of the Swedish forces would have served to cover the true design, till it would have been too late to oppose it; a few days sufficed to convey them into Scotland or England. But a timely discovery confounded all these measures, and established King George on the Throne (1).

The

(1) The reader may see all these particulars, at large, in the following abstracts of the letters.

The first letter is from Baron Sparre, to Count Gyl-lenburg, dated at Paris, September 25, 1716; in which the Baron acquaints the Count, 'That three days before, he was informed, that he [Count Gyllenburg] had entered upon business with some Lords of the chief of the Pretender's party: That they took it for granted, he was authorized to do so, by the King of Sweden; and, in a word, that he was inclined to believe, that his Swedish Majesty would espouse the interests of that Prince. In the first place, adds the Baron, I will tell you, that I shall be charmed with it; and then, that it is not from a motive of curiosity, that I ask, whether what I have heard be true; but that I may co-operate with you, though indirectly, till I have powers like yours, with which, you know, we are obliged to proceed very cautiously. Do me the friendship to let me know, what there is in this matter, as soon as possible. I flatter myself, you will find your account in it.

The next is a letter from Count Gyllenburg to Baron Gortz, dated London, Sept. 29, O. S. Octob. 9, N. S.
1716; which, being very material, deserves to be inserted at length. 'In answer to your Excellency's letter, says the Count, of the 22d past, I now do myself the honour to acquaint you, that every body here is of opinion, that either France is extremely weak, or else that the Regent aims at the Throne, and is desirous to purchase it of King George, at any rate; for, otherwise, it is thought impossible, that France could condescend to make so ignominious a sacrifice, as the does, of a work [Marduke] which cost her so much, and for which the late King would have undergone a ten years war. People go so far here, as to lay wagers,
No. 90. VOL. IV.

that the young King of France will be dispatched, before a certain time, to make room for his Uncle. But, if the report, which is current at present, proves true, that the young King is fallen ill of the Small-pox, it is very possible, that Providence may confound his vast projects, which, among other things, tend to set up the Court of Hanover to serve France, in our stead, as a balance against the power of the Emperor: And it was with this view, that France already offered, last spring, to consent to guaranty to the Hanoverians the possession of the Duchy of Bremen. If the Emperor considers well the time, at which France takes these steps, and England is so forward to answer them, he will find, that his last advantage over the Turks has begot a jealousy in those two Powers, and has made them bethink themselves in good time of securing one another mutually, against his power. I know not with what design it is done; but the Ministry at present give out, that the peace of the North is actually in agitation, and that it will be concluded to the satisfaction of the King of Sweden. My friends would persuade me, that this is done, in order to quiet a little the minds of those, whose eyes my paper [Remarks of an English Merchant, &c.] has opened. Be that as it will, I can assure your Excellency, that never any paper met with a more general approbation; and, if I might venture to give my opinion, I should think it would not be improper to cause it to be printed in French, in Dutch, and even in English, at the Hague.
Your Excellency may be assured, that if these Gentlemen here make any answer to it, I shall be ready to baffle them intirely, and that there is nothing in the world I should so much wish for.

Whether they do this, or not, I intend to have several pieces ready against the meeting of the Parliament,

1716-17. The letters being read in both Houses, raised the utmost indignation in all the Well-affected to the Government, and addresses were presented, full of the most lively expressions of loyalty and zeal, and of resentment against the proceedings of the late Ministry. The Lords, in their addresses, said, 'We are sensible, that the gross defects and pernicious consequences of the late treaty of Utrecht could not have been remedied, but by your Majesty's unwearied application for the good of your subjects, and by that just regard, which is paid by foreign Potentates to your known wisdom and integrity. It is with unspeakable satisfaction, that we see your Majesty's endeavours successful in such Conventions, as have already given new life to our trade and credit;

ment, and to publish them by a little at a time, the impatience of the people here not suffering them to read long deductions: And if I had wherewithal to defray the expence, I would cause some of them to be printed immediately, and the papers to be conveyed into such places, that it should not be in the power of this Court to hinder the impression. The intimations, which have been made me, terminate in bringing in the Pretender; but as I cannot enter upon that affair, without an express order from the King, my Master, I have avoided coming to particulars.

Ten thousand men, transported hither from Sweden, would do the business; and I believe, we shall not be at a loss for money.

I send you inclosed, the translation of the paper, which has been published here.

Baron Gortz, in his answer, dated at the Hague, October 2^d, 1716, is of opinion, 'That hitherto, they need not be much disturbed about the treaty between France and Great-Britain; and adds, 'That the Count's printed piece deserves the approbation it meets with: That he has sent it to the King, and will take care to get translations of it into other languages printed. He desires to know the expence of printing the other pieces of the Count's comping: Cautions him, not to make any mention, in his letters to the King, nor to his correspondents in Sweden, of what has been insinuated to him about the Pretender: But that in the mean time, he will run no risque, in acquainting him with all the particulars on that head; and that, above all, it will be necessary to make him clearly understand, how ten thousand men might do the business; that is to say, what scheme has been contrived, and what motive they propose to offer, to induce the King of Sweden to enter into this affair.'

Count Gyllenburg, in his answer, dated at London, October 4th, 1716, tells Baron Gortz, 'I say nothing to the Alliance lately made by France. Last spring, France offered the Hanoverians their guaranty of the possession of Bremen, and I doubt not, but they have now done it. How do we know, but this may produce good dispositions at Vienna towards us? It was in jest only, that Count Palka told M. Petum, that his Master would enter into that Alliance.

I am very glad, that my pamphlet meets with your Excellency's approbation. I assure you, that to print the pieces, that will be necessary, will cost me, at least, sixty pounds. Printers must be bribed to it, for they run great risques, in printing any thing, that displeases the Government: But I will keep an exact account of every penny.

I would begin with our treaty, and make short remarks upon it*. Afterwards, I will print extradits from the Custom-House, to shew the little necessity there is of the trade to Petersburg and Riga, especially this year. Then I will come to the Hanover declaration of war, and will examine it, if it be necessary. After that, I will proceed to every one of our enemies, and I doubt not, but to undeceive the Nation.'

For this letter Count Gyllenburg subjoins this remarkable postscript:

'Your Excellency will have seen, by my last to M. de Mullart, what I have written upon the subject in question. You will be pleased to send, or keep back, that letter, just as you shall judge convenient. However, I beg you would be pleased to inform me which you do.

There is no medium; either Bremen, or the Hanoverians, must be sacrificed. The latter is not so difficult, considering the general discontent. Ten thousand men would be sufficient. The malecontents require but a body of regular troops, to which they may join themselves. That body, being transported in the month of March, when the easterly winds reign, and when it will not in the least be dreamt on, will cause a general revolt. We must also have arms for between fifteen and twenty thousand men, and as many accoutrements as can be got; for as to horses, we shall have them here. Your Excellency may easily judge of what advantage this will be to the King; and, in my poor opinion, we have no other course to take, unless we are willing to give up every thing. My friends are not in town, but I shall speak with them some day the next week; and then your Excellency may expect their scheme: In the mean time, I should be of opinion, that, if the business could be done, without making use of a great many English, there would be the less risque run; for I do not know, whether I ought to touch upon what the King must have further, for, although they will endeavour to do every thing, that I ask; yet, as it must be by a contribution raised among a great many, it may happen, that there may be a false brother. Our men once landed, I answer for the rest. In the mean time, I beg you would remember what I had the honour to write to you, last summer, concerning one N———. No body knows the sea and the coasts, better than he, and he is a brave and honest man. In short, it will be a glorious enterprize, which will put an end to all our misfortunes, by ruining those, that are the authors of them. As to what I have to say of the time, the sooner the better, after the trade to Gottenburg is ended, or before it begins.'

The next letter is from Count Gyllenburg, to his brother, Gustavus Gyllenburg, Secretary to Baron de Gortz, dated at London, October 5th, 1716; in which the postscript to Baron Gortz, is only material, which is as follows:

'I have since spoken with two of the principals, who have assured me, that there shall be sixty thousand pounds, sterling, ready, as soon as I shall shew them a line from the King, which assurances under his own hand, that he will assist them. As for the scheme, I shall have it within a few days. One of them, who is the chief promoter of this affair, assured me, that we had nothing to apprehend from the Regent on this occasion.'

By a letter dated at the Hague, November 3^d, 1716. M. Gustavus Gyllenburg acquaints his brother, the Count, that he has given Baron Gortz his letter of the 2^d of October, to read, as well as the note therein inclosed; to which he made him the following answer: 'It is my repeated advice to forbear speaking any thing at all of money; but to hear people only, so as to learn clearly what they are able and disposed to do, and to acquaint me with it, without opening your self to them.'

The next letter is from Count Gyllenburg to Baron Gortz, dated at London, November 4th, 1716, as follows: 'In answer to what your Excellency has done me the honour to write to me in the postscript to your letter of the 15th past, I grant there would be no harm in hearing the insinuations of this Court, if they were made not only without my promising to make report of them to his Majesty, but also my giving them hopes of his Majesty's being resolved to be reconciled to the Hanoverians, and to sacrifice Bremen to them for some equivalent on the part of the Czar. But as, without that, they will make no overtures, for fear we should make use of them to increase still more the distrust which is between the Northern Allies, and so make an advantage of them; it is not in my power to get any

* This was done and sold privately.

1716-17. credit; and particularly in the treaty lately concluded with France and the States-General. As your Majesty has, by this treaty, recovered to us, in so great a measure, those advantages, which might have been expected from a glorious and successful War, and were given up by a treacherous and dishonourable peace; we beg leave to congratulate your Majesty upon an Alliance, which opens to us so fair a prospect of 1716-17. an undisturbed Succession, an equal Balance of Power, and a flourishing Commerce.

We return your Majesty our most humble thanks, for your Majesty's most gracious condescension, in having laid before your Parliament the discoveries concerning the intended Invasion; and cannot but regard, with the utmost horror and any thing particular out of them; nor am I able to say of what service to us their assistance against the Czar would be; but if I were to guess by their discourse, who have been talking with me about it, as from themselves, though I easily perceived it was by order of the Ministers, I should believe, that if the Preliminary concerning Bremen was settled, the English Ministers would be very well pleased to retrieve the little step they have made, by talking loudly of the defensive treaty between us, and by persuading the Nation to give us the succours therein stipulated either in money or ships. I should fancy also, that we might come to an agreement in relation to what they ought to help us to take from the Czar, by way of reprisal for our losses in Germany. On the other hand, and if we do not submit to them, your Excellency may be advised, that, as well to justify their past actions, as to force us to a compliance, they will prevail upon the mercenary Parliament which they have at present, to take vigorous resolutions, and even to declare war against us. This is what we must expect. The English Ministers do not mince the matter; and they have already made it appear, that they will stick at nothing. They are all furious persons. Sunderland, who is, in a manner, at the head of affairs, and who has got all the interest he has with the King of England, by having consented to what has been done against us (being besides our enemy) is at present at London, to take his instructions from the Germans, and your Excellency may depend upon it, he will execute them with all the boldness [effronterie] imaginable. Your Excellency will therefore find, we ought to make use of this opportunity to enter into measures against people, who certainly will not do things by halves. We must either ruin them, or be undone ourselves, that is, if it be in their power to bring it to pass.

Postscript. My friends are now in town. An express, which came to them yesterday from the Pretender, will put them in a better condition for forming a plan. To-day they are going about it. There are only five or six of the most considerable persons consulted. They would know, in case we agree, whether the money must be paid here or elsewhere, or if it must be sent over to Sweden. They have also asked me, if we had any occasion for Sea-Officers, for then they could furnish us with good ones.

In another letter at London, November 13, 1716, Count Gyllenburg made good his promise to Baron Gortz, about giving him his sentiments about the business contained in the Baron's last postscript. "The sum thereof," says the Count, is what I have already hinted, that we must determine some way or other, and that very speedily. We have not in my humble opinion, any time to lose in consultations. If we do not take advantage of their present animosity, it will cool; for the Court, that is to say, the Prince's party, does all that is possible to gain them. With the most considerable, it would perhaps be necessary to go on roundly. They run the hazard of their lives and fortunes in declaring themselves, so that they will not speak but upon good security. And as to the people of the second rank, besides that it would perhaps be dangerous so much as to hearken to their proposals, these proposals of theirs are of so little consequence, and so confused, that we should not be able from them to form any idea of the affair. I should likewise be of opinion, that, till I receive fresh orders from your Excellency, the safest way will be to avoid all conversations of that kind."

The next letter is from M. Gustavus Gyllenburg to the Count his Brother, dated at the Hague, November 17, 1716, the substance of which is as follows: "On Tuesday last arrived here a letter from Baron Sparre, importing, That he had hopes of succeeding in his solicitation to have M. Lench sent to the King. In his letter was inclosed one from the Duke of Ormond to Baron Gortz, in which the Duke says, that the King his Master had ordered him to let him [Gortz] know, that he expects shortly a supply of money; that he will then remit sixty thousand pounds sterling to his Swedish Majesty, leaving the disposal of it to him; and that he begs him to look upon this as an earnest of his good will to him. The bearer of this letter added, that the remittances might be made either to —, or to —. M. Sparre has since told the said Baron in confidence, of the men of war which we have bought in France, which will be ready and delivered. And that we are soliciting the Court of France to send a person to the Czar, to make advantage of the pacific disposition he is now in. But as this solicitation meets with many obstacles, and that besides France does not appear ever forward to do any thing for us, unless it be in concert with England, M. Sparre takes notice, that my Lord Mar has a Cousin-German, named Briskine, with the Czar, who is Physician and Privy-Counsellor to that Prince; which Favourite has wrote Letters to my Lord Mar, giving a very particular account of the Czar, viz. that the Czar will not attempt any thing more against the King of Sweden; that he has fallen out with his Allies; that he can never be friends with King George; that he hates him mortally; that he is sensible of the just cause of the Pretender; that he wishes for nothing more than a conjuncture, in which he may be able to restore him to his Dominions; that the Czar, having the advantage wholly on his side, cannot make the first step; but, if the King would make the least advance, there would be very soon an accommodation between them. The Pretender has sent to desire Baron Sparre to procure him leave to retire to Stockholm. M. Sparre has returned answer, that, as this would be the same thing as declaring war by found of trumpet, it would absolutely spoil the business in hand."

In this letter Mr. Gustavus Gyllenburg inclosed the copy of another letter from Baron Gortz to Baron Sparre, dated November 12, 1716, as follows: "I still look upon the sending M. Lench as very uncertain, because I am persuaded, that France will not take any step, that may give the least suspicion, or by which they may disgust England, before they have finished the treaty of Alliance, that is now depending. Yet methinks they might venture to intimate to the Court of England, that they have a mind to send a person to the King, to sound his Majesty's intentions more thoroughly touching a reconciliation, and in order to qualify themselves the better to do good offices."

As to the affair of England, and the Duke of Ormond's letter to me, of which you have sent me a copy, I cannot forbear telling you frankly, Sir, that, if my scheme upon it be not approved and complied with, I cannot enter at all into that affair. It is upon the foundation of my scheme, that I have actually opened the matter to the King; and it would be directly to spoil all to make me depart from it. Any reasonable man will easily comprehend the impossibility, in this case, of settling a treaty in form. Doubtless it would be running too great a hazard on both sides, to depend upon its being kept secret. The best way is, to prepare on each side the materials necessary for the work before 1716-17. and indignation, the malice and ingratitude of those, who have encouraged such an attempt against their King and Country.

We are fit to find that your Majesty's lenity has been ineffectual towards reclaiming a faction, who have rendered themselves so obnoxious to your justice.

When this address was reported to the House, a debate arose on account of the Lord Coningsby's 1716-17. urging it very earnestly, that the peace of Utrecht was treacherous and dishonourable. The Bishop of London asserted the contrary, and said, 'He himself drew up the instruments of that treaty, and, in his opinion, it was as good a peace, as had been concluded for these forty years past.' Lord Coningsby replied, 'He did not intend any before us. When all is ready for execution, it will then be time enough to make treaties, if it be judged requisite.

I do not know even, whether it would be right to do what is desired under the name of lending assistance; and I am very much inclined to think, that it would be better to avow openly our own interest, and the concern we have for maintaining the English liberties.

Your friends must place so much confidence in us, as to furnish us with what we want to put ourselves into a condition of becoming useful to them. The sum required is not exorbitant: Three hundred thousand crowns may satisfy us at present, for we want nothing but to augment our naval force at Gottenburg.

I do not see what hazards your friends can run in this; I will give them sufficient security; and, from the humour all the world knows the King to be of, they may very safely conclude, that, if his Majesty should not be able to satisfy this loan by a real assistance, he would do all he possibly could to reimburse our friends, the rather, because his Majesty would not have it known, that he had touched any money for such a purpose as this is lent.

These Gentlemen might, however, the more to engage the King's affection, give their offer the turn expressed in my scheme; though, for my part, I will not accept it, on any conditions, that may distinguish it from a common loan. But all depends upon their determining speedily, and beginning forthwith, by furnishing the three hundred thousand crowns for the men of war, without which they must not flatter themselves, that any thing can be done. I am upon the scent of getting a fourth hundred thousand even in England.

France cannot reproach us with this agreement, while no treaty or convention can be produced to prove it. What I said above, of the cautious behaviour of the Court of France towards England, is no doubt applicable likewise to the negotiating of an accommodation with the Czar. It is probable, the Court of France would not proceed in a Negotiation of that kind, but by concert with England; and you will grant me, that this would not by any means suit our interest. This reflection leads me into an opinion, that the canal of France is not at present the most commodious for us. It may suffice therefore to have offered to make use of that canal without pressing the matter further. Nor can M. Lenb be the manager of this Negotiation. For going to, and coming from Sweden at the season of the year we are now in, requires time; and if we come to any agreement with the Czar, we ought to conclude it within three months at the very farthest. The canal of my Lord Mar seems to me to be alike inconvenient and impracticable, because of the length of time which that circulation of correspondence would unavoidably take up. Yet I cannot but think, that, by the canal of the favourite Physician, the good dispositions of the Czar might be improved, if they are indeed such as have been represented. If the Czar comes hither, and one can get a private conversation with the Favourite, we might certainly carry things on far, supposing, as I said, that what the Favourite has written be well-founded. In the mean while I am contriving some other way.

If we fix upon a project, that is in any tolerable degree promising, I shall not be withheld by the difficulty and hardships of the voyage from being the bearer of it.

If in the mean time your friends would enter into my scheme, I should be the more sure of bringing the King to a thorough good liking of their business. But I will not venture to convey any thing of this to his Majesty, otherwise than by word of mouth. It is satisfaction enough to me to know originally, that I am in no danger of giving offence to Sweden by the part I take upon me to act in this affair. The fancy of the Pretender's retiring to Stockholm surprises me: It would be blazing abroad our secret intelligence by found of trumpet.

On the 13th of November, 1716, Baron Gortz wrote from the Hague the following letter to Count Gyllenborg: 'I told you in my letter of Friday, that I deferred answering yours of the 13th, which I am now going to do. You say, Sir, that, as to the affair you are pressed about, it would be necessary to go roundly to work with the principals. I am intirely of the same opinion. The business then is to speak plainly. I believe, Sir, it will be thought a sufficient proof of our frankness to declare, as you may do, that that nothing is more natural, nor more sweet, than to revenge an affront one has received; but that, in point of prudence, it ought to be maturely considered, whether the passion of revenge can produce the desired effect. If your people do but make the least reflection upon th's rule, they will undoubtedly perceive, that it is entirely their business to make the success of the enterprize, which they desire, appear probable to us. After that it will be likewise proper, that they should help us in settling the necessary points, that is, that they should assist us with money. As I run no risque with you, Sir, I make no scruple of telling you in confidence, that the business in hand has for some time been part of my correspondence with Ambassador Sparrre.

The principal Members of the present Court of Avignon, offer on part of their Master 60,000 l. sterling to engage the King's affection. I remonstrated thereupon, that the delicacy of the conjuncture ought to caution us against closing too hastily with this offer; but that I proposed to treat upon the foot of a common loan; and that in that case, being furnished with the King's full power to negotiate money for his Majesty's service, I might accept it, giving them assurances on the King's part, for repayment, that if at the same time they would communicate to me a plan of the principal affair, I would not fail to send it to the King; and that, in case his Majesty should be unwilling to enter into the design in question, he would at least pique himself upon taking care, that the sum, which I should have borrowed in his name, should be punctually discharged; so that the lenders would run no risque of their money, but that, on the contrary, they would have put it out to a good advantage, and that, in short, the offer being made upon the foot before-mentioned, without stipulating any other conditions than being reimbursed, the King might be more effectually wrought upon by that mark of their good will, than by directly soliciting the favours they desire. I added to all these intimations, that, in case the King relished the project of a Revolution to be brought about in England, it might perhaps do better to give this enterprize the turn of its being intended to revenge the unworthy proceedings of the Kings of England, and to maintain the English liberties.

You have herewith, Sir, the copy of a pecuniary contract, which I have just now settled with some private persons in this Country. You will find by it, that there is a considerable advantage to be made, which it was necessary to allow to strangers, since no body 1716-17. any personal reflection on any person; but the venerable Prelate who spoke last, might remember, that about two years ago, when the Ministers who made the late peace were impeached, his Lordship declared, he was kept in the dark, and scarce knew any thing of what was doing at Utrecht.

The Commons, in their address, observed,

1716-17. ' That they could not, but with the highest resentment and indignation, look upon the obstinate and inveterate rancour of those, who were again endeavouring to imbroil their native Country in blood and confusion: And that it was astonishing to find, that any, who called themselves Protestants, could be so inflexible and restless in their endeavours to impose upon us a Popish body in Sweden had courage enough for it. If your people had a mind to engage in it abstractedly from the grand affair, I would admit them forthwith as far as the sum of three hundred thousand crowns. The King's printed patent, whereof you have herewith a copy, sufficiently secures every individual person from all frauds with regard to the State's bonds, upon which the money is advanced.

But they must determine speedily, or lay aside all hopes, as I have just now observed to Ambassador Sparre in a postscript, which I communicate to you.

If the thing be taken upon the foot beforementioned, it may go on; but otherwise nothing can be done. In a word, we must have money, and, after that, we must know what they are in a condition to do in England, and what part they expect the King should take, to put this design into motion, and to support it.

In answer to Baron Gortz, Count Gyllenborg wrote to him the following very remarkable letter, dated at London, Decemb. 4, 1716: ' As soon as I had received your Excellency's letter of the 23d past, I went to one of the Principals at his own house, with whom I have had a long and intimate friendship. I shewed him your Excellency's letter, which I enforced the best I could. Whereupon he asked me, Whether I had spoke of it to any one of his party? And, I telling him I had not, he desired me, for the love of God, not to do it. We were made to believe from Avignon, said he, that all went on currently; That Baron Gortz had accepted our offer, and had given positive assurances, on the part of the King of Sweden, of his assistance. We have been pressed on the affair of the money, and to form a scheme; and we have actually applied ourselves to both the one and the other. In the midst of all this, here are three posts arrived from Avignon, and no farther signs are shewn of so much haste. This change has very much perplexed us, we not knowing to what to impute it, unless to the Prince's indisposition. But all is now become clear. They were too sure of their point at Avignon; they reckoned immediately on the assistance of the King of Sweden; and now they are afraid, on one hand, of damping our courage, by owning frankly, that they had deceived themselves; and, on the other, they dare not, upon an uncertainty, engage to supply them with money, being sensible, it is the last we shall give them, if we should find it employed to any other purpose than we designed; and without direct assurances first given of our having the success we need. You see, therefore, continued he, of what consequence it is, if you wish us well, that you do not make known, to any person, what I see our Court of Avignon conceals with so much care. If you act otherwise, you will destroy the credit of the Chevalier de St. George here, which perhaps will be of necessary use to you, and you will make his adherents your implacable enemies; for, if their design fail, they will be regardless, whether Sweden perishes or not; and yet you know, that it is they, who have hitherto defended your cause, as well in the Country, as in the Parliament of England, and who have obliged your enemies to act with more caution and reserve than they would otherwise have done. You will still have occasion for their assistance in the next Session of the Parliament of England, which your enemies are preparing to incense terribly against you, as well by pamphlets, which are already actually in the press, as by petitions of the Merchants, who have lost their ships, and who now meet twice a week to consult. Now, said he, to return to Baron Gortz's letter, give me leave to tell you freely, that, if the question was explicitly and simply, Whether we should assist the King of Sweden, and we consented, it might then be worth while to ask, What security we required, and what gain we insisted on? But that is not the case at present, nor ever will be. For I must own to you ingenuously, that there are very few amongst us, who have any concern for the interests of foreign Princes, any longer than while they affect our own, and that even very palpably: Manus nostræ oculata sunt; credunt quod vident: Our eyes are in our hands; what they see we believe. So that for you to flatter yourselves, that, out of respect or friendship, we should part with our money to any whatsoever, would be to know nothing of us. You can never alter our minds on that article; so you must just take us as we are. As for gain, can we hope for greater in any Country, than what we have at home, without risking our money? Do not we make 7 or 8 per cent. by the public funds; and this upon the securities of the Parliament of England, and are paid punctually every quarter? That, this question being utterly unreasonable, it is necessary to form another, and let that be, Whether we are willing, by a pecuniary subsidy, to merit the assistance of the King of Sweden? To that I answer roundly, Let us but be assured on the part of his Majesty, upon whose bare promise we will rely, more than on all the securities and engagements of others: I say, let us only be assured, that by our money we shall merit his help, and actually have it. After this, let us but know what you would have us to do, and we will make such efforts, that his Majesty shall not repent of giving his Royal word to assist us. But, Sir, added he, What must we think, when, after a Negotiation of three months or more, we are yet in uncertainty upon what ought to be the chief spring of all our undertakings, and are to merit by our money, not the help we ask, but barely an answer whether we shall obtain it or not? How can we run into expence, expose our friends, and, in short, endanger our fortunes and lives, when perhaps his Majesty's refusal may stop us short; subject, among other things, to the fear of being betrayed by those, who, seeing the ill success of our projects, and that there is nothing to be hoped for more on our side, may endeavour to make their fortune, by striking in with our enemies, and sacrificing us?

Let us examine all this, and you yourself will acknowledge, we should hazard too much in following those, who leave us in such uncertainty. But, on the other hand, what does the King of Sweden risque? Is not our Government his enemies in every respect; and will it not assist them more this ensuing year? What can be said against him, if, after the example of Scipio, he carries the war into their Country, who have been desirous, and are still so to carry it into his? This diversion will be so much the greater, as it will be unexpected; and there is the more reason to hope for success, because the whole Country is disaffected. It is also probable, that half the army will be disbanded by the Parliament of England; and it is certain great part of that army will desert on the approach of a sufficient body of troops.

But, suppose this enterprize should not succeed, would this Government be more bent upon the intire ruin of the King of Sweden than it was before? And, when King George's desire to have the Country of Bremen is satisfied, will our Government be less solicitous by what means to prevent the Czar's aggrandizing himself? Let me beg you, said he, to represent all this to Baron Gortz; and I am sure he will change his opinion; and that he will not let slip, by chaffering, an opportunity

16-17. of these men, who, nevertheless, call themselves by the name of Protestants, what we must look for, should a Popish Prince ever sit upon the Throne of these Kingdoms. Whilst they allow us no better a character than that of Schismatics and Heretics, of men cut off from the Communion of Christ's Church, and all the hopes of 1716-17. salvation. What can be expected from professed Papists, who account no better of them (however they may flatter themselves) than they do of us; but that both they and we shall be utterly destroyed by them?"

But

The naval armament at Gottenburg cannot be useful to us, unless, for the design, which they propose to us, and the money we ask will not be sufficient even for that armament.

As to the rest, however just and solid I allow your friend's reasoning in other matters, yet I cannot reconcile the opinion, which your friend seems to have of the good faith of the King, and his interest, with the fear which is nevertheless shewn, that we have no other end than to procure for ourselves the restitution of the Duchy of Bremen.

Pray, Sir, which way can the King of Sweden better secure to himself the recovery and possession of his said Duchy, than by reducing King George to be nothing more than an Elector of the Empire? By which means the King of Sweden will make himself be courted by the House of Linenburg, as in former times. Can good faith and a man's word be put in the scale against so solid and so evident a reason, after we have experienced how little account ought to be made of a security founded in words or in treaties? To be short, Sir, the question is with us, an affair already decided; nothing remains but to consider the means.

As I understand the matter, those, that shall furnish the money, will be in no danger; they may give it under the name of Dutch Merchants, and under pretext of the great gain, that is to be made in dealing with me. The better to colour the thing, they may even give commission to some English Merchants, to make an agreement with me upon the foot of the contract, which I have had the honour to communicate to you. After this there would remain no other risk than that of losing the money, in case the design should not be executed; but, if they had the least confidence in the word of the King, this scruple would vanish immediately. His Majesty piques himself too much upon performing his engagements, to leave any room to mistrust him. We have fresh proofs of this; notwithstanding the vast expence, that we are obliged to bear, his Majesty would have the pretensions of Mr. Cook, and the other Merchants in France, touching the money advanced to him in Turkey, satisfied, and I have actually paid those creditors.

To conclude, I must tell you again, Sir, that they must come to a resolution speedily, or think no more of the affair for all the next year.

It would also be necessary, that those, who mean us well, should labour to get half the troops that are now on foot in England, broken, and to hinder any naval armament till the month of May.

It concerns us also to know, for our direction, what number of regular troops will remain, after they shall have got one half of them disbanded. I reckon, that we might employ from ten to twelve thousand Swedes in this expedition; amongst whom there should be four thousand horse.

When things shall be put upon the foot above-mentioned, I intend to go into Sweden myself, to push on the execution; for I do not like to rely on the care of others in such a particular. I had also rather concert this affair directly, and with you, than by the other way, which I think too long.

My Lord's relation hath indeed sent word, that the Czar has some dispositions to peace, which we will not fail to make advantage of, that we may be in a condition the better to push on the affair in question. The Czar is to be here very speedily. If it could be ordered, that the said relation of my Lord Mar should speak to me, I should quickly perceive what might be done there. You will easily judge, Sir, that an agreement with the Czar would give great weight to the other affair.

In answer to this letter, Count Gyllenburg, on the 18th of December, N. S. 1716, wrote the following to Baron Gortz: 'I received, two days ago, the letter your Excellency did me the favour to write me of the 11th, and I have not deferred the execution of your orders one moment. I hope to be able to give you an account of them by the next mail. In the mean time I shall have the honour to answer to your Excellency's postscript, that I shall not fail to govern myself as you there direct. If I have hitherto done otherwise, it has been, that I might not be accused of not representing matters as they were on one side and the other, leaving it afterwards to our Ministers to make choice of that, which they thought most proper. Your Excellency, according to your wonted goodness, will forgive me, however, for saying, that, in my opinion, whatsoever resolution we take, it would, notwithstanding, be well to keep the people here in good humour; that is, that we should seem not intirely to reject their proposals, for otherwise they will be prying into the motives, which render us so intractable, and will perhaps discover the true one, in which case they will cause it to miscarry. Besides, a little hopes would make them put off longer the pushing the affair in Parliament; and I think that is what your Excellency seems to desire. Methinks, to this end, it would be necessary, that your Excellency should write Petrum an answer, who complains of having received none to his letters, to shew your acknowledgement of the pains he has taken, and to desire him to go on, in order to keep the Ministers in the same good way, till your Excellency has received an answer to the account which you have given his Majesty of the whole affair; and then we may act with more vigour. As Petrum generally shews all his letters to Townshend and Bothmar, I fancy they will thereby be easily persuaded to believe what they wish. If this letter comes before the arrival of King George, it will perhaps prevent the impression, which the Germans and Sunderland will be apt to make with their usual violence at their first coming over.'

The two next letters relate principally to bills of exchange, shipping, corn, salt, &c. for Sweden; but in one from Count Gyllenburg to Baron Gortz, dated at London, Decemb. 29, 1716, he writes as follows:

'I am once more obliged to defer the departure of my express till Friday, one of the principal of our friends being not yet returned to London; but he will be here to-morrow. I have the letters ready for the Physician, but dare not venture them by the post. While I am waiting for the principal of my friends, I shall dispatch to-morrow a Gentleman to the Czar, to endeavour to possess him with pacific thoughts. I have given him letters for my brother, that he may introduce him to your Excellency, who will give him such instructions, as you shall judge necessary. He is a Muscovite by birth, and having been a long time known to my friend, and perhaps even employed on the like messages, he assures me, that we may put intire confidence in him. I have intimated to him, that he may alledge, for the pretext of his voyage, his natural inclination to serve the Czar, by which he was induced to discover to him, that King George is making all the offers imaginable to acquire Bremen of the King of Sweden, at the expence of the Czar, who is to be the sacrifice of that acquisition. Your Excellency will add what other hints you judge convenient. I should think, however, it might be proper, that this man should be kept ignorant of the canal of the Physician. I have another letter for him, which may introduce my brother to his acquaintance; and then he may convey messages between your Excellency and the Physician, till your Excellency shall think fit to have an interview

Oxford
about an address.

But the University of Oxford did not shew themselves so loyal; for, at a meeting of the Vice-Chancellor, and other Heads of the University, Dr. Dunster, Warden of Wadham-College, having made a motion for an address to the King, and being supported by Dr. Wympe,

Bishop of St. Asaph, and by the Warden of Merton College; Dr. Smalridge Bishop of Bristol, desired to know the subject of the address. Bishop Wympe readily answered, That they might address upon these three heads: 1. The suppression of the late unnatural Rebellion: 2. The King view with him. We are assured here, that King George will have none with the Czar; and they seem to be very little satisfied with that Prince.

Your Excellency will have the goodness to remember what I had the honour to write to you in my last, about my Lord Sunderland. I have learnt since, that that Lord does all he can to make those of his party fond of King George's project to open a port at Harburg; asserting, that England will gain more by it, than even by its West-India trade. One sees very well whether all this tends. I am working against it. A Member of Parliament has desired me to inform him of the situation and nature of that port.

On the 1st of January, Count Gyllenburg writes thus to Baron Goriz, after a long account of private business, hiring of ships, &c. 'Since writing what goes before, my friend has been with me, and has told me, that the money, as far as twenty thousand pounds, was ready, if I would but give my acquittance, that I had received it for the use of the King my Master; and this only, that he might have something to shew to those, who made this collection, supposing, that hereafter they should ask for it. I answered him, That I could not give any such acquittance, without your Excellency's order, which I would write for this post. He told me likewise, that they had already, by order of the Court of Augsburg, remitted eight thousand pounds to Baron Sparre.'

Since writing these lines, the Dutch mail of the 25th is just come in, by which my brother advises me, that your Excellency was setting out upon your journey. It will therefore be unnecessary to send the express, especially since the two letters intended are now become useless. I will, however, send a duplicate of this next Monday by the French post, together with the pieces abovementioned.

Your Excellency will receive, this day, the copy of a letter, which M. Petkun writ yesterday to Baron Sparre, the contents of which confirm the ill intentions of those warm men, into whose hands the management of affairs is going to be put: particularly if it be true, as Mr. Petkun has assured me, that my Lord Townshend to whom he read the said letter, owned, that what he had writ, in relation to our affairs, was true. All that we have to flatter ourselves with, is, that the misunderstandings, which there is among these Gentlemen, may perhaps be of service to us. Thus much, at least, is certain, that, if we set ourselves in earnest about the great work, the success cannot possibly fail.

The next is a letter from Count Gyllenburg to Baron Goriz then at Paris, dated at London, January 7, 1716-17, as follows: 'Yesterday I received the letter which your Excellency did me the favour to write me of the 29th past. That concerning the conduct of this Court came very seasonably. I gave it to read to one of the principal Whigs with whom I have found means of contracting a friendship. As I am to dine with him to-morrow, I shall know what effect it has had. He is already in a good way, and I question not but may be carried yet further by such just reasoning.'

M. Petkun is charmed with your Excellency's letter to him. He exclaims publicly against the Hans for the gross falsehood they have told of him. I believe him innocent as to this fact. He has told me, he will write himself to your Excellency by this post. Mr. Walpole's reply is remarkable. My friend, who is one of the Champions of the Whigs, has told me the same thing. If it be not the effect of the present discontent, and the Court does not find expedients to regain those people, I do not know whether the Court will ever be able to bring that matter upon the stage; but I shall not be satisfied with that.

I am trying to get it brought into Parliament my own way. My friend is labouring that point with me, and, to that end, is endeavouring to inform himself thoroughly of the whole. It was for him, that I demanded the other day of your Excellency the particulars of Harburg; and it is likewise upon his request, that I beg your Excellency will send me, as soon as may be, all that you shall be able to pick up in relation to the treaty concluded between Hannover and our enemies; particularly, if you can procure the agreement, by which the assistance of an English force is stipulated to them. Your Excellency sees hereby what I am now doing on one side and the other; that is to say, with regard to our friends. I can do nothing before I have received your Excellency's orders upon my last.

The following letter from Baron Goriz, to Count Gyllenburg, is dated from Paris, January 8, 1717.

I could not acquit you before this day, that I am now authorized to enter into the affair, which you know of; and that I am allowed the liberty to do in it whatever I shall think convenient. You will be able to judge of this yourself by the inclosed copy of the full power, that has been sent to me. Which way soever I turn this affair, I do not see, that we can engage in it upon any other foot than that which I proposed to you at first. As interest is the most certain security of treaties, and what we are solicited to undertake is of so great importance to us, and the most expeditious means to re-establish our affairs, that can be devised; no man can doubt, that we shall apply ourselves to it heartily and earnestly; and that we could wish for nothing better, than to do it without the concurrent assistance of others, if the juncture of time would suffer us to dispense with that assistance.

The only thing I see wanting for our purpose are men of war and transports. Of the first I can have two in Holland, and six in France, all rigged and armed; and those, who have the disposal of them, oblige themselves to deliver them in that condition at Gottenburg in the month of March. The last we shall not want, but we must immediately put our hands to the work, which requires money. Mr. Sparre had assured me, that I should find an hundred thousand crowns ready here; but I learnt at my arrival, that our friends, far from doing what they had promised, are now grown cool; so that I thought best, Sir, to desire you to press your friends to a speedy resolution, whether on the foot proposed they will forthwith supply us with money, which we must have to purchase those men of war, or not. In case they will, it is necessary they should order it to be paid to me here as soon as possible, that I may put those, who are to furnish me with the ships, upon getting them ready. If they will not, this business ought to be broken off intirely, without thinking any further of it.

To lose four weeks more would be losing all, for this year at least; and afterwards the circumstances of affairs will so change, that there can be no thinking of it any longer.

For the rest, our intention was to transport twelve thousand men; eight thousand of them infantry, and four thousand cavalry, of which five hundred mounted. We were to carry with us a sufficient train of artillery, arms for ten or twelve thousand men more, with requisite stores of ammunition. We were to land at the places, whither we should be directed; so that we should have carried with us all that is necessary excepting horses, which we expected to find in the Country; and all might have been executed without the least umbrage being taken; provided, that on the other side the secret was kept. Mr. Sparre tells me, that the reason of the coolness of these Gentlemen in this Country is the treaty between this Court and England, and 1716-17. Safe return: 3. The favour shewn by the Court to the University, in granting their late request, that the Officers of Sierne's regiment, quartered at Oxford, should not burn publicly, on the day of his Majesty's arrival, the effigies of the Devil, Pope, Pretender, Ormond, Mar, and others.

The Bishop, Smalridge, replied, 'The Rebellion had been suppressed long before; a thanksgiving had already been observed for it, and therefore he thought it now too late to address upon that subject.' As to the second, 'There would be no end of addresses, if they made one upon such and the ensuing departure of the Pretender out of this Country. For my part, I take this reason to be a very weak one; for as this treaty, and the departure of the Pretender out of this Country, must make the Court of England think themselves in perfect safety, and deprive them of the pretext of keeping up their troops, our enterprize is become more easy, and more sure. And to imagine that this Court, at the bottom of their heart, would not be better pleased to have the Pretender on the Throne of England than the Elector of Hanover, especially if the first continued to carry himself well towards this Court, is to have a wrong notion of its interest, and of the private sentiments of the Duke Regent.

Mr. Sparre tells me further, that our friends here think we should not have occasion for any more men of war than those eight, which we have at Gottenburg; but they are to know that those ships are but of forty guns each; so that it would be hazarding too much, and exposing a body of chosen troops (for such we should take on this expedition) for three or four large ships would be sufficient to give them chase, and to take them all. But, when we shall have the eight ships, which carry from sixty to seventy guns, nothing less than a squadron could oppose them, and, before they could be fitted out, the blow would be struck.

To conclude, Sir, I wait here for a speedy yea or no; and I continue to advise you not to send any account of this matter to the Court; for our Ministers themselves are ignorant of it, and know not for what intent they have been obliged to give the turn they have to the full power, which they dispatched. Aut nunc aut nunquam, Nunc or never, as well for our friends as our enemies.

When you have fixed this affair, at least for what relates to the men of war here, I am very desirous you should come over to meet me in Holland, under pretext of being ordered thither; and that you should put the Court in hopes of returning with some acceptable offer, to the end we might concert together all that remains for our enterprize; after which I would set out myself for Sweden, to order every thing for making sure of the execution. I communicate to you the subjoined copy of the full power, which his Majesty has been graciously pleased to give me:

We Charles, by the Grace of God, King of Sweden, Goths and Vandals, Great Prince of Finland, Duke of Schonen, Estenia, Livonia, Carelia, Bremen, Verden, Steina, Pomerania, Cassubia, and Vandalia, Prince of Rügen, Lord of Ingria and Wismar, Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria, Juliers, Cleves, and Bergues, &c. do hereby make known, and attest, that whereas we have committed to the fidelity and dexterity of the most illustrious and noble, our intirely-beloved Baron Gortz, Privy-Counsellor of the most serene Duke of Holstein, and Chief-Marshal of his Court, various affairs for our service, to be transacted in those places where he shall reside: And whereas the present circumstances of the times and affairs do not easily permit, that we should be able to furnish him with particular credential letters (commonly called a full power) for every several transaction: To prevent therefore all delay, which might thence arise, we have judged it necessary to constitute by these presents him, the said Baron Gortz, our Minister Plenipotentiary, and to grant him full power, as by virtue of these presents we do grant him full power, to treat and conclude, in our name, with all and singular persons of what condition soever, all matters, which may relate to our service, and be for our interest; promising on our Royal word, that we will approve and ratify, and put intirely in execution, whatever the said Baron Gortz shall so transact and conclude. In full testimony whereof we have caused our seal to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with our own hand.

Given at Lund in Schonen, the 23d day of October, 1716.

(L. S.)
H. G. de Mullern.

On the 13th of January, N. S. 1717, Baron Gortz wrote from Paris the following letter to Count Gyllenburg:

'I am to acquaint you, that our friends here are charmed with my scheme. They have caused one hundred thousand livres to be paid me down, and have promised to get the rest paid to me in Holland, to the sum of one million of guilders. I will go therefore, and give orders for working with all dispatch possible on the men of war, and for providing and bringing together all necessaries. I shall also go back with all expedition to Holland; whence you will have further advice from me. I shall wait there with impatience the coming of your express, and of the person, who is to speak to the Physician.'

At the same time Mr. Gustavus Gyllenburg wrote to the Count his brother, the following note:

'After the Baron had signed his letter to you, he ordered me to tell you in his name, that it is absolutely necessary our friends should determine speedily, and cause the money to be remitted, and paid to us, without any delay; for otherwise we cannot have the men of war from this Country time enough.'

Upon the receipt of Baron Gortz's letter of the 8th of January, with the King of Sweden's full power, Count Gyllenburg wrote an answer to the Baron at Paris, dated at London, January 15, 1717, wherein he begs leave to know: 'Whether his Excellency would have him, for the future, add the title of Plenipotentiary to the direction of his letters. As to our affair, continues he, I went immediately to the house of one of the principal of my friends, and, without taking notice of any coldness of the Gentlemen in France, I told him, in order to engage him to speak, that I had just received your Excellency's orders to give such an acquaintance, as had been demanded of me. He seemed very well pleased, and told me in answer, that he, who had the direction of the whole affair, being gone again into the Country, and being not to return before Saturday next, nothing could be done till Monday; but that then he questioned not but I should be satisfied. We shall see what that Gentleman will say at his return; and unless the Gentlemen in France have made my friends here alter their opinions (which I do not yet find they have) I hope all would go as we would have it; and, in case that should not happen so, I am very much of your Excellency's opinion, that we should leave all those Gentlemen to their ill destiny, and go another way to work.

My Whig friend was charmed with your Excellency's letter, which he read over and over. Many others of the same party begin to change their language in our favour. I lend my brother a little piece, which is just published at my charge, and writ in a pretty moderate stile. There is something in it of my own. What is said in the postscript, in praise of the Prince, is in order to gain the Prince's party, which is already well inclined towards us.

If your Excellency thinks it proper to order me to Holland, I should be of opinion, that you should send the like orders to Monsieur Perkum, on pretence, that you would receive information from us both together, concerning the posture of affairs here with regard to our common interests. That would not give any umbrage

1716-17. such an occasion.' And as for the third, 'The late favour they had received, was overbalanced by having a whole regiment quartered upon them.' Dr. Charlett, the Master of University-College, urged, 'That there was no precedent for addressing a King, who returned from his

German Territories.' Dr. Gardiner was against 1716-17, addressing, to save charges, on pretence, that they were out of cash. Dr. Cobb and others made other objections, and so the motion for addressing dropped. But the University of Cambridge did not follow their example, but presented a loyal brage, and we might easily find out ways of amusing M. Petkum.'

Before this letter reached Baron Gortz, he writ another to Count Gyllenburg, dated at Paris, January 16, 1717, N. S. as follows:

'I have just now received here your letters of the 1st, 2d, 4th, and 7th. You may depend upon it, Sir, and assure your friends, that the expedition to England does at present take up all our thoughts and attention. It will depend but upon two things; one is, the procuring four or five ships of war; and the other is money. I know where to get the former, but I can do nothing without the other. I cannot sign the contracts that are offered me. Your friends must take care to remove that obstacle, and to provide for the other squadron. There is not a moment to lose: The time is very short: Our friends on this side have assured me, that the money should be ready forthwith. By your letters I am to believe, there are 20,000 l. ready. I herewith send you the acquittance, which I have given here, that you may draw yours conformably to it, which you will exchange hereafter for mine, which I will send you, after you have let me know the names of the Creditors, and that you have received the money. We are here agreed upon the plan of our enterprise; and I am promised a man to be sent to Holland, who will bring me what farther informations may be wanting. You may likewise assure your friends, that our Prince will certainly be of the party; but I conjure you to give nothing in writing about this Negotiation, except what relates to the acquittances upon the foot abovementioned.

I do not expect to hear from you any more here, but in Holland; and, if your man should have been got thither in my absence, he would have found Stamcke fully instructed.

I herewith send you back the contracts signed according to your desire. The positive promise of letting them have iron puts me under some difficulty, because I had no thoughts of preparing for so great a quantity. As to your money, you may keep an account of what you shall receive, four thousand crowns. I have not yet proposed to the King that augmentation; but I am in hopes of obtaining it for you.

In mean time, employ all your skill, in order to give the Court all the trouble, that is possible, in the next Session, in relation to their conduct in the affairs of the North; and tell me from whence proceeds the good disposition wherein Walpole seems to be.'

The form of the acquittance mentioned and inclosed in this letter of Baron Gortz to Count Gyllenburg, is as follows: 'I, the underwritten Plenipotentiary of his Majesty the King of Sweden, acknowledge to have received of _____ for the service of his Swe- dish Majesty, the sum of _____ which the said _____ has found means of lending to his said Majesty, which sum of _____ I promise, on the part of his Majesty, in virtue of the full power, which I have from his said Majesty, and which I have produced in due form, to cause to be repaid to the said _____ or his order, in the space of two years, to commence from the date of this acquittance; so that every four months there shall be paid a sixth part of the principal, together with interest at the rate of one half per cent. by the month, and so on, to the full payment of the total sum. In virtue and token whereof, I have signed these presents, the eleventh of January, 1717.

The Baron de Gortz.

'My friend, that directs the whole affair, came back from the Country last Saturday night, as I had the honour to acquaint your Excellency, that he would in my last. He hath this day let me know, that upon a letter which he received from my Lord Mar, to remit forthwith 20,000 l. into France, to the Queen Dowager of England, who was to pay it to us, he had actually remitted that money, which he hoped was already paid to your Excellency. He asked my pardon for not having communicated this to me sooner, having been obliged to go into the Country, the moment the affairs was dispatched. He added, that he had desired further orders from my Lord Mar, with respect to the place, where the rest of the money should be paid. I doubt not but that Baron Sparre has already had advice of all this, and that he has acquainted your Excellency with it; which, however, I beg you would forthwith let me know, that I may quiet the minds of my friends here, who imagine, that the said Baron doth not act in concert with your Excellency in an affair, wherein the least misunderstanding might do a great deal of mischief. I have told them, that your Excellency designed that I should come to you in Holland, to concert every thing with you; with which they were very well satisfied. But I have told them, that I will not go thither with empty hands, and that they ought at least to get 10,000 l. ready for me to carry with me. I have also desired them to get me a letter from the brother of the Czar's Physician, which might serve to introduce me to him, if your Excellency think fit to employ me to speak to him. I cannot express to your Excellency my concern, that the affair above-mentioned should have taken a turn, which I did not expect; and which, for aught I know, may not be pleasing to your Excellency. Even my friends are dissatisfied at it, every thing being done unknown to them. But, as they are obliged to have great regard for the director of the affair, who is a person of very great consequence, they must seem to be satisfied. If your Excellency, after this, thinks it necessary for me to come to Holland, I beg your orders therein, as soon as possible, that I may take my measures.

After I had written these lines, I received the favour of your Excellency's of the 13th, from whence I perceive, with a great deal of pleasure, that our affair is begun. I read it to one of my friends, who told me, that that was the sum, of which he had spoken to me some days ago, and which I mentioned in one of my former; that he then believed it to be 8,000 l. but that it was but 6,500 l. which exactly answers that, which has been paid to your Excellency, and which makes part of the 20,000 l. that has been remitted. He has promised me to hasten the rest, but I should think, that it would be necessary that our friends in France, from whom they expect the orders, should pray them to dispatch it with all haste. He has given me hopes, that I shall have a good sum with me, when I go to Holland.'

The next letter is of Count Gyllenburg to Baron Gortz, dated at London, January 23, 1717, in which he writes thus:

The day before yesterday I received the favour of your Excellency's of the 16th. The inclosed triplicate of that which I had the honour to write to your Excellency by the last post, will shew you the train that our affairs is in. In the mean time, I have told our friends, that your Excellency thought my voyage to Holland absolutely necessary, in order to concert with me the necessary measures for the enterprise; but, that your Excellency would by no means have me stir from hence, without carrying with me what money should be necessary. That it therefore lay upon them

1716-17. loyal address, wherein they owned the King to be their only rightful and lawful Sovereign (1).

A bill to prohibit Commerce with Sweden.

Three or four days after their address, the Commons passed a bill for prohibiting all commerce with Sweden, as long as the King should think it necessary for the safety and peace of the Nation. The bill was approved by the Lords, and received the Royal assent. The trade with Sweden was of great moment to the Merchants, but the indignation was so general in both Houses, that the bill met with little opposition. Before the Supplies were settled, the Commons voted ten thousand seamen for the year 1717. Then they took into consideration the estimates of the land-forces. In the debate, the Tories alledged, that, the late Rebellion being suppressed, and the Swedish Conspiracy seasonably discovered, there was reason to hope, the Counties would be soon eased of the grievous burden of quartering soldiers; but, if it appeared that the King of Sweden persisted in his design to invade Great-Britain, they would all readily give their votes for keeping the present forces on foot. The contrary party urged the necessity of taking speedy and vigorous resolutions in relation to the army. At length it was resolved, without dividing, that the sum of 959,943 l. should be granted, for maintaining the guards, garrisons, and land-forces for the ensuing year. Not long after, they passed the mutiny and desertion bill, by which the soldiers were exempted from arrests for debts. When this bill was before the Lords, the licentiousness of the army, and the disorders committed by the soldiery, particularly at Oxford, were complained of, and 1716-17.

a motion was made, that, before they passed a bill in their favour, they should inquire into the riot, which happened in that City on the Prince of Wales's birth-day. The Court insisted on the necessity of passing the bill without delay; but readily consented, that the Oxford riot should be inquired into. Some Lords of the other side, who were apprehensive that the University would get no credit by such an examination, endeavoured to wave it, by proposing a general inquiry into the conduct of the army. This was opposed by the Court Lords, who observed, that they ought not to arraign a considerable body of men, against whom there was no legal complaint; and that such a proceeding could not but be disagreeable, and even injurious to the King, who, by his prerogative, has the command of the army; and, if any abuses and disorders are committed by the soldiers, the complaints ought first to be laid before him: But, since it had been moved to inquire into the Oxford riots, which had indeed made a great noise, and been examined in Council, they ought to address his Majesty, that he would be pleased to cause all the papers, relating to that affair, to be laid before the House. The address was resolved and presented, and the papers being laid before the Lords, there arose a great debate. The Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of Rockester and Chesler, endeavour'd to justify the University, alledging, among other things, 'That for forty years past they had not paid any regard to the birth-day of any Prince of Wales, or even of the Prince now to make the best use of the time, which was so precious to us, and to put me in a condition of going with the first opportunity.

They promised me to do their best, that my voyage might not be deferred longer than the end of the next week. In case I can by that means bring them to hasten their disbursement, it will afterwards depend upon your Excellency's pleasure, whether I shall go to pay my respects to you or not.

Your Excellency may be assured, that I do all in my power to traverse the ill designs of our enemies. The printed piece inclosed, wherein I have spoken entirely as an Englishman, is a small specimen of what is to follow. I do not know whether Mr. Walpole's expressions were the effect of his first rage, on account of his brother-in-law my Lord Townshend's being removed, or whether they came from his heart. We shall be better able to judge of those Gentlemen after the King's arrival, when it shall appear, if they have reason to be fatished; for it is from thence, that they will form their scheme of politics.

It is strongly reported here, that your Excellency has made a declaration, that the King, having waved all preliminary demands, has accepted the Emperor's mediation, and agreed to send his Plenipotentiaries to Brunswick. I most humbly beg your Excellency will let me know what truth there is in it.

The next letter is from Baron Gortz to Count Gyllemburgh, dated at Paris, January 27, 1717, N. S. wherein he says: Yours of the 18th, with the duplicate, is come safe to my Hands. Your friends are in the wrong, to imagine that Mr. Sparre and I do not act in concert in this affair.

He has communicated every thing to me with the greatest exactness, and not being authorized himself to enter upon this affair, nor to receive the money, he left all to my disposal. I have even put into his hands acquittances, where the sum is left in blanks, that he may make use of them in my absence, as soon as the money is come. The friends which are in France shall be writ to, to press those in England to furnish, as soon as possible, the million of Dutch guilders, which we have agreed on; and I must needs tell you, that I cannot take the least step in relation to the ships, which are absolutely necessary to us for carrying on this enterprize, before I am in possession of that whole sum; for, if I should begin, and the money afterwards not come in, the sum employed upon this occasion would be lost; not to speak of the disgrace it would be for me, to have entered upon an affair, without being able to go through with it.

As for your voyage into Holland, that likewise depends on the payment of this money. When you have secured that point, you will do me a pleasure in coming over to me, furnished with all the informations tending to the execution of our design, which may still be wanting. I will write next post to Petrum to come along with you.

(1) These addresses were followed by a long one from the Dissenting Ministers, in which they said:

'We think it the particular honour of the Protestant Dissenters, that their strict adherence to the interest of your Illustrious Family, before your Majesty's Accession, and their loyalty to it since, have drawn upon them so much of the fury of their fellow-subjects; we are not conscious what else could render us obnoxious to them: Our principles being as we hope the most friendly to mankind, and amounting to no more than those of a general Toleration to all peaceable subjects, universal love and charity for all Christians, and to act always in matters of Religion, as God shall give us light into his Will about them.

We do not so much as expect or desire any thing that ought to give any one the least disturbance; we only wish, that under your Majesty, as the common father of all your loyal people, those of our persuasion might not want capacity, as we hope your Majesty will find they never want an inclination to promote the true interest of the Protestant Religion, and of their Country.'

1716-17. Prince sitting on the Throne, by making public rejoicings: That the University had a method of expressing their loyalty more consistent with the dignity of their founders, and the characters of their persons, than illuminations, bonfires, and firing of guns: That, as for the Mayor and Magistrates of the City of Oxford, they had this to plead for their excuse, that they were ignorant it was the Prince's birth-day: That, the several affidavits and informations, upon which the Mayor and Magistrates grounded their complaints, having been sent up to Court, copies of the same were returned to the Officers of the regiment quartered at Oxford, in order to give them an opportunity to justify their proceedings; which produced another set of affidavits and depositions in behalf of the Officers: That the Magistrates had no opportunity to make any replication in their own defence; and therefore it was moved, that the House would come to no resolution, upon the foot of the two sets of affidavits; but that they would adjourn the further proceedings, and appoint a day, when they would hear the persons concerned in these informations. They insisted upon this method, because nothing could set this matter in a truer light, than the cross-examining and confronting the evidences on each side; urging, that this method, their Lordships very well knew, was the constant practice of the Courts below, and even of all the hearings at the bar of their Lordships House; and that their Lordships had never yet refused to admit of a replication: That as to the disrespect to the Prince Regent, charged upon the University, for their neglect of ringing the bells on his Royal Highness's birth-day, of the sixteen Colleges in the University, only three had any bells to ring: And that it appeared plainly by the affidavits taken before the Mayor and Magistrates, that the riotous proceedings were occasioned by the insolence and rude behaviour of the soldiers, encouraged by several Members of the University, calling themselves the Constitution Club; and by the neglect of the commanding Officers of the regiment, in not issuing proper orders to suppress the disturbance.' The Duke of Bucks, the Earl of Abington, the Lords Harcourt, Trevor, Norib and Grey, and some others, spoke also in favour of the University and Magistrates of Oxford.

The Lord Coningsby, who spoke first on the other side, said, 'That he knew the usage of the University to have been otherwise than had been represented; and gave a short account of their behaviour in the Reigns of King Charles II. and James II.; and distinguished between their past and present loyalty.' He owned, 'That, in these two Reigns, they had expressed their loyalty in a most extraordinary manner, and had made such great advances to countenance an unlimited power in the Prince, that, if Providence had not miraculously interposed, they had, as far as in them lay, destroyed the liberties of their Country, which would have involved the University in certain ruin.' The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Kingston, the Earl of Sunderland, the Lord Parker, the Lord Townshend, the Lord Cadogan, and some other Peers who spoke on the same side, observed in general, 'That the disrespect to the Prince Regent, charged upon the University and City of Oxford, was manifest, because the Major of the regiment did, about ten of the clock in the morning go to the Mayor, and complained, that he had shewed no regard to the Prince's birth-day, by ringing the bells; to which the Mayor returned a shutting answer, pretending he did not know it to be the Prince Regent's birth-day. That upon this the Major told him, He would draw out the regiment to celebrate the day, with proper rejoicings, which he did accordingly; but that the Mayor, instead of joining in the rejoicings, with a vast mob after him, filled up the public streets; and some of his attendants insulted the soldiers on their march, and gave them opprobrious language, crying out, Down with the Roundheads. That they proceeded so far in their insults, as to throw dirt and stones at the soldiers, and even attempted to disarm some of them. That the House, wherein the Officers of the regiment, and some of the Collegians met to celebrate the festival, was in an insolent manner assaulted, and the windows broke by stones thrown from the opposite house of one Hurst, an Ironmonger, upon which the soldiers, to revenge the affront, began likewise to break windows, of which the Mayor was no sooner informed, but he immediately went out and bid them desist. That it was indeed affirmed in some of the affidavits produced in behalf of the University and Magistrates, that a certain Collegian went round the bonfire, and encouraged the soldiers to break the windows of Hurst, and all that were not illuminated; but, that the same was contradicted by no less than five or six persons, who upon oath declared, that the Collegian was from seven till ten that evening in their company, and had not stirred from the house all that time. That, upon the Mayor's applying to the Major of the regiment, the latter gave immediate orders for patrols to go through the City, and send home to their quarters all the soldiers they should find in the streets. And that, the patrols being insulted by some of the Mayor's attendants, two or three of the soldiers fired, but with powder only, pursuant to the orders given them.' During this debate, the Earl of Abington offered a petition from the Vice-Chancellor, and the Mayor, and Magistrates of Oxford, praying to be heard; and insisted, that it should be received and read: But it was urged on the other side, that, the house being in a Grand Committee, the receiving any petitions was irregular. Then it was moved, that the Chairman should leave the chair; which being carried in the negative, the debate was resumed, and about six o'clock in the evening the two following resolutions were agreed to by a majority of sixty-five against thirty-three.

I. Resolved, 'That the Heads of the University, and Mayor of the City, neglected to make any public rejoicings on the Prince's birth-day; but some of the Collegians, with the Officers, being met to celebrate the day, the house where they were was assaulted, and the windows were broken by the rabble; which was the beginning and occasion of the riots that ensued, as well from the Soldiers as the Scholars and Townsmen; and that the conduct of the Major seemed well justified by the affidavits produced on his part.

II. Resolved, That the printing and publishing the depositions, upon which the complaints relating to the riots at Oxford were founded, while that matter was under the examination of

the

1717. the Lords of the Committee of Council, and before they had time to come to any resolution touching the same, was irregular, disrespectful to his Royal Highness, and tending to sedition.

Debates about the Supplies.

The Commons, proceeding upon the Supplies, among other things granted 24,000*l.* for the payment of four battalions of Munster, and two of Saxe-Gotba, which the King had taken into his service, to supply the place of such as during the Rebellion should be drawn from the garrisons of the States-General to the assistance of England. This occasioned a great debate. It was said, as these troops did not serve, they ought not to be paid. It was replied, by the treaties it was agreed that they should be paid whether they served or not, and the circumstances of the times made such an agreement necessary. It was moved, and the question put for an address to the King, that the instructions given to those who transacted the treaties for the six battalions, might be laid before the House, but it passed in the negative by a majority of one hundred and sixty-five against thirty-eight. It was believed these treaties were called for, and the address moved by some Gentlemen, with a design to bring a censure on the German Ministers. About 5,500*l.* was also granted to make good the damages and losses sustained by the tumultuous and rebellious proceedings in several Counties, particularly the demolishing the Meeting-Houses. The money voted for the army, navy, and other particulars, amounted to above two millions and a half.

A message from the King for an extraordinary Supply.

To raise these Supplies, the Commons granted a land-tax of three shillings in the pound, and the malt-tax. While these things were transacting, Mr. Secretary Stanbope delivered to the House the following message from the King:

‘His Majesty being desirous, above all things, not only to secure his Kingdoms against the present danger with which they are threatened from Sweden, but likewise to prevent, as far as possible, the like apprehensions for the future, thinks it necessary that such measures should be early concerted, as may conduce most effectually to this end.

And, as this may require some expence, his Majesty hopes that his Commons will, by their assistance at this juncture, enable him to make good such engagements, as may ease his people of all future charge and apprehensions upon this account.’

The consideration of this unexpected message was deferred till the next day, when Mr. Secretary Stanbope made a motion, ‘That a Supply be granted to enable his Majesty to concert such measures with foreign Princes and States, as may prevent any charge or apprehensions from the designs of Sweden for the future.’ He urged the advantage and security that would arise to the Nation, by enabling his Majesty to reduce the King of Sweden; and what confidence they ought to repose in the King’s honour, wisdom, and oeconomy, in the management of what money should be thought necessary for that service. Mr. Shippen replied,

‘That it was a great misfortune, that so wise and excellent a Prince as his Majesty was as little acquainted with the usage and forms of Parliamentary proceedings, as with the language of our Country. That, if he knew either, he would not have sent such a message, which, he was sure, was unparliamentary and unprecedented; and therefore it was his opinion, that the same was penned by some foreign Minister, and then translated into English. That, since the King’s Accession to the Throne, there had been many reflections cast in that House upon the last Ministry, as if they had betrayed the interest of their Country. That, on the contrary, they had often been told, that his Majesty had retrieved the honour and reputation of the Nation, the effects of which had already appeared in the flourishing condition of trade. That, after all this, he could not but be very much surprized, to find a motion made for a Supply of money to enable his Majesty to enter into new measures, to secure his Kingdoms against any future apprehensions from the Swedes. That the necessity that was urged for this, seemed to be inconsistent with the account of those glorious advantages, which his Majesty had obtained for us. And he could not help being of the opinion, that if the new Alliances and Measures to be concerted were such, as were to be obtained purely by the force of our money, that ever the happiness or the security of the Nation could be the Consequence of such Counsels; for, whenever foreigners come to taste the sweetness of English money, we might depend upon it, that their adherence to our interest would last no longer than we continued to supply their necessities.’ Mr. Hungerford, who seconded Mr. Shippen, said, among other particulars, ‘That, for his part, he could not understand what occasion there was for new alliances; much less, that they should be purchased with money. That it must needs be very surprizing to the whole world, that a Nation, not long ago the terror of France and Spain, should now seem to fear so inconsiderable an enemy as the King of Sweden; especially when we had so good a fleet at sea, and so great an army on land.’ Some other speeches were made on the same side, which gave Mr. Stanbope occasion to say, ‘That he was sorry to find Gentlemen grow so warm upon a subject of this nature: That the King was a Prince of that Integrity and Honour, and had already given such convincing proofs of his tender care for the true interest of the Nation, that they might entirely depend upon his wisdom in this matter: And therefore he was of opinion, that none would refuse compliance with this message, but such as either were not the King’s friends, or who distrusted the honesty of his Ministers.’ This gave offence to several Members; and Mr. Lawson, one of the Knights of the Shire for Cumberland, replied, ‘That he was very much surprized to find such unguarded expressions fall from that worthy and honourable Gentleman, for whom, he was sure, the whole House had a very great regard. But, since he had thought fit to speak so openly, he hoped he might well be justified in saying, that if every Member of this House, that used freedom of speech on any subject of debate, must be accounted an enemy to the King, when he happens not to fall in with his Ministers; he knew no service they were capable of doing for their Country in that House; and therefore it was his opinion, that they had nothing else to do but to retire to their Country-seats, and leave the King and his Ministers to take what they pleased.’ Mr. Boscawen, Comptroller of the Household, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Mr. Horace

1717. Walpole, and some other Gentlemen, backed Mr. Stanhope's motion; but Mr. Grimstone, Member for St. Alban's, and some other Whig Members, spoke against it, on the other side; and what was still more observable, was the silence of Mr. Walpole, first Commissioner of the Treasury. However, it was moved and resolved, that the House would in a Committee consider on the 8th of April of Mr. Stanhope's motion for a Supply. Mean time the King was addressed for a copy of the treaty made by King William, with the King of Sweden, in 1700, which was read and examined. With the treaty there was printed, and delivered to the Members, an account of the damages sustained by the British subjects in ships and lading confiscated in Sweden, amounting to above 69,000*l.* and of the losses sustained by the Muscovite Company, amounting to above 45,000*l.*

Division
Whigs.

It was now obvious, that there was a misunderstanding among the King's Ministers, and that the Whigs were divided. This more plainly appeared, in the course of the debate about Mr. Stanhope's motion for a Supply against Sweden. For, when it came to be resumed on the day appointed, it was urged by those who opposed it, 'That it was unparliamentary to grant a Supply, before the occasion was known, and an estimate of the expence was laid before the House. That the King's message about this matter was so unprecedented, that his Ministers seemed to be divided about it; and that it was a great misfortune such divisions should happen among the Ministry; for then a Parliament cannot have a true information of things. That they could not easily apprehend, what occasion there was to make new alliances, since we had a standing army in Great Britain, and a considerable fleet at sea, which sufficiently secured his Majesty's Kingdoms against any dangers from Sweden. That if we designed to make an offensive war against that Crown, Why did we not send part of our forces on board our fleet; especially, since we were now secure at home, both by the suppression of the late Rebellion, and by the conclusion of the triple Alliance, which the Regent of France had begun faithfully to perform, by causing the Pretender to pass the Alps? However, if the Court insisted on the necessity of entering into new engagements against Sweden, they thought it proper to address his Majesty, to acquaint the House with the nature of those engagements, and the sum that was requisite to make them good.' To this it was answered by Mr. Stanhope, and some others, 'That the discovery of the late Conspiracy, carried on by the Swedish Ministers, in conjunction with the discontented party at home, sufficiently evinced the necessity of a standing army in Great Britain. That the treaty of triple Alliance seemed indeed to secure us against any danger on the part of France; but it was to be observed, that treaty had met with so great opposition at the French Court, that, had not the Regent stickled strenuously for it, the same would have infallibly miscarried: And, though hitherto we had all the reason imaginable to commend the honesty and candour of that Prince, yet in good policy we ought not to depend on that treaty any longer, than it shall be the interest of France to observe it.' And, as for the address, 'the same would be injurious to the King's prerogative of entering into such 1717. Alliances, as his Majesty thinks necessary for the security of his Dominions, without communicating the same to his Parliament: Which prerogative was grounded on very good reasons; for, if the Crown was obliged to impart the secret of affairs to so great a number of persons, the most important Negotiations might thereby miscarry.' Sir Gilbert Heathcote, who spoke on the same side, mentioned the great losses and damages, which the British subjects had sustained by their ships being made prize, and confiscated in Sweden; and, besides those contained in the printed account, which was that day delivered to the Members, produced a list of other losses; concluding, 'That, the King of Sweden, having several times refused to make satisfaction for the same, and, on the contrary, his Ministers having endeavoured to raise a new Rebellion in his Majesty's Dominions, there was a ground to declare war against him.' To this Mr. Gould replied, 'That, the Dutch having sustained as great losses by the Swedes, they had an equal concern with Great-Britain to declare war against them; and therefore it would be proper, before we proceeded further, to engage Holland, in the first place, to prohibit all commerce with Sweden, as we had done.' Mr. Stanhope said, 'He made no doubt, but the States would readily come into any measures, that should appear necessary for the good of both Nations in general, and to obtain satisfaction for the late depredations of the Swedes in particular: That they had lately given signal instances of their firm adherence to the Crown of Great-Britain, in causing the Swedish Ministers to be seized in their Dominions upon his Majesty's desire: But that the form and constitution of their Government, and the good of their Subjects, who most subsist by trade, did not permit them to take such vigorous and speedy resolutions, as could be wished; and therefore it would not be fair to exact the same from them.' Mr. Craggs pressed the necessity of making new Alliances against Sweden, from the late doubtful conduct of a Northern Potentate (meaning the Czar of Muscovy) who, by his inactivity against Sweden, and the posts some of his troops had taken, gave great umbrage to the Empire.' On the other hand, to the great surprize of the generality of the Assembly, the Speaker and Mr. Smith, one of the Tellers of the Exchequer, declared, That, though they were not against the Supply, they were against demanding and granting it in such an unparliamentary manner: And the Speaker proposed, That part of the army should be disbanded, and the money thereby saved applied towards the making good such new engagements, as were thought necessary to be entered into. But General Mordaunt, and some others, shewed how unsafe and impolitic it would be, at this juncture, to disband any of those troops. Mr. Caswell closed the debate with observing, 'That he had rather pay others for fighting than fight himself: That he thought it more advantageous for Great-Britain to carry the war abroad, and enjoy peace at home, in order to improve our trade, and reduce our public debts: And, as the employing Foreigners against Sweden would be a far less expence than national troops, he therefore was for complying with his Majesty's message.' At last the question was put, and it was carried for a Supply, by a majority of fifteen voices only; or c

The next day, this resolution being reported to the House, a short debate arose. The asking and granting supplies without an estimate of the expence was insisted on again as unparliamentary, and it was proposed, either to present an address to the King to assure him, that the House would effectually make good all the engagements he should think proper to enter into; or that the King be desired to disband part of the army, and apply the savings towards the new Alliances. Both these expedients were rejected by the Speakers on the other side, and Mr. Hampden, in particular, said, 'He remembered, that, about ten or eleven years before, a great man in that House made a motion for allowing and providing for about nine hundred thousand pounds, which the Government had expended, without laying any estimate before the Commons.' To this the Speaker, who was the person meant, said, he wondered that Gentleman would bring in as a precedent a business, that was transacted so many years ago, and which was not parallel to the present case. Mr. Hampden replied, 'He did not mean to reflect upon Mr. Speaker, since he had the honour to vote with him upon that occasion.' After some other speeches, the resolution for granting a Supply was agreed to, though by a majority only of four votes, one hundred and fifty-three against one hundred and forty-nine.

Changes in the Ministry.

The carrying of this vote, by so small a majority, could not but give the King some uneasiness; and it being evident, that the great opposition which the Court found on this occasion in the House of Commons, chiefly proceeded from a party of which the Lord Townshend was said to be the head; Mr. Stanhope wrote that very evening, by the King's command, a letter to acquaint him, that his Majesty returned him thanks for his past services, but had no farther occasion for him as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

The next morning Mr. Walpole waited upon the King to resign his places of first Commissioner of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer. The King shewed great regret to part with him, and with many kind expressions endeavoured to persuade him to keep his post; but though Mr. Walpole assured him, that he would never swerve from his duty to so good and gracious a Master: Yet at the same time he represented, how impossible it was for him to serve him in the present circumstances of affairs. Mr. Melbourn and Mr. Pulteney, Secretary at war, followed Mr. Walpole's example, and the same morning resigned their respective places.

On the 12th of April, the Commons, in a Committee of the whole House, considered of the Supply against Sweden; and, Mr. Stanhope having made a motion for granting to the King 250,000*l.* to enable him to concert measures against Sweden, there was for a minute or two a great silence in the House. Mr. Pulteney, who broke it first, expressed his surprize at it; and added, 'He had not yet said any thing to this matter, because he thought it inconsistent with decency to oppose a motion that came from the Court, while he had the honour to be his Majesty's immediate servant; but that, having re-sighed his place, that he might act with the freedom becoming an Englishman, he could not forbear declaring against the granting a Supply, in a manner altogether unparliamentary and unprecedented. That he could not persuade himself, that any Englishman advised his Majesty to send such a message; but he doubted not, the resolution of a British Parliament would make a German Ministry tremble.' The Lord Finch seconded Mr. Pulteney, and objected to some steps which had been taken in relation to the affairs of the North, alledging, 'That it appeared by the memorial presented by the Russian Minister, and by the answer which had been returned to the same; that such measures were pursued, as were likely to engage us in a quarrel with the Czar.' Mr. Stanhope, in a long speech, vindicated the King and his Ministers, in relation both to the Czar and the King of Sweden. With respect to the Czar, he observed, 'That hitherto he had been obliged to be silent; but he was now at liberty to set this matter in a clear light, and to acquaint the House, that the coldness which appeared of late between the King and the Czar, proceeded from his Majesty's refusing to become guarantee of his Czaristh Majesty's conquests; and from his soliciting the Czar to withdraw his troops from the Duchy of Mecklenburg. That, as to the first, his Majesty's conduct deserved the applause and thanks of a British Parliament, since it appeared, that his Majesty was tender not to engage the Nation in foreign quarrels. That this indeed had been his principal care since his happy Accession to the Throne; and he might assure them, that Great-Britain was entirely free from any engagements, and at liberty to follow such measures, as best suit with her interest. That as for the instances which his Majesty has caused to be made with the Czar, and the measures he may have concerted to get the Russian troops out of the Duchy of Mecklenburg, his Majesty has acted in all this as Elector and Prince of the Empire. That he was persuaded, all the Gentlemen there would agree with him, that the King's dignity, as King of Great-Britain, was never understood to tie up his hands with respect to his interests in Germany, and as Prince of the Empire: But, besides, he must desire Gentlemen to consider, that, long before his Majesty's Accession to the Crown, Great-Britain was in strict union with the Emperor and Empire; so that if, by virtue of ancient Alliances, the Emperor should require Great-Britain to use these instances with the Czar, which the King has made only as Elector of Hanover, Great-Britain could not avoid complying with his request. That, in relation to Sweden, the King's conduct was not only blameless and unspotted, but worthy of the highest commendations. That in the late Queen's time, Great-Britain interposed to procure a neutrality in the North, whereby the King of Sweden might have preserved his possessions in the Empire. That the Regency at Stockholm agreed to this overture; but that the King of Sweden rejected it with haughtiness, and the utmost scorn, declaring, he would use those as his enemies, who should pretend to impose such a neutrality upon him.

That, during the whole course of that Negotiation, the King, then Elector of Hanover, used all friendly offices in favour of Sweden. That the same having proved ineffectual, through the 1717. King of Sweden's obstinacy; and the King of Denmark having, by the fortune of war, reconquered the Duchies of Bremen and Verden, his Majesty, as Elector of Hanover, had purchased the same with his own money for a valuable consideration. That although it was never in his Majesty's thoughts to engage Great-Britain in a war to support that acquisition; yet, if Gentlemen would give themselves the trouble to cast their eyes upon the map, and see where Bremen and Verden lie, he hoped they would not be indifferent as to the possessor of those two Duchies, but would agree with him, that their being in the King's hands suits far better with the interest of Great Britain, than if they were in the hands either of the Czar, who gives already but too much jealousy in the Empire, or of the King of Sweden, who endeavoured to raise a new Rebellion in Great-Britain, and harbours our fugitive Rebels.

King

This speech made a great impression upon the majority. However, Mr. Smith thought fit to answer Mr. Stanhope, and said, 'He had already declared his reasons for opposing the granting this Supply in such an extraordinary manner; and some expressions that had escaped a Gentleman in the Ministry, instead of making him alter his opinion, rather confirmed him in it. That he did not pretend to be thoroughly acquainted with affairs abroad; but, having had the honour to sit so long in that House, where so great a variety of business, both foreign and domestic, had often been debated, he might presume to have some knowledge of them. That however he would not say any thing to what had been advanced by the honourable Member who spoke last; but if an estimate of the conduct of the Ministry in relation to affairs abroad was to be made by a comparison of their conduct at home, he was sure they would not appear altogether so faultless as they were represented. Was it not a mistake, added he, not to preserve the peace at home, after the King was come to the Throne with the universal applause and joyful acclamations of all his subjects? Was it not a mistake, upon the breaking out of the Rebellion, not to issue a Proclamation, to offer pardon to such as should return home peaceably, as had ever been practised before upon such occasions? Was it not a mistake, after the suppression of the Rebellion, and the trial and execution of the principal Authors of it, to keep up animosities, and drive people to despair, by not passing an Act of Indemnity and Grace, by keeping so many persons under hard and tedious confinement, and by granting pardons to some, without leaving them any means to subsist? Is it not a mistake not to trust to a vote of Parliament for making good such engagements as his Majesty shall think proper to enter into; and, instead of that, to insist on the granting of this Supply in such an extraordinary manner? Is it not a mistake to take this opportunity to create divisions, and render some of the King's best friends suspected and obnoxious? Is it not a mistake, in short, to form parties and cabals, in order to bring in a bill to repeal the act against occasional conformity?' To this speech Mr. Stanhope replied, 'That he had the honour to serve his Majesty since his happy Accession to the Throne, but, as there were other persons (some of them in, and others out of place) who had a greater share than himself in the administration of affairs, he left it to them to justify themselves. That, however, he would clear a principal point, by assuring the Assembly, that he had some time ago the King's orders to draw up an Act of Indemnity (1).

(1) Mr. Barrington Shute answered Mr. Smith more at large, and said, 'That the King was indeed come to the Throne with the joyful acclamations of most of his subjects; but that the dissension that appeared soon after, did not proceed from the ill conduct of his Ministers, but solely from the removal of some persons in great employments. That, nevertheless, in the changes that were then made, his Majesty had followed the rules of prudence, justice, and gratitude, since he advanced those, who in the worst of times had given undoubted proofs of their affection and attachment to his interest, in the room of those who had been preferred in the last Reign, as the fittest instruments to destroy the Protestant Succession, even before it took place, and who had since been in open Rebellion against his Majesty. That, as for the other mistakes charged upon the Administration, they might be reduced to these two, The not passing the act of Indemnity, and the design to repeal the Occasional Bill. That, as to the first, there were various opinions about it; and, considering the restless spirit of the discontented party, it was hard to determine, whether an Indemnity was a proper way to reduce them, since it was notorious, that the repeated instances of clemency, which his Majesty had given since his Accession, have been abused and despised. That, as to the repeal of the act against the Dissenters, nothing, in his opinion, was either more just or reasonable; and he could not but wonder, that a Gentleman, who had been turned out of his employment in the last Reign, and restored since the King's coming to the Crown, should account it a mistake, on the other hand, to make his Majesty's undoubted friends easy.' Mr. Smith, after an explanation demanded and given, about his being turned out of place and restored, replied to the last part of Mr. Shute's speech, 'That he ever was for allowing liberty of conscience to the Dissenters, and had even voted against the Occasional Bill; but that, the same being passed into a law, it was his opinion, that it could not be repealed without disquieting the whole Nation.' The design mentioned in these speeches, of repealing the Schism and Occasional Conformity acts, took its rise from hence: Mr. Hüllerden, Member for Bedfordshire, and Mr. Tuckfield, Member for Abington, happening to meet at a Tavern, and complaining to each other of the breach of Court promises, with regard to the Dissenters, came to a resolution each of them to invite three Members to meet the next night at the same place. When these met, they all entered into the same way of thinking; and, when they parted, every one agreed to invite their friends. In a little time, the number increased to above two hundred Members of the House of Commons, who, on the 26th of March, had a meeting at the Resol-Tavern near Temple-Bar, in order to consult together, 'Whether the bill for repealing the act against Occasional Conformity should be brought in?' The Lord Moleworth, Mr. Jessop, Sir Richard Steele, and some others, made speeches, to shew the reasonableness and justice of easing the Dissenters of those hardships, which had been put upon them in the last Reign, chiefly upon account of their zeal and affection for the Protestant Succession, and of putting them in a capacity to serve their King and Country; urging, that they had reason to believe, that such a bill would be very acceptable to the King. The majority of the Assembly inclined to this opinion: But Mr. Tysnel, who had consulted a person in a high post, and found, that the Court were apprehensive, such a bill would meet with strong opposition in the House of Peers, made a speech, wherein he said, 'That, as for his own part, he had already so often declared against the Occasional Act, that he hoped 1717. Mr. William Young, son of Sir Walter Young, said, 'That some days before he had been against the motion for granting a Supply upon the King's message, because he thought it unparliamentary; and it was then his opinion to address the King to enter into such engagements, as his Majesty should think proper; and that the Commons would make good the same. But that, since the majority of the House had determined to grant a Supply, they had brought themselves into this dilemma, either to grant what was asked as necessary for the service, or to tell the King, that service must remain unperformed, which they, in a manner, determined to be necessary, by granting a Supply. This speech was supported by Sir John Brownlow, and Mr. Gould, who owned, 'That we could not carry on our trade to the Baltic, without bringing the King of Sweden to reason; and therefore he was for granting this Supply.'

Mr. Walpole, who closed the debate, said, 'That, having already spoken for the Supply, he would not refuse the Court his vote; and, the sum being named, he was for granting it (1). Upon this most of the Tory Members, who were divided among themselves as to the sum, going out of the House; it was carried, 'That a sum not exceeding 250,000 l. be granted, to enable his Majesty to concert such measures with foreign Princes and States, as may prevent any charge or apprehensions from the designs of Sweden for the future.' Which resolution was afterwards passed in form.

By this time there was almost a total change in the Ministry. The Earl of Sunderland was appointed Secretary of State, as was also Mr. Joseph Aldison: Mr. Stanhope was made first Commissioner of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer; Lord Torrington, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Baillie of Jerviswood, and Mr. Micklethwaite were the other Commissioners of the Treasury; Sir William St. Quintin, Mr. Metbuen, and Mr. Edgeworth, being removed, Mr. Craggs was declared Secretary at war; Mr. Charles Stanhope, Coadjutor to Mr. Lowndes, Secretary to the Treasury; and Mr. Joseph Micklethwaite, Secretary to Mr. Stanhope, as Chancellor and under Treasurer of the Exchequer. The Earl of Orford resigned his place of first Commissioner of the Admiralty, which was given to the Earl of Berkeley. The rest of the Commissioners of the Admiralty were Mr. Aylmer, Sir George Byng, Mr. Cockburne, and Mr. Cbetwynd. The Duke of Bolton was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and his place of Lord Chamberlain of the Household was bestowed on the Duke of Newcastle. The Duke of Devonshire resigned his place of President of the Council.

The Commons, having been adjourned during these changes, met again the 6th of May. All the expedition possible had been used to fit out a fleet for the Baltic, consisting of twenty-one ships of the Line, besides frigates and fire-ships. This fleet, under the command of Sir George Byng, arrived at Copenhagen the 11th of April, in order to sail into the Baltic, to observe the motions of the Swedes. An express of his arrival in the Sound came just before the meeting of the Parliament. The King thought proper to acquaint the Parliament with the news, which, as it was unexpected, could not but agreeably surprize both Houses. To this end he came to the House of Lords, and delivered to the Chancellor the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"IT is with great satisfaction, that, after this short recess, I can acquaint you with the certain advice I have received, that my fleet is safely arrived in the Sound, which, by the blessing of Almighty God, will secure these Kingdoms against any immediate danger of an Invasion.

"I have, by this means, an opportunity, which is very acceptable to me, of making a considerable reduction in our land-forces, having established it as a rule with myself, to consult the ease of my people in every thing, so far as is consistent with their safety. And, for my own part, as I shall always place my greatness in the prosperity of my Subjects, so I shall always desire, that my power may be founded in their Affections.

"It is upon these considerations, that I have given orders for the immediate reduction of ten thousand Men.

"That nothing may be wanting in me to quiet the minds of all my Subjects, I have likewise given directions to prepare an Act of Grace; and, however it may be received by those, who are obstinately bent on the ruin of their Country, I promise myself, that it will raise a due sense of gratitude in all such, as have been artfully misled into treasonable practices against my Person and Government, and preserve them from standing in need of the like mercy for the future, when such instance of clemency may not be so expedient for the public welfare, as it would be agreeable to my own inclinations.

Gentlemen,

hoped nobody would suspect him of entertaining any doubt concerning its repeal. For, besides the reasonableness and justice of it, they ought, out of gratitude, to take off a mark of infamy, which the enemies of the Protestant Succession had put on them, who appeared most zealous for it. But that, in his opinion, the question now before them was not, whether the repeal of the act was reasonable and just, for he hoped, the whole Assembly were satisfied as to that; but whether the bringing of it in ought not to be put off till a more favourable opportunity? Several Members were of a contrary opinion; but, Mr. Stanhope having declared for it, the Assembly agreed to meet again about a week after, and debate on the affair. At the meeting, the Lord Melforth was chosen Chairman. Several speeches were made to shew the necessity as well as reasonableness and justice of bringing in the bill for a repeal at this juncture; and a Minister of State having sent an intimation, that most of the obstacles, that might have obstructed its passage, were removed, it was resolved to consider further of the affair. But though the debate was again resumed; and though it was reported, that six or seven Bishops, being made sensible of the hardships put on the Dissenters by these acts, had promised not to oppose the repeal, yet the matter took not effect at this time.

(1.) Mr. Walpole, upon bringing in a bill concerning the window-tax, just after the resigning his places, told the House, 'He now presented the bill as a Country Gentleman, but hoped it would not fare the worse for having two Fathers, and that his Successor would take care to bring it to perfection. Pr. H. C.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" I thank you for your readiness to support me in the present juncture of affairs, and for the Supplies, which you have given me; and do promise you, that they shall be employed for the uses, to which you designed them.

" I shall order such faithful accounts to be laid before you the next Session, as will make it appear, there was no other view in asking any particular Supply, than to prevent a much greater expence, which the Nation must have unavoidably incurred without it.

" I must recommend to you, as I did at the beginning of the Session, to take all proper methods for reducing the public debts, with a just regard to Parliamentary credit.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" The year being so far advanced, I hope you will go through the public business with all possible dispatch and unanimity; it being my intention to meet you early the next winter, that the sitting of Parliament may be brought into the more usual and convenient season."

Addresses of thanks from both Houses.

The Lords immediately voted an address of thanks, which they presented the next day. The like address being moved for in the House of Commons, and reported, Mr. Shippen proposed an amendment. Instead of, The reducing such a body of land-forces is the most acceptable pledge you could give your People of your tenderness for them, he proposed to say, That nothing could more endear his Majesty to all his subjects than the reducing the land-forces to the old establishment of guards and garrisons, such as his Majesty found it at his Accession to the Crown. To support this motion, he represented the danger of a standing army, urging, that in Cromwell's time a force, much less than what will remain in Great-Britain, had, after the intended reduction, overturned the Monarchy, abolished Episcopacy, put down the House of Peers, and drove the Commons from their seats. He was seconded by Mr. Bromley, and supported by Mr. Herne and General Roß; but they were answered by Mr. Stanhope, who said, " That the Member, who spoke first, could not pitch upon a proper juncture to move for the disbanding of the army, especially, if the news was true, that the Pretender designed to come incognito to Paris, to confer with a certain Prince;" meaning the Czar of Muscovy, who was now arrived at Paris. To this purpose it may be observed, that the very day before Iberville received advice from France, that the Pretender was arrived at Basil, in Switzerland, and had a few days after been seen at Old Brissack; upon notice whereof, the Regent of France had sent orders to all the Governors of the frontier towns, not to suffer him to enter the Kingdom of France: But it was soon after known, that the Pretender had not stirred from Italy. However, Mr. Stanhope, to the great surprize of the opposite side, was supported by Mr. Walpole, and also by Mr. Pulteney, who declared, " That, before the discovery of the late Swedish Conspiracy, while he had the honour to serve as Secretary at war, he had received such directions, as shewed his Majesty's intentions, at that time, to reduce still a greater number of forces than at present: And therefore he did not doubt but his Majesty would do it, as soon as the safety of his Kingdoms would admit of it." Adding, " That, in his opinion, the Nation had no reason to fear any thing from an army, who, for near thirty years past, had given signal proofs of their firm adherence to the Protestant interest, and of their zeal to maintain the liberties of their Country; and, if there was any danger at present, it was only from foreign Counsels." The question being put upon Mr. Shippen's amendment, it was rejected by a majority of one hundred and eighty-eight against eighty-three; and the Commons, with their Speaker, presented their address to the King.

In order to pass a censure on Lord Cadogan, Inquiry about the Dutch forces in Scotland. Mr. Pulteney acquainted the Commons, that he was apprehensive of some mismanagements and imbezlement of public monies in relation to the six thousand Dutch troops, and the service in Pr. H. C. North-Britain. Upon this it was resolved to address for an account of the money given for the pay and transportation of these forces, and of the distribution of the extraordinaries and contingencies for service performed in Scotland during the Rebellion. But, after all the inquiry into the affair by Mr. Pulteney, Mr. Walpole, and others, nothing material was found against the Lord Cadogan. In the last day's debate, Mr. Lechmere urged, " That the inquiry was altogether frivolous and groundless: That, as it was the result of party pique and malice, so it had no other view, than to blacken and asperse a person, whose greatest crime was, that he had real bright qualities, that eclipsed the tinsel merit of others: That this inquiry was of the same nature with those, that had formerly been set on foot against the Duke of Marlborough, the Lord Townshend, and an honourable Member of that House; and he hoped would have the same end: That it looked very strange, that the Persons, who now appeared the hottest in this inquiry, should have been silent about these pretended frauds, while they were in place. But that it was still more surprizing to hear them exclaim, with so much rancour and bitterness, against a noble Lord, of whom they had been heard to say, that the speedy suppressing of the Rebellion in Scotland was, under God, owing to his activity and indefatigableness; and that, if another General had had the management of that affair, he would have made it a ten years war." After both parties had maintained the debate several hours, Mr. Stanhope moved, " That the Chairman leave the Chair." Which was carried in the affirmative by two hundred and four voices against one hundred and ninety-four. This was looked upon as a great victory on the Court side; for, had the Tories and their new Allies, as Mr. Shippen called them, gained their point, it was apprehended, that they designed, not only to have passed a censure on Lord Cadogan, but also to have carried the inquiry further, that they might have an opportunity of returning thanks to the Duke of Argyle, his rival in the business of Scotland. Most of the Scots Members voted for Lord Cadogan; but, though Mr. Hungerford spoke in his favour, yet he voted with 1717. with his enemies; and the Lord Finch and Sir Thomas Hanmer were absent from the House that day.

Measures for reducing the public debts.

The principal business of this Session was, the reduction of the national debts, which the King had earnestly recommended to the Commons in his speeches from the Throne. The national debt, by means of long and expensive wars, carried on in support of the Revolution, and consequently in defence of the Religion, Laws, and Liberties of Great-Britain, was become very large and heavy. And therefore the circumstances of time, high credit, and low price of money, prompted those, whose province it was, to consider of proper means to make use of that favourable opportunity, that the public might share in the common advantage of the flourishing state of public credit. For it was thought just and reasonable, that the public should have the same liberty, every private man has, to pay off his debts when he is able; or to reduce the high interest, which necessity had subjected him to, as soon as he could borrow the money elsewhere at more easy rates; unless his Creditors would consent to accept of the common rate of interest upon good security. This method of redemption, among the many schemes that were proposed for reduction of the public debts, was chosen by those who had the management of the affair.

The national debt was considered under two heads, redeemable and irredeemable debts. The redeemable, or such debts as had been provided for by Parliament with a redeemable interest of so much per cent, the public had a right and power to pay off whenever they were able, either by providing money for such Proprietors as insisted upon money, or by offering new terms, in discharge of all former conditions, which offer, if accepted by the Proprietors, was to be deemed an actual redemption of the first debt, as if it had been paid off in ready money.

As for the irredeemable debts, or the long and short annuities (so called from the greater or lesser number of years they were granted for) nothing could be done without the absolute consent of the Proprietors. The only method therefore to treat with them was to offer them such conditions as they should think it their interest to accept.

Upon these principles (as will presently be seen) were founded the resolutions taken by the Commons with relation to the public debts.

Mr. Walpole who was then at the head of the Treasury, and chief projector of the scheme, gave the first hint of it by a motion in the House of Commons, which was agreed to 'That whoever shall advance or lend any sum, not exceeding 600,000 l. for the service of the public by sea or land, shall be repaid the same with interest at 4 l. per cent. out of the first aid to be granted this Session of Parliament.' The putting the interest of this intended loan so low as four per cent. gave reason to surmise, that those, who had the management of the Treasury, designed to put on the same foot the interests of all public funds: Whereupon Mr. Lechmere made a long speech, observing, 'That several schemes and proposals for reducing the national debts had been printed and dispersed; which gave the persons concerned in the public securities the greater uneasiness, because there was reason to apprehend, those schemes came abroad with the privacy and countenance of men in great places: That the general alarm, which this had occasioned among monied men, might very sensibly affect public credit, and be, at this juncture, of very dangerous consequence. To prevent which he thought it necessary, and therefore moved, that the House should come to a resolution, effectually to make good all parliamentary engagements.' To this unexpected motion Mr. Walpole replied, 'That his Majesty having, with great tenderness, recommended to them, from the Throne, the reducing, by degrees, the debts of the Nation; and the Commons having in their address promised to apply themselves, with all possible diligence and attention to that great and necessary work, they ought to exert themselves to make good that promise, and appoint a day to take that important matter into consideration. And he did not doubt but the Commons would then shew all possible regard to justice and public faith. He owned, there had been indeed several schemes published relating to the reduction of the national debts; but that the same were made by private persons; and he durst assure the House, without the participation of any of his Majesty's Ministers; and therefore not to be regarded; but that, in a short time, such proposals would be laid before the House, as, he hoped, would give them satisfaction, and meet with their approbation.' He therefore moved, that Mr. Lechmere's motion might be thus altered, 'That this House will effectually make good the deficiencies of all parliamentary engagements;' which, after a short debate, was approved, and a day was appointed to consider of the national debt.

By this time the surmise, that force would be used in the reduction of the public debts, had heightened the uneasiness of monied men and stock-jobbers, in some, to a degree of extravagance and madness, in others, of fullen discontent, so that many did not scruple to inveigh against the present Administration, as if the public debts were to be spunged off, and all seemed combined to distress the Government, by not advancing any money towards its support; by which means in three days not above 45,000 l. was subscribed to the loan of 600,000 l. in the land-tax. This disappointment, at so critical and dangerous a juncture, furnished Mr. Lechmere with matter for another speech on the 8th of March, when, the Commons being in a Grand Committee on the Supply, he told them, 'He was sorry he was obliged to take notice, that their late vote for a loan at four per cent. interest was like to prove ineffectual; and, as the present exigency required a speedy supply, so he thought it necessary, and therefore moved, that a day be appointed to consider further of that matter.' Mr. Robert Walpole declared, 'That he seconded this motion, there being the greater necessity for it, because he was informed, that some Stock-jobbers, in order to deter the Parliament from pursuing the design of reducing the public debts, had formed a combination to distress the Government, and ruin public credit, which was the occasion, that the late vote for borrowing 600,000 l. at four per cent. had not the desired effect.' To this Mr. Lechmere answered, 'That as none but the most wicked of men could enter into

1717. into such a combination against the good of their Country; so the honourable Member, who spoke last, would do well to name them, that the Honest might shew the utmost resentment and indignation against them. But that, in his opinion, the ill success of the loan was rather occasioned by some reflections on the monied men and stock jobbers, and by certain maxims lately advanced, That the Parliament may exert its authority to extricate themselves by reducing the national debts: That such maxims could not but alarm any persons concerned in the public securities; and the more, when they saw, that a slur had been put upon the motion made three days before, That all parliamentary engagements should effectually be made good. That he still thought such a vote absolutely necessary, both to remove people's fears and jealousies, and to vindicate the honour and justice of the Nation: That the same was intirely agreeable to his Majesty's sentiments, who, in his first speech to this Parliament, had been pleased to recommend to the Commons, in a particular manner, the strict observance of all parliamentary engagements, than which nothing could more contribute to the support of the credit of the Nation: With which opinion of his Majesty the Commons did intirely concur; and that he could not believe any of his Majesty's Ministers could be so regardless of his honour, and known equity, or put so hard a thing upon him, as to make him, in the least, contradict what he had, in so solemn a manner, declared from the Throne. 'He added, That, the Commons having already appointed a day, to consider the State of the Nation with relation to the public debts, he would not anticipate that important affair: But he could not forbear declaring, on this occasion, his private opinion, that it would be the greatest ingratitude, as well as injustice, in the least to wrong those persons, who had supported the Government in the most pressing exigencies, and most perilous junctures, and who, on all occasions, had shewn their zeal and affection for the Protestant Succession. That he had nothing to say as to such public securities, as were redeemable by Parliament; but, as to annuities granted for term of years, he would be positive, that they could not be meddled with, without breaking in upon parliamentary engagements, and violating the public faith; since those annuities were not to be looked upon as debts, but as a sale of annual rents for a valuable consideration, of which contract the Parliament had proposed and made the terms and conditions, and the rentees became purchasers upon the parliamentary faith and security. And that, besides the injustice of breaking through a national contract, those annuities could not be touched without occasioning great confusion and dispute in private families, by reason that most of these annuities had been settled for portions, jointures, and the like.' Upon this Mr. Walpole declared, there never had been a design to use any compulsion with relation to the annuities: That, indeed, an alternative might be offered to the proprietors of the same; but it should be in their choice, either to accept or refuse it. And, as for such funds as were redeemable, nothing would be proposed, that should not intirely consist with justice and public faith (1).

Three days after, the Commons ordered to be laid before the House, an account of the public debts at the Exchequer, distinguishing what the funds were; when granted; what term remained; how much the original money was; how much had been paid off, and how much unpaid; and what the annual interest was, that was payable for the sums advanced (2).

On

(1) The Commons having ordered, that the sums advanced for the service of the public should be repaid with 5 l. per cent. the whole loan of 600,000 l. was immediately filled up.

(2) An ACCOUNT of the PUBLIC DEBTS at the Exchequer as they now stand, distinguishing what the funds are; when granted; how much the original principal money was; how much has been since paid off, and how much remained; and what the annual sums are that are paid or payable for the principal sums advanced, with the rate of interest, exclusive of the deficiencies of Parliamentary grants.

1717. have their principal, the 5*l. per cent. per annum* saved thereby, be made another fund, towards answering such sums of money, as shall be advanced (towards discharging the said principal) by loans, or other securities, as shall be thought proper. XII. That his Majesty be enabled to give power for receiving voluntary subscriptions from any person or persons, intitled to any of the annuities issuing out of the public funds, for the residue of the respective terms of 99, 96, 89, or 32 years, formerly purchased therein (not being subject to redemption) who shall be willing to accept, in lieu thereof, perpetual annuities, redeemable by Parliament, to allow for remaining terms in the said annuities, which were purchased for 99, 96, or 89 years (at the election of the respective Subscribers) either so much as the same annuities shall amount to at 19 years purchase, to be made good by new annuities of 4*l. per cent. per annum*, redeemable by Parliament, or 17 years and a half purchase, to be made good by new annuities of 5*l. per cent. per annum*, to be redeemable in like manner; and to allow for the remaining terms in the said annuities, which were purchased for 32 years (at the election of the respective Subscribers) either so much as the same annuities shall amount to at 14 years and a half's purchase, to be made good by new annuities of 4*l. per cent. per annum*, redeemable by Parliament, or 13 years and a half purchase, to be made good by annuities of 5*l. per cent. per annum*, redeemable in like manner; and that the said annuities shall be settled and secured accordingly. XIII. That all savings that shall arise upon any of the present funds by the proposed redemptions or reductions, be reserved and applied, after all deficiencies that may happen upon any of the said funds are made good, towards discharging and reducing the debts of the national debt. XIV. That all the said duties now in being, or to be continued, shall immediately cease and determine, after the said national debt, and all interest, due thereupon, is discharged and paid off.' These resolutions being approved of in form, bills were ordered to be brought in upon them.

Before these bills were presented, there happened a change in the Administration, which occasioned the new Officers of the Revenue to think some alterations in the measures likewise necessary: But, however, they were forced to build upon Mr. Walpole's foundation, who had now resigned his post, and who, believing these variations detrimental to the public, made some opposition to them.

As the foundation of the scheme for reducing the national debts was built upon paying off or satisfying the public Creditors, many Conferences had been held with the Money Corporations, in order to provide money for such as should be willing to receive their principal and interest in ready money. For this purpose, the Bank agreed to furnish two millions and a half, and the South-Sea two millions, or as much as should be called for, and, for the money advanced, these Companies were to have annuities of 5*l. per cent.*

The proposals of the Bank and South-Sea being agreed to (1), three bills were brought in, upon the resolutions that had been made in relation to the public debts, and all three passed into laws; namely, the General Fund Act, the Bank Act, and the South-Sea Act.

The General Fund Act recites the several acts of Parliament for establishing the four lotteries of the ninth and tenth years of Queen Anne, the terms of years for which those revenues were granted, and states the annual produce of the several funds; namely, 135000*l.* 180670*l.* 168003*l.* 168003*l.* which, together with Banker's debt 398551*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* 3, and another small sum of about 27317*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* amounted in all to 724,849*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* 4, which is the General Fund, the deficiency whereof is to be made good annually, out of the first aids granted by Parliament. And, to the end that a sure and sufficient security may be settled for the

(1) In the debates on these proposals, a quarrel had like to arise between Mr. Stanhope and Mr. Walpole. Mr. Pulteney having said, 'He did not know what private advantage some persons might have for accepting the proposal of the South-Sea Company,' Mr. Stanhope (who thought the reflection of private advantage was chiefly levied against him) vindicated himself, and began with owning his incapacity for the affairs of the Treasury, which were so remote from his studies and inclination: That therefore he would willingly have kept the employment he had before, which was both more easy, and more profitable to him; but, that he thought it his duty to obey the King's commands. That, however, he would endeavour to make up, by application, honesty, and disinterestedness, what he wanted in abilities and experience. That he would content himself with the salary and lawful perquisites of his office; and, though he had quitted a better place, he would not quarter himself upon any body to make it up: That he had no brothers, nor other relations, to provide for; and that, upon his first entering into the Treasury, he had made a standing order against the late practice of granting reversions of places.' Mr. Walpole, being touched with these innuendoes, complained in the first place of breach of friendship, and betraying private conversation. He frankly owned, 'That, while he was in employment, he had endeavoured to serve his friends and relations; than which, in his opinion, nothing was more reasonable and just.

That, as to the granting reversions, he was willing to acquaint the House with the meaning of it. That he had no objections against the German Ministers, whom his Majesty brought with him from Hanover, and who, as far as he had observed, had all along behaved themselves like men of honour; but, that there was a mean fellow, of what Nation he could not tell, who took upon him to dispose of employments: That this man, having obtained the grant of a reversion, which he designed for his son (Mr. Walpole) thought it too good for him, and thereupon kept it for his own son. That thereupon the foreigner was so faulcy as to demand of him the sum of 2500*l.* under pretence, that he had been offered so much for the reversion; but, that he was wiser than to comply with his demand. And that one of the chief reasons that made him resign his places, was, because he would not connive at some things that were carrying on.' Mr. Stanhope answered; Mr. Walpole replied; and, some severe expressions having elapsed them in the heat of the dispute, Mr. Hungersford said, 'That he was sorry to see those two great men fall foul upon one another. However, says he, in my opinion, we must still look upon them as Patriots, and Fathers of their Country; and, since they have, by mischance, discovered their nakedness, we ought, according to the custom of the East, as the Scripture tells us, to cover it by turning our backs upon them.' He added, 'That this unlucky accident had, however, produced some good, in that it 1717. the regular payment of all such annuities, as shall be payable by this act; all the duties and the revenues, mentioned therein, shall continue for ever. With a proviso, that the revenues, by this act made perpetual, shall be subject to redemption.

Proprietors, who are willing to accept 5*l.* per cent. redeemable annuities, in lieu of their lottery orders, shall signify their option by subscribing.

And such as are willing to receive their principal and interest in ready money, shall likewise declare their option in writing.

As for the Bank Act, it must be observed, the Bank at that time, as Proprietors of redeemable debts, were intitled to an annuity of 106,501*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* per annum, in lieu of Exchequer bills formerly cancelled, amounting to 1,775,027*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* ½. And the Exchequer bills standing out, on the 22d of March 1716, are stated at 4,561,025*l.* over and above the charge of circulation which was then due to the Bank. The Bank, by virtue of their contracts for circulating and exchanging these Bills for ready money, were intitled to 3*l.* per cent. for all these bills, and the bills carried an interest of 2*d.* a day, which together made 6*l.* per cent. or the whole sum of 4,561,025*l.* of Exchequer bills. There was also granted, on the change of Queen Anne's Ministry, the sums of 45000*l.* and 8000*l.* a year, which make together 7*l.* 4*s.* 0*d.* ½ per cent. upon all the Exchequer bills. The annuity payable to the Bank for the cancelled Exchequer bills, together with the whole charge to the public for circulating the Exchequer bills then standing, amounted to above 435,000*l.* a year. In these circumstances the Bank Act says, The Governor and Company of the Bank are willing to accept one annuity of 88751*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* ½, being after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per ann. or the principal of 1,775,027*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* ½. in lieu of the present annuity or sum of 106,501*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* per annum. In the same manner the act goes on, and declares the Bank willing to discharge, and deliver up to be cancelled, as many Exchequer bills as amount to two millions, and to accept of an annuity of 100,000*l.* being after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. redeemable after one year's notice, to circulate the remaining Exchequer bills at 3*l.* per cent. and 1*d.* a day, the former allowances to be continued to Christmas 1717; and, after that, the Bank to have for circulating the 2,561,025*l.* remaining Exchequer bills, an annuity of 76830*l.*

15*s.* at the rate of 3*l.* per cent. till redeemed, over and above the 1*d.* a day for interest. The Bank is then required to advance a sum not exceeding 2,500,000*l.* towards discharging the national debts, if wanted, and to have 5*l.* per cent. for as much as they advance, redeemable by Parliament.

As for the South-Sea Act, the original stock of the South Sea was 9,471,325*l.* but, as the funds granted were sufficient to answer the interest of ten millions, at 6*l.* per cent. in the year 1716, the South-Sea Company advanced to the Government 528,675*l.* which compleats the sum of ten millions, for which they received an interest or annuity of 600,000*l.* and likewise 8000*l.* a year for management. Now by this act the Governor and Company declare, they are willing to accept an annuity of 500,000*l.* in lieu of the 600,000*l.* with 8000*l.* a year for management. The Company are to continue a Corporation till their annuity is redeemed, towards which, not less than a million is to be paid at a time. The Company is also required to advance a sum not exceeding two millions, towards discharging the principal and interest due on the four lottery funds, of the 9th and 10th years of Queen Anne.

Pursuant to these acts, the Bank, which was in possession of receipts out of the Exchequer, amounting to 435,063*l.* 16*s.* 0*d.* ½. per ann. accept voluntarily of three annuities, amounting to about 304,531*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* ¾. whereby the saving to the public was 130,532*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* ½. a year.

The Proprietors of the Lottery Orders, amounting to above nine millions, subscribed their orders at the Bank, and accepted Bank annuities in lieu of the same.

Thus, though the Bank and South-Sea had agreed to advance four millions and a half towards the payment of those that should demand ready money, not one farthing was ever demanded in money, except very small sums, amounting in the whole to 471*l.* 4*s.* (1). All the annuities that were settled by virtue of these three acts, were redeemable perpetuities granted at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, upon a principal of about 25,869,247*l.* the amount of the national debt at that time redeemed or reduced.

In the General Fund Act is the clause that establishes the sinking Fund. As the reduction of the interest to 5*l.* per cent. would make a surplus or excess upon the appropriated funds, the act it had revealed a piece of secret history, the scandalous practice of selling places and reverfions. And therefore he moved, 'That the honourable Member, who made the discovery, might be called upon to name the person.' But no body seconded this motion. Mr. Boscawen, Comptroller of the Household, acted the part of a common friend between Mr. Stanhope and Mr. Walpole, saying, 'That it was melancholy to see, that any difference should happen between those two worthy Members, unbecoming their own characters, and the dignity of that Assembly; but that it would still be a greater misfortune, if they should go out with any resentment: And therefore he moved, That the House would lay their commands upon them, that no farther notice be taken of what had passed.' Mr. Motbuen seconded Mr. Comptroller, whose motion being unanimously applauded, the Speaker put it immediately in execution.

1717. act declares, 'That all the monies arising from time to time, as well for the surplus by virtue of the acts for redeeming the funds of the Bank and of the South-Sea Company, as also for the surplus of the duties and revenues by this act appropriated to make good the General Fund, and the overplus monies of the General Fund, shall be appropriated and employed for the discharging the principal and interest of such national debts as were incurred before the 25th of December, 1716, in such manner as shall be directed or appointed by any future act of Parliament, to be discharged out of the same, and for none other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever.' This clause constitutes the Sinking Fund, and shews of what it consists, and to what uses it is appropriated. Though there had been Sinking Funds before this time for the payment of particular debts (1), yet a Sinking Fund, for discharging the national debt in general, was first projected and formed in the year 1716, and till that time unheard of.

As the change in the Ministry had caused a division among the Whigs, some adhering to those that were in, and others to those that were out of place, an opposition was formed by those last in conjunction with the Tories on several occasions. This evidently appeared when Sir William Wyndham (who had been discharged) moved, that Dr. Snape should be appointed to preach on the Restoration of King Charles. The Doctor was one of the King's Chaplains, and Master of Eaton-School, but was of High-Church principles, and had lately attacked the Bishop of Bangor. Sir William's motion was seconded by Mr. Shippen, and supported, not only by several Tories, but also by all the Whigs, who had lately resigned their employments. Mr. Horace Walpole, who spoke after Mr. Shippen, said, 'That it was unusual, on such occasions, to put the negative on any man, whom a Member of that House had thought fit to name; and that Dr. Snape was not only a person of merit, and great learning, but had likewise the honour to be one of his Majesty's Chaplains.' To these commendations Mr. Robert Walpole added, 'That he knew Dr. Snape to be both a very learned, and a very honest man: That he had not only intrusted him with the education of his own children, but also recommended the sons of the Duke of Devonshire and Lord Townshend to his care; and therefore he could not but think, that he might be trusted with preaching a Sermon before that Assembly. M. Lechmere observed, 'That he could not but wonder, that a Member, who had been one of the Managers against Dr. Sacheverel, should now speak in behalf of a Divine, who had asserted the same notions of Passive Obedience and Non-resistance, for which the other had been prosecuted; and who had lately attacked a worthy Champion of the Revolution and Protestant Succession.' Mr. Aylmer answered, 'That he gave his vote to Dr. Snape, because he looked upon him as a learned and honest man: And, as for his having written against the Bishop of Bangor's Sermon, he did not think it a sufficient reason to put upon him a negative, which would be prejudging of a controversy, that did not properly belong to their cognizance.' The Lord Guernsey spoke with still more vehemence in behalf of the Doctor, so that the motion being thus strongly supported, he was appointed to preach by a majority of one hundred and forty-one against one hundred thirty-one.

The Controversy mentioned in this debate between the Bishop of Bangor and Dr. Snape, was occasioned in this manner: Dr. Benjamin Hoadly (the present Bishop of Winchester) famous for his steady adherence at all times to the principles of the Revolution (for which he had been recommended to the Throne by the House of Commons, and advanced to the See of Bangor) had lately published, A Preservative against the Principles and Practices of the Nonjurors; and, soon after *, preached a Sermon before the King, which was printed under the title of, The Nature of the Kingdom of Christ (2). To this sermon Dr. Snape published an answer; and, presently after, the Lower-House of Convocation (as they had before done with regard to Dr. Samuel Clarke's Scripture Doctrine) entered upon the subject, both of the Bishop of Bangor's Sermon, and of his Preservative. They appointed a Committee of six of their Members, Dr. Moss, Dr. Sherlock, Dr. Friend, Dr. Sprat, Dr. Cannon, and Dr. Bisi, to examine them, and made their report to the House. The Committee sat and drew up a representation, in which both the Preservative and Sermon were censured, as tending,

'I. To subvert all Government and Discipline in the Church of Christ, and to reduce his Kingdom to a state of anarchy and confusion,' And,

'II. To impugn and impeach the Regal Supremacy in causes Ecclesiastical, and the authority of the Legislature, to enforce obedience in matters of Religion by civil sanctions.'

This charge was supported by passages taken out of the Preservative and Sermon (3), and the whole drawn up in the form of a report, to be laid before the Convocation. But the Government, out of regard to the interest of the Constitution in Church and State, thought proper to put a stop to these proceedings, by a prorogation to the 22d of November. As this was indolently represented to be the effect of the Bishop's sollicitation, and an argument of his fear, he publicly declared before the world, that the prorogation was ordered, not only without

(1) In most of the funds that were granted for circulating and exchanging Exchequer bills, there was a surplus of the fund itself, computed to be sufficient to cancel and discharge annually some part of the bills: And, in the Aggregate Fund Act of the first of King George, there was a sum of 270,999 l. 7 s. directed to be paid annually towards discharging the Exchequer bills. In all short annuities likewise granted for thirty-two years, the principal being to be sunk at the end of the term granted, this may be looked upon as a Sinking Fund, attending those particular debts. But the first mention that ever was made in Parliament of a Sinking Fund, for discharging the national debt in general, was in this Session.

(2) The text was, My kingdom is not of this world.

(3) The Bishop, in the conclusion of his answer to this Representation, has confronted the passages, on which the charge against him was founded, with the

17. without his feeling, but without so much as his knowledge or even suspicion of any such design till it was resolved. It must be observed that the representation was never approved of by the Lower-House, so as to be made the act of it: Though many have been led to think it was, by the artifice made use of in the title-page to the printed copy of it.

The prorogation of the Convocation did not put an end to the Controversy. For several of the Members, since they could not attack the Bishop, as a public Assembly, resolved to take up the opposite doctrines, which must be true, if his are false.

The propositions contained in those passages of my Sermon and Prefervative, which are made the foundation of the charge in the Representation.

1. Christ himself is King in his own Kingdom.

2. Christ is the sole Law-giver and sole Judge of his subjects, in all points relating to the favour, or displeasure of Almighty God. In other words,

3. No one of his subjects is Law-giver and Judge over others of them, in matters relating to salvation. In other words thus,

4. No men upon earth have a right to make any of their own declarations or decisions to concern and affect the state of Christ's subjects, with regard to the favour of God.

5. The more close and immediate the regard of men to Christ is, the more certainly and evidently true it is, that they are of his Kingdom.

6. It is worthy of all Christians, to live and act as become those who wait for the appearance of an all-knowing and impartial Judge; and in such a behaviour to be without fear of man's judgment, who is both ignorant of many things necessary to form that judgment, and partial in the forming it.

7. We must not frame our ideas, from the Kingdoms of this world, to what ought to be, in a visible and sensible manner, in Christ's Kingdom.

8. Our title to God's favour depends upon our real sincerity in the conduct of our consciences, and of our own actions under them.

The propositions, contradictory to them: Which, therefore, must be maintained to be True and Christian, by all who condemn the others:

1. Christ himself is not King in his own Kingdom.

2. Christ is not the sole Law-giver and sole Judge of his subjects, in all points relating to the favour, or displeasure of Almighty God.

3. Some of his subjects are Law-givers and Judges over others of them, in matters relating to salvation.

4. There is a right in some men, to make their own declarations and decisions to concern and affect the state of Christ's subjects, with regard to the favour of God.

5. A close and immediate regard to Christ himself, is not so certain and evident a mark of being of his Kingdom, as a close and immediate regard and respect to frail men, subordinate to him.

6. It is not worthy of all Christians to live and act as becomes those who wait for the appearance of an all-knowing and impartial Judge; but it becomes them, at the same time that they live and act thus, to be under a fear of man's judgment, who neither has capacity nor authority to determine their condition; and who, in very many cases, contradicts the judgment which Christ will make.

7. We must frame our ideas, from the Kingdoms of this world, to what ought to be, in a visible and sensible manner, in Christ's Kingdom.

8. Our title to God's favour doth not depend upon our real sincerity in the conduct of our consciences, and of our own actions under them; but upon our actual being in the right.

9. Human benedictions—absolutions—denunciations—excommunications—do not determine either God's favour, or anger, towards Christians: And therefore are vain words, when they pretend so to do.

10. Whoever has a right to add sanctions to Christ's laws, is so far King, and has so far regal power in Christ's Kingdom.

11. The sanctions of Christ's laws, appointed by himself, are not the rewards of this world; not the offices or glories of this state; not the pains of prisons, banishments, fines, or any lesser and more moderate penalties; nay, not the much lesser negative discouragements that belong to human society. He was far from thinking that these could be the instruments of such a persuasion, as he knew to be acceptable to God.

12. Christ chose the motives which are not of this world, to support a Kingdom which is not of this world.

13. The maxims, opposite to the maxims upon which Christ founded his Kingdom, are contrary to the interests of true Religion.

14. To apply worldly force or worldly flattery, worldly pleasure or worldly pain, to the case of Religion, is a method opposite to the maxims upon which Christ founded his Kingdom: And therefore, contrary to the interests of true Religion.

15. Christ knew the nature of his own Kingdom, or Church, better than any since his time.

16. Christ left no such matters to be decided against himself, and his own express professions.

17. To teach Christians that they must either profess, or be silent, against their own consciences, be-

Affairs in the North.

During these proceedings the Ministers were no less employed than the Parliament. Negotiations were carrying on, particularly to oblige the King of Sweden to make peace. The Czar had the last year married his niece the Princess Catharina to the Duke of Mecklenburg-Swerin, and resolved to procure the possession of Wismar for him. To that end he had sent first twelve thousand Russians (which were afterwards increased to twenty-six thousand) to assist at the taking of that place then besieged by the Prussians, Hanoverians, and Danes. But, the town having surrendered before the arrival of his army, his project fell to the ground, nor would the Allies suffer any of his troops to be garrisoned there. The Czar was vexed at this disappointment, and from hence may be dated several memorable events, particularly the misunderstanding between him and the Court of Hanover.

Soon after this, a descent on Seben was concerted between the Kings of Prussia and Denmark and the Czar, in order to oblige the King of Sweden to quit Norway, where he had penetrated with an army of twenty thousand men, and was advancing towards Christianstadt, the capital of that Kingdom. The Czar seemed the most forward in this expedition, and took upon him the command of the united fleets of England, Holland, Denmark, and Russia, in order to drive the Swedish fleet into port. But this was all outward show. For the appearance of the British fleet under Admiral Norris could not be very agreeable to the Czar, as it prevented the designs he had formed against Denmark itself after his disappointment at Wismar. And therefore when, in a council of war between him and the King of Denmark, all things were settled for the descent in Seben, and the troops ordered to embark, on a sudden the orders were countermanded, and the project, which was to reduce the King of Sweden to such terms as the Allies should think proper to impose on him, was laid aside, after the great expence the Danes had been at for the transportation of the forces, and other preparations. The Czar pretended the season was case of the authority of others over them, is to found that authority upon the ruins of sincerity and common honesty; to teach a doctrine which would have prevented the Reformation, and the being of the Church of England; which divests Christ of his empire in his own Kingdom, and leads his people to prostitute their consciences at the feet of men.

18. Christ never interposed, since his first promulgation of his law, either to convey infallibility; or to assert the true interpretation of it.

regard to the authority of others, is a very good doctrine; very consistent with the sincerity and honesty becoming Christians; very useful for the justification of the Reformation, and Church of England; perfectly consistent with Christians regard to Christ as their King; and not at all leading them to prostitute their consciences at the feet of weak men.

18. Christ does interpose, since the first promulgation of his law, to convey infallibility to some of those who interpret it; or to assert the true interpretation of it.

After this the Bishop adds a particular view of those principles, which ought to be the measures of judging in such important matters:

1. Christ has the supreme authority of Legislator, and Judge, with respect to all Christians.

2. No authority, therefore, can be justly claimed by any Christians, of what rank soever, in any Christian Church, which destroys the supreme authority of Christ.

3. The will of Christ is delivered to all Christians for the conduct of their lives.

4. No human, fallible authority, therefore, can determine Christians in points of Religion, which they themselves do not judge to be agreeable to the will of Christ.

5. Whatsoever equally concerns the salvation of all Christians, is equally proposed to the understandings of all.

6. There can, therefore, be no such thing as submitting our understandings, out of humility or out of laziness, to any other men whatsoever, in points relating to eternal salvation; without either supposing that Christ did not deliver his will for us, in things which concern us; or did not deliver it plainly enough for us to find it out (with the aids and means, he has put in our power) in those points which concern our eternal salvation, and therefore require all sufficient plainness: Though the taking in the advice and assistance of others, and attending to their arguments, is perfectly consistent with the foregoing proposition.

7. No argument can be admitted by Protestants, which destroys the very essence of Protestantism: Nor can any reasonings conclude justly in favour of any powers amongst them, which they constantly and strongly condemn in the Church of Rome.

8. No authority therefore, can be claimed by any Reformed Church, which was justly condemned and opposed, in order to the Reformation itself. Consequently,

9. No submission in religious affairs can justly be demanded from Protestants, by Protestants, upon any such foundation, as would have absolutely prevented the Reformation itself.

10. Whatsoever was true at the time of the Reformation, is true still.

11. Whatsoever principles are true and just, when urged against Papists, are likewise so, amongst Protestants.

12. Whatever principles and conduct are unjustifiable in Papists, are equally so, in all Protestants.

13. Whatsoever was the foundation of the Reformed Church of England then, is so still: And whatsoever was necessary to justify it at first, is necessary to defend it now.

14. Nothing therefore, which contradicts the main principle of the Reformation; and that, without which the Church of England itself could not justly have been in being; can be for the true interest of this Church, as it is a Protestant Church.

15. As it is a Christian Church, nothing can be supposed either to support or defend its interest, which, admitted as true, would have prevented even the reception of Christianity itself; or which contradicts the main design of the Gospel.

16. The principles therefore, which alone can justly and unexceptionably support it, are such as are uniformly and consistently Christian and Protestant.

(1) Dr. Snape on the 26th of June published, A second letter to the Bishop of Bangor, being a reply to the Bishop's answer to his first, wherein the Doctor puts the following queries to the Bishop:

I pray

1717. was too far advanced, and that it would be better to defer the expedition till the spring. This was strongly remonstrated against in a long manifesto by the King of Denmark, to which the Czar, knowing his own secret motives, returned no answer. The Czar had for some time been discontented with the Allies, who were all for preventing his having any footing in Germany, so jealous were they of his power; and this discontent of the Czar was probably what hindered the utter ruin of the King of Sweden, and was now like to reconcile him to his most powerful enemy, if Baron Gortz succeeded in his project of making a peace between them, of which not only Denmark, Prussia, and Poland, but England itself was to feel the effects (1). The first step to this reconciliation was by the means of Dr. Erskine to sound Prince Menzikoff, who pleaded with the design, soon brought the Czar into it. But it will presently be seen, how desirous he was to clear himself from such an imputation.

The Czar having sent his forces into Mecklenburg, resolved to take a tour to France. He arrived at Amsterdam in December, where he expected the Czarina, who attended him in his travels; but she being big with child, happened to be delivered of a Prince, as she was preparing to set out from Wesel, and came not to Amsterdam till the 10th of February. The Czar remained there and at the Hague till the 4th of April. When King George passed through Holland, in his way from Hanover, the Czar was there, and, had they desired it, might have had an interview, but the Czar excused himself on pretence of an indisposition. During the Czar's stay in Holland, the letters of Baron Gortz and Count Gyllenborg were published in England by the King's special command. In these letters, there were some passages relating not only to Dr. Erskine the Czar's Physician, but to the Czar himself, reflecting on his conduct in regard to King George. Upon this the Czar ordered Wesselouski to present a long memorial to King George, wherein he expresses a surprize at the malice of his enemies, to make him a party concerned in the conspiracy in favour of the Pretender: Shews the improbability of it, as the Pretender would not fail (should he succeed) of assisting the King of Sweden against him: Mentions his offering, the last year, to guarantee the Succession of the Crown of Great-Britain in the House of Hanover, though he had observed several disagreeable steps taken by the British Ministers at the Courts of Vienna, Prussia, and Denmark, and even at the diet of Ratisbon; and though he had been informed that the Court of England was privately treating of a separate peace with the King of Sweden, promising him assistance on his yielding up Bremen, as too plainly appeared by Count Gyllenborg's letters: Offers, however, to establish the ancient good understanding between them, and to concert measures for the vigorous prosecution of the war against the common enemy: Concludes with saying, he could not but be very much concerned at the King's causing

'I pray recollect yourself, and put these questions home to your own conscience, whether your absolutely's and properly's, and such evasive words, were not omitted in your Sermon, as it was originally composed? Whether you did not, before it was preached, shew it to a certain person without such limitations? And whether you was not with difficulty prevailed upon by him to insert them by way of caution? If you think fit to answer in the negative, I engage, a person of as high a station as your Lordship will charge himself with the proof of the affirmative.'

The Bishop two days after in an advertisement solemnly denies all this, and challenges the Doctor to name his Author.

The Doctor, pressed by the solemnity of the challenge, names the Bishop of Carlisle, who, being called upon to prove what he had asserted, disputed a while with Dr. Snape, affirming he had not said, the words were put in before the Sermon was preached, but before it was published; owning withal, that he knew there was such a person in the world who had averred the same. The Bishop of Carlisle, being pressed to name him, names Dr. White Kennet, and writes to him of what had passed, telling him he did not question but he would own his own words. Dr. Kennet positively denied the fact, saying, I never affirmed, never suggested to any mortal that the late Sermon of the Bishop of Bangor was preached with my knowledge, or submitted to my correction. Notwithstanding this, the Bishop of Carlisle asserted in print, that Dr. Kennet was the man that told him he had prevailed with the Bishop of Bangor to put in the forementioned words. In short, the Bishop of Carlisle pledges his eternal salvation that Dr. Kennet did say so: Dr. Kennet, in one of his papers, says, God to help him, and judge him, if he did. They went on advertising against each other, till the Bishop of Carlisle resolved to give no more answers to whatever should be said. However, the Bishop of Bangor, resolving that calumny should lie where it ought to lie, published a long advertisement, as Dr. Kennet did another, to fix the fact upon the Bishop of Carlisle, and to convict him of forgetfulness at least, in charging a fact upon the Bishop of Bangor, which was not true, and quoting a witness for it who knew nothing of the matter. In a word, after lying dormant some months, this controversy was revived in October following, on account of the Bishop's entertaining in his house Francis de la Pilonerie, who had been a Jesuit, but had now renounced the Popish Religion. The Bishop's three principal adversaries were Dean Sherlock, Dr. Snape, and Dr. Cannon, whom the Bishop seemed to outdo in reason and argument as far as they did him in virulence, personal reflections, and reproachful language. He was painted in the most odious colours, both from the Press and the Pulpit, and all for asserting, that Christ is the sole Lawgiver, and sole Judge in his Kingdom, in all points relating to the favour or displeasure of God, a proposition as evident as the sun at noon-day. Dr. Cannon vindicated the Convocation, and Dean Sherlock attacked the Bishop upon a popular point, the repeal of the Test Act, which he asserted to be the design of the Bishop's Sermon. The Dean ended his treatise with a most unjust and reproachful reflection, which the Bishop immediately answered, by setting the matter in a clear light. In November, Dr. Sherlock and Dr. Snape were both removed from being King's Chaplains, nor has the Convocation fate to do any business ever since.

(1) The Czar's laying aside the descent upon Schonen was said to be brought about by the secret management of Baron Gortz, who was become chief Minister and Favourite of the King of Sweden. As there was no likelihood of the Czar's making a peace with the King of Sweden, unless the Provinces he had conquered on the East and North of the Baltic were yielded to him, Gortz persuaded the King of Sweden that he would have ample amends made him for relinquishing those conquests of the Czar, by having the honour of re-placing Stignislaus on the Throne of Poland, setting the Crown of England on the head of the Chevalier de St. George, and by restoring the Dukedom of Holstein to his Dukedom. Besides, that, being united with the Czar, there was nothing they might not undertake.

1718. causing to be printed the malicious insinuations of his enemies, which wounded his honour, without a previous communication of the same, or demanding an explanation of those passages, as a good Ally should have done.

As some articles of this memorial related to the King as Elector of Hanover, there were two answers given to it, one by Mr. Stanhope, the other by the Chancery of Hanover. The King says, he is very far from suspecting the Czar of entering into any engagements in favour of the Pretender: Ours (as nothing can lessen the good understanding between them, but the continuance of the Russian troops in the Empire) he caused instances to be made to the Courts of Vienna, Denmark, and Prussia, for uniting their endeavours to persuade him to remove them: Hopes the Czar will have a due regard thereto, and speedily withdraw his troops, since the continuance of them in the Empire intimates a design quite contrary to the acting against Sweden, and creates such distrust and jealousies as cannot be otherwise removed. As for the publication of the letters, it was impossible (says the memorial) to omit the passages concerning the Czar, because the King had weighty reasons to impart to the Parliament the letters entire as they were found. The answer concluded with assuring the Czar, that he should have reason to be satisfied, provided he would remove the only obstacle to their mutual good understanding, the continuance of the Russian troops in the Empire.

These memorials did not reconcile the two Princes: The distance of their dominions, the interests of their subjects with regard to commerce, suspended their resentments, but they were enemies the rest of their life. The Czar, curious as he was, would not have failed of visiting England in his progress, had the two Monarchs been upon good terms.

The Czar, after having spent three months in Holland, resolved upon a tour to the Court of France, with design to enter into a Confederacy with the Regent of France. He offered to pour a numerous army into the Empire, which should be at the disposal of the Regent, provided he would pay him the subsidies, he demanded, which were very large. But his offer was rejected, and communicated by the Regent to King George. However, the Czar during his stay at Paris concluded a treaty of friendship with France, in which the King of Prussia was included, and, being pressed by the Regent, he promised to withdraw his forces from Mecklenburg. The Czar, at his return to Amsterdam, admitted Baron Gortz (who had been set at liberty the day before his arrival) with great privacy to an interview at Loo (1). Gortz undertook to adjust all differences between the Czar and the King of Sweden, within three months, and the Czar engaged to suspend all operations against Sweden till the end of that term.

This interview having been complained of by a marriage proposed between the Czar's daughter and the Pretender's son, the Czar's Ministers at first denied it, but soon after were obliged to own it. The late Duke of Ormond, Pretender with one Mr. Jernegan, a Roman Catholic, was come to Mittau in Courland to propose a marriage between one of the Czar's daughters and the Pretender, and to offer to go and persuade the King of Sweden to make peace with the Czar, and assist in setting the Pretender on the Throne of Great-Britain; but the proposal of the marriage interfered with Baron Gortz's scheme, who had long intended that Princess for the Duke of Holstein, to whom she was afterwards married. Mr. Jernegan was sent to Sweden for leave that the Duke of Ormond might come there as the Pretender's Minister. The answer he brought to the Duke was, that the King of Sweden had strong reasons for not admitting him. He was soon after sent from Mittau, and Jernegan was left to manage the business at Petersburg, with all possible secrecy. Mean while a Congress was formed at Abo, between the Swedish and Russian Ministers, which was afterwards removed to Aland.

The Czar's chief aim was to keep not only Ingria, and part of Carelia, but also Revel, with Estonia, and Riga, with Livonia, and to restore to Sweden only Finland, and the rest of Carelia. Baron Gortz flattered the Czar with the hopes of the King of Sweden's consent to these cessions, in consideration of his assisting him in restoring Stanislaus, and retaking what Denmark and England had conquered upon Sweden. The King of Prussia was to be included in the treaty, and the Czar, the better to make his own terms, engaged to prevail with him to restore Stetin for an equivalent somewhere else. Upon these foundations Baron Gortz and M. Ojerman, the Czar's Plenipotentiary, concerted the plan of a peace between the Czar and the King of Sweden. By this plan the conquest of Norway was designed. The Czar was obliged to assist his Swedish Majesty in that expedition, and both promised to unite all their forces against the King of Great-Britain, in case he should interpose. This seemed to have a view to the interest of the Pretender, and a design of an invasion in Scotland, after the conquest of Norway.

When Baron Gortz set out from Aland with the plan of peace, in order to obtain his Master's consent, the King of Sweden was with his army before Fredericksbad, in Norway, where he was killed in the night, between the 29th and 30th of November, 1718. Baron Gortz, not being informed of his death, was arrested on the road, and having drawn upon himself the hatred of

(1) It may here be observed, that the Duke of Orleans had interposed to bring the King of Sweden to a peace, and had sent the Count de la March to him as his Ambassador. But the King of Sweden would hearken to no proposals till Baron Gortz and Count Gyllenborg were set at liberty. The Regent, upon this, orders d' Iberville to assure his Britannick Majesty, that the King of Sweden had declared, he had yet no intention to trouble the tranquility of Great-Britain, nor had entered into any of the designs, attributed to his Ministers, and should consider, as a great injury to him, the suspicion of his having had any concern in their projects. After this declaration on the part of the King of Sweden, the Regent hoped, that the King would send back Count Gyllenborg to his Master, and give his consent that Baron Gortz should be also released. This was accordingly done, and Count Gyllenborg was exchanged for Mr. Resident Jachyn, who had been detained at Stockholm.

1717. of the Nation; and resentment of the Nobles, whom he had treated with haughtiness, he was by them condemned to the scaffold, where he died with great resolution. By the King of Sweden's death the face of affairs in the North was entirely changed: Sweden was forced to submit; the Czar, King of Denmark, and King George, as Elector of Hanover, remained in possession of what they had acquired. These affairs, though not ended till the following year, have been related at once to prevent any farther recourse to them. But to return to England.

Trial of the Earl of Oxford.
Fr. H. L.
Fr. H. C.
The Earl of Oxford had now been confined in the Tower almost two years, and, finding the Session was like to end without entering upon his case, he caused a petition to be presented to the House of Lords, wherein he submitted his case to their Lordships consideration, praying, that his imprisonment might not be indefinite. The Lord Trevor, who presented his petition, made a long speech in his favour, as did also the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Nottingham and Abingdon, and the Lords Harcourt and North and Grey. It was insisted in the Earl's behalf, that the impeachment was destroyed and determined, since he was not brought to his trial the same Session, in which he was impeached; and that the prorogation superseded the whole proceedings. The Earl of Nottingham, who, in 1715, when in favour, had been one of the most zealous against the Ministers of the late Queen, strenuously insisted upon the impeachment's being superseded by the prorogation, and demanded leave to enter his protestation against the vote passed to the contrary, by a majority of eighty-seven to forty-five (1).

This being rejected, the Duke of Buckingham moved to appoint a day for the Earl's trial, which, after some debates, and appointing a Committee to search for precedents, was fixed and appointed. It is remarkable, that the appointing a day did not occasion so long a debate as the shortening the day, and that the Earl's friends pressed the House to appoint a short day, while the other side pleaded for time. Accordingly, the Duke of Buckingham, who had made the motion, declared in a speech for a short day, and named the 6th of June. But the Earl of Sunderland and the Lord Coningsly were for sending a message to the Commons, to know whether they were ready, or to appoint the 13th of June for the trial. After some debate, the 13th was appointed by a majority of eighty-five against forty-four, and a message was sent to the Commons to acquaint them with the same.

This message caused no less debates among the Commons. They saw the face of their affairs a little changed: Some, who had been active in this prosecution when it was first begun; and upon whom the House might be said in some measure to depend for carrying it on; seemed to look coldly upon the matter, and to decline the work, or at least to have less of that confidence, the House usually shewed them before. This caused a vote to appoint a Committee to inquire into the state of the Earl of Oxford's impeachment. The Committee found; upon enquiry, that several Members of the Secret Committee (who begun the prosecution) had been called up to the House of Peers, as the Lords Onslow, Coningsly, and Marlbam, and that others seemed remiss, or were absent. Therefore the House was moved, and did agree; that Mr. Carter, Sir William Thompson, the Serjeants Birch, Pengelly, and Reynolds, should be added to the Secret Committee. At their first meeting; Mr. Carter was chosen Chairman in the room of Mr. Walpole, who, with several others, absented himself. For this reason Mr. Secretary Addison, Mr. Craggs, Serjeant Mead, and Mr. Jessop, and a little after Mr. Lechmere, now Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, were added to the number.

All the eminent Lawyers of the House being thus named to be of the Committee, they immediately fell to preparing to make good the articles of impeachment, in case the House should agree to proceed to the trial; but all the while they left people in suspense as to their resolution, even till the day before the trial was to be. The King had appointed Lord Chancellor Cowper to be Lord High-Steward on this occasion, and all things were in readiness for the trial; when, on the 12th of June, a message was sent from the Commons to the Lords, to demand longer time for their preparations, pursuant to the following report of the Committee.

That the Committee had met several times, and made some progress in the matters to them referred; but that the prosecution of the impeachment having been interrupted for so many months, by the intervention of many weighty and urgent affairs, which more nearly and immediately concerned the welfare, defence, and security of the Kingdom, it was become absolutely necessary for those, who should be appointed to manage the impeachment, to review and carefully peruse all the treaties, records, letters, and other papers proper and necessary for supporting this prosecution; which being voluminous,

(1) His protest was as follows:

Dissentient

I. Because there seems to be no difference in law between a prorogation and a dissolution of the Parliament, which, in constant practice, have had the same effect as to determination, both of judicial and legislative proceedings; and consequently this vote may tend to weaken the resolution of this House, May 22, 1685, which was founded upon the law and practice of Parliament in all ages, without one precedent to the contrary, except in cases which happened after the order made the 19th of March, 1678, which was reversed and annulled in 1685; and in pursuance hereof the Earl of Salisbury was discharged in 1690.

No. 92, Vol. IV.

II. Because this can never be extended to any but Peers, for by the statute 4 Edw. III. no Commoner can be impeached for any capital crime; and it is hard to conceive, why the Peers should be distinguished and deprived of the benefit of all the laws of liberty, to which the meanest Commoner in Britain is intitled; and this seems the more extraordinary, because it is done unasked of the Commons, who, it is conceived, never can ask it with any colour of law, precedent, reason or justice.

This protest was subscribed by Nottingham, Fra. Roffen, North and Grey, Bathurst, Abingdon, Mansell, Hay, Guilford, Dartmouth, Foley, Bruce.

1717. luminous, it would be impossible, within the time appointed for the trial, to adjust and apply the proper evidence to the several articles (1).^{1717.}

Upon this message, the Earl of Sunderland moved to allow the Commons a fortnight. The Duke of Devonshire said, Twelve days were sufficient. The Lords Trevelyan, Harcourt, and others insisted, that, the Lords having fixed a day for the trial, they ought not to grant any farther time: But the Duke of Devonshire's motion for twelve days was carried by seventy-six against fifty-seven; and the 24th of June was appointed for the day of trial, of which notice was sent to the Commons.

Upon this the Commons, to let it be seen that they resolved to go on with the trial, voted the preparatory orders, and appointed the Committee, with four other Members, to be the Managers to make good the articles of impeachment.

On the 24th of June, the Lord High-Steward, with the House of Peers, passed to the Court prepared for them in Westminster-Hall, when the Commons were present, as a Committee of the whole House, their Managers coming first, and taking their places. The King, the Prince, and Princess of Wales were seated in boxes; as were the rest of the Royal Family, and the foreign Ministers. All things being prepared, and silence proclaimed, the Earl of Oxford, who had been brought from the Tower by water to Westminster, was conducted to the bar by the Deputy-Lieutenant of the Tower, having the axe carried before him by the Gentleman-Jailer of the Tower, who stood with it on the left-hand of the Prisoner, with the edge turned from him. Then the articles of impeachment * were read, with the Earl's answer, and the replication of the Commons. After which the Lord High-Steward addressed himself thus to the Prisoner (after having mentioned the usual way of exhorting Persons in his condition as to their behaviour) 'But, considering the many great Offices your Lordship has borne in the State, your long experience and known learning in all Parliamentary proceedings, I cannot but think it would be improper for me to speak to your Lordship in that manner.' Mr. Hampden, one of the Managers, then made a long speech, which ended, Sir Joseph Jekyll stood up, in order to make good the first article of the impeachment; but the Lord Harcourt having signified to the Lords, that, before the Managers proceeded farther, he had a motion to make, they adjourned to their own House, and the Commons returned to theirs.

As soon as the Peers were come to their House, the Lord Harcourt represented, 'That the going through all the articles of impeachment would take up a great deal of time to little purpose; for, if the Commons could make good the two articles for High-Treason, the Earl of Oxford would forfeit both Life and Estate, and there would be an end of the matter; whereas the proceeding, in the method the Commons proposed, would draw the trial into a prodigious length: Urging, that it would be a great hardship upon a Peer, who had already undergone so long a confinement, to appear every day at their bar like a Traitor, and be, at last, found guilty only of High Crimes and Misdemeanors.' And therefore he moved, That the Commons might not be admitted to proceed, till judgment was first

(1) When this report was read in the House of Commons, there was a silence for two or three minutes, till at last Mr. Hungerford rose up, and took notice of the great hardships, which the Earl of Oxford had undergone. Mr. Boscawen expressed his concern, 'That a prosecution, which the Commons had begun in so solemn a manner, and which was thought so necessary to vindicate the honour and justice of the Nation, should, at last, be dropped; which he was sure would be a reflection upon that House.'

Here again was a deep silence; and, the Speaker rising, in order to put the question, Mr. Samuel Tafel, made a long speech, in which he observed, that, the House having been assured by the Chairman of the Committee of Secrecy, that there was evidence against the Earl of Oxford sufficient to convict him of High-Treason in Westminster-Hall, it was that which swayed him to vote for bringing an offender to public justice, who had betrayed the honour and interest of the Nation. Mr. Bromley endeavoured to vindicate Mr. Walpole, by alleging, 'That, though he was Chairman of the Secret Committee, yet, if any thing were done amiss amongst them, it were hard to lay all the blame at his door, since the whole Committee were equally concerned in the impeachment.' But, as to the matter then under deliberation, Mr. Bromley added, 'That they had been told above a year and a half ago, that the evidence was ready; but that they ought not to give the Lords the trouble of going through the whole impeachment, since, in his opinion, twenty of the articles were altogether vain and needless.' Some Members being shocked at this assertion, Mr. Bromley immediately explained himself, saying, 'That, if the two articles that were for High-Treason could be made good, the other twenty would be needless and insignificant.' Mr. Shippen observed, 'That this impeachment had been depending so long, that every body expected it would be dropped: And indeed, unless the two articles of High-Treason could be made good, he thought it unreasonable to give the two Houses an unnecessary trouble about the other articles, by keeping them sitting in the hottest part of the summer. That, after all, those, who had first begun the impeachments, ought to be satisfied with having got the places of those that were impeached; which, indeed, seemed to be what they had principally in view. That the truth of this appeared evidently from the behaviour of the Gentleman, who was the most forward and active in the impeachments, whose warmth was very much abated since he was out of place. That he did not mention this as a reflection on that Gentleman, for whom he ever had a great respect; but that he was afraid this would lessen him in the esteem of others. That, for his own part, he was not in the least surprized at his conduct; of which he had, of late, observed many instances; but that he ever disapproved it.' After this Mr. Walpole made an apology for himself, saying, among other things, 'That he had of late looked over some of the most material papers relating to this impeachment; and he was still convinced in his conscience, that the late Ministry had given themselves up intirely, and were ready to deliver up the Nation to France.' Mr. Lechmere strongly supported the motion for the message, and said, 'It was no wonder, that a certain set of men, who had, at first, opposed the impeachments, should now be for letting them drop: And that this was yet the less surprizing, in that the same Gentlemen had constantly opposed all that had been proposed for the support of the present happy settlement. But that, for his own part, he was of the same opinion he ever was, that the Nation could not prosper, till they had brought those to justice, who betrayed its Allies in so scandalous a manner, and brought it to the brink of ruin: And that he would venture his life in this prosecution.' This speech had so much weight, that it was carried without dividing, that the message be sent to the Lords.'

(1) The

1717. first given upon the articles for High-Treason. The Lord Harcourt was supported by the Lord Trevelyan, and the Earls of Anglesea and Nottingham. But the Lord Parker answered them, 'That, in all Courts of Judicature, it is the usual and constant method to go through all the evidence, before judgment be given upon any part of the accusation: That, though the House of Peers be the supreme Court of the Kingdom, yet it has ever a regard to the rules of equity and justice, and even to the forms observed in the Courts below. And, as for the Prisoner's appearing in the abject condition of a Traitor, it was but a piece of formality, which did him no manner of hurt, and to which persons of the highest rank had ever submitted, in order to clear their innocence.' The Earl of Sunderland, the Lord Comingsby, and the Lord Cadogan spoke on the same side. But, the Dukes of Buckingham and Argyle, the Earl of Illy, the Bishop of Rockester, the Lord Norib and Grey, the Lord Townshend, and several others having strenuously supported the Lord Harcourt's motion, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of eighty-eight against fifty-six.

This resolution being declared to the Managers at the Lords return to the Hall, Sir William Thompson replied: 'That they conceived it to be so much the undoubted right of the Commons to proceed in their own method, in maintenance of the articles exhibited by them, and did apprehend, that this resolution of their Lordships might be of fatal consequence to the rights and privileges of all the Commons of Great-Britain, that they could not take upon them to proceed any further, without referring to the House of Commons for their direction therein.

Upon this proceeding, Conferences, searching for precedents, and the like method of managing such disputes took up some days; and in particular, on the 27th of June, the Commons at a Conference delivered a paper, containing their reasons for asserting it as their undoubted right to impeach a Peer either for High-Treason, or for High Crimes and Misdemeanors, or, if they see occasion, to mix both in the same accusation (1).

This paper being debated in the House of Lords, they insisted on their former resolution, that the Commons should not proceed till judgment was given upon the articles of High-Treason, and ordered likewise a paper of reasons in support of their resolution to be drawn up and delivered to the Commons at another Conference, wherein they asserted it to be a right inherent in every Court of Justice to order and direct such methods of proceedings as such Courts shall think fit to be observed, in all causes depending before them (2).

Thus far the two Houses carried on their debate with some calmness, but they grew warmer the next day, when the Commons, having considered the paper delivered to them by the Lords, sent a message to desire a free Conference, and the Lords refused it; and now the party for the Earl of Oxford began to see his deliverance at hand, for the Lords refusing to grant

(1) The paper was as follows:

'The Commons having taken into their consideration your Lordships resolution communicated to their Managers relating to the proceedings on the trial of Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer; and being desirous, as far as in them lies, to maintain a good correspondence with your Lordships, have desired this Conference, and have commanded us to acquaint your Lordships, that they conceive it to be the undoubted right of the Commons to impeach a Peer, either for High-Treason, or for High Crimes and Misdemeanors; or, if they see occasion, to mix both the one and the other in the same accusation.

The impeachment preferred against Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer is one continued accusation, consisting of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, and also of charges of High-Treason. The facts, on which the articles preceding those of High-Treason are grounded, are laid together in order of time, and follow one another successively, in the manner they were committed.

As the Commons thought this the most natural method for exhibiting the several articles against the said Earl, they were of opinion, that they should proceed in the proof of these several facts after the same method, since it is manifest, that, in laying open the course of such a wicked Administration, the preceding parts of it gave light to those which follow; and that the proof of the several articles of High Crimes and Misdemeanors would naturally lead to the proof of those of High-Treason.

Your Lordships received these several articles of impeachment, without making any exception against the form in which they were exhibited. The said Earl made his answer to them in the same order, and has nowhere insisted to be tried in any other method: So that the Commons are surprised to find a stop put to their prosecution by an objection, which has never been started by the said Earl, and which your Lordships had given them so little reason to expect.

To this must be added, That as the Commons only are masters of the evidence, and as upon that account they are best able to determine what to charge first, and what next; so they are most proper to determine in what method to proceed for the advantage of the prosecution, in the event of which all the Commons of Great-Britain are so highly concerned.

To which they further add, that they see no reason, but that your Lordships may as well invert the whole order of the articles, as to prescribe to the Commons those particular articles, on which they are first to proceed; which will necessarily produce such a confusion, both in the facts and evidence, as is by no means consistent with that clearness and perspicuity, in which the Commons think this affair ought to appear.

The Commons, upon examining precedents, do find divers precedents of impeachments for High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors, in the same accusation; and do not find, that the Lords ever objected to such proceedings, or ever gave judgment upon any particular article of an impeachment before the Commons had gone through, and concluded their evidence upon all the articles, or so many of them as they thought fit: And the Commons are at a loss to conceive what arguments, or precedents, can be brought to support the resolution of your Lordships, to give judgment upon one part of the same accusation, reserving the other part for a subsequent trial, as they are to know what your Lordships mean by admitting the Commons to proceed upon the articles of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, after the judgment is given upon the articles for High-Treason, supposing the judgment proper for High-Treason should be given against the said Earl.

For these reasons the Commons assert it as their undoubted right to proceed on the trial of Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer, after the method, in which their Managers were proceeding, when interrupted by your Lordships resolution.

(2) The paper was as follows.

'Their Lordships, in order to preserve a good correspondence with the House of Commons (which they

1717. grant the Commons a free Conference, set the two Houses into a new dispute, and put the wished for agreement about the trial quite out of the question.

This refusal of a free Conference was urged in the House of Lords upon the foundation, That it was a point of judicature in which the Commons had no concern, at least, they could not admit it to be debated; and some precedents were brought, in which the Commons had denied the Peers a free Conference, as in money-bills, in which the same reasons were given, namely, That it was a money-bill in which the Lords had no right to make any amendment. These things were going on to great heights, and, the Commons desiring a Conference upon this subject, they gave in a paper to the Managers for the Peers, wherein they insisted that it was not a point of judicature, but a point relating only to the prosecution of the Commons, and therefore a free Conference ought not to be denied (1).

The Lords, though many of them were zealous for bringing on the trial, yet being tender of the privileges of the Peers, and satisfied that the Commons were in the wrong, resolved to insist upon it, that they ought not to grant them a free Conference upon this subject; and, having put the question again in their House, it passed, not to grant a free Conference, which was signified to the Commons.

This message put the House of Commons in a flame, and several warm speeches were made on the occasion by Mr. Stanhope, Mr. Craggs, Mr. Threlkeld, and others; Mr. Lechmere lamented the unhappy dilemma to which they were brought, either to see so great an offender as the Earl of Oxford escape unpunished, or to acquiesce in proceeding on his trial in the manner prescribed by the Lords. He said, 'He thought the latter more eligible of the two, with a saving to the rights and privileges of the Commons, and therefore made a motion for it.' He was supported by Mr. Hampden, and several other Members, but his motion was rejected. Then a message was brought from the Lords, that they intended presently to proceed on the trial of the Earl. The Commons took no notice shall always endeavour to do, as far as lies in their power) have desired this Conference upon the subject-matter of the last Conference, and have directed us to acquaint you, that their Lordships judge it a right inherent in every Court of Justice, to order and direct such methods of proceedings, as such Courts shall think fit to be observed in all causes depending before them; which can have no influence to the prejudice of justice, and where such methods of proceedings are not otherwise settled by any positive rule. The power of Judicature on all impeachments being a right unquestionably inherent in their Lordships, and it not being determined by any positive rule, whether the House of Commons may proceed to make good the several articles exhibited for High-Treason; and there being no precedent, where the Commons, upon the trial of any such impeachment, attempted to proceed, in the first place, to make good any of the articles contained in such impeachments for High Crimes and Misdemeanors; their Lordships considering the nature of the impeachments now depending before them, and the method, wherein the Managers for the House of Commons were beginning to proceed upon the trial, to make good the first article thereof, which is a charge for High Crimes and Misdemeanors only; and also considering the very different methods of proceeding on an impeachment of a Peer for High-Treason, as well before as upon the trial thereof, and the circumstances attending such a trial, thought themselves obliged to come to a resolution communicated to the Commons on the 24th instant, as well for the doing justice in the case depending before them, as for the preventing a new precedent to be made on this trial; in consequence whereof, a new and unjustifiable form of proceeding against a Peer, upon an impeachment for High-Treason and High Crimes, might be introduced at his trial upon those articles, in which he is charged for High Crimes and Misdemeanors only, to the prejudice of the Peerage of Great-Britain in all time to come, viz. The trying a Peer on articles for High Crimes and Misdemeanors without the bar, the detaining in custody a Peer so accused, and repeated commitments of him to the Tower during the time of such trial, and subjecting a Peer to as ignominious circumstances on his trial, as if he was then on his trial on articles for High-Treason: Whereas a Peer, on his trial on articles for Misdemeanors only, ought not to be deprived of his liberty, nor sequestered from Parliament, and is intitled to the privilege of sitting within the bar during the whole time of his trial: In all which particulars, the known rule of proceedings in such cases may be evaded, should a Peer be brought to his trial on several articles exhibited against him on High Crimes and Misdemeanors and

High-Treason mixed together, and the Commons be admitted to proceed, in order to make good the articles for High Crimes and Misdemeanors, before judgment be given upon the articles for High-Treason. Their Lordships have fully considered the matters offered to them by the House of Commons, at the last Conference relating to the proceedings against Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer; and their Lordships are fully satisfied, That the resolution they have taken and communicated to the Commons on the 24th instant, is just and reasonable; and that the House of Commons are not put under any real inconvenience thereby, in carrying on their present prosecution. Their Lordships have commanded us to let you know, that they do insist on their said resolution, viz. That the Commons be not admitted to proceed, in order to make good the articles against Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors, till judgment be first given upon the articles for High-Treason.

(1) The paper was thus:

'The Commons having taken into consideration your Lordships message, viz. That your Lordships did not think fit to give a free Conference on the subject-matter of the last Conference, as was desired by the Commons: And they being still desirous, to the utmost of their power, to preserve a good correspondence with your Lordships, have asked this Conference; and have commanded us to acquaint your Lordships, that they are very much surprised to find your Lordships deny a free Conference, after your Lordships have already agreed to a Conference desired by the Commons on the same subject-matter, and after your Lordships have, on your parts, also desired a Conference upon the same subject. The free Conferences are the most antient and established methods for adjusting the differences that have at any time arisen between the two Houses, and, as the Commons conceive, is the only method to preserve a good correspondence between them on such occasions, which, at this time, is of the highest importance, because a misunderstanding on this account would tend to defeat the trial of the impeachment of the Commons. That the Commons conceive clearly, that the subject-matter of the last Conference is not a point of judicature, but a point relating only to the prosecution of the Commons, it having arisen before any matter of judgment had come before your Lordships upon the trial. For which reasons the Commons conceive, that your Lordships ought not to have denied them a free Conference upon the subject-matter of the last Conference.'

(1) It

17. tice of this message (1). However, seeing the Lords were resolved to proceed, the House adjourned. It was suggested, this adjournment was ordered, that they might not receive any more messages about it, or be sent to from the Hall to appear at the trial.

It appears from the debates abovementioned, that these things were not carried thus without some variety of opinions and motions. Some, who were zealous for bringing a great offender (and such they accounted the Earl to be) to justice, were for quitting the nicety they contended for, and, not doubting but they should be able to make good the charge of High-Treason against him, were for giving the Lords the point and proceeding. But others, no less zealous for justice, and as much convinced of the Earl's guilt, were yet of opinion, that they ought not to make any precedent, which might be used by posterity to the disadvantages of the Commons, and in prejudice to their rights, but that they should proceed in the ordinary methods of justice, and preserve the privileges of their House entire, as their Ancestors had done before them.

It was, however, proposed to proceed by way of Attainder; and Sir William Strickland moved it, though in other words, 'That leave be given to bring in a bill, to inflict pains and penalties on Robert Earl of Oxford, as his traitorous practices and misdemeanors deserve, and as shall be thought reasonable.' This bred a high debate, which ended in an adjournment to the 3d of July.

In the mean time, the Lords proceeded to the formalities of Judicature. They went down to the Hall, took their places, ordered the Earl to be brought to the bar, and made proclamation for his Accusers to appear, and make good the impeachment against him. After this, the Court sat perfectly silent, as if expecting the Commons should appear. This silence held about a quarter of an hour, when the Lords adjourned to their House, where the question, that the Earl should be acquitted, passed in the affirmative, after some debate. Then the House returned to the Hall, where, one or two excepted, they all gave their votes for the discharge of the Earl of Oxford, who was immediately set at liberty. It was observed, most of the Whig Lords retired; before the Peers went the last time to the Hall, so there were not above a hundred and seven who gave their votes.

Thus ended this affair: And it was plain, the Earl owed his discharge not only to the disputes between the two Houses, but also to the late changes in the Ministry; without which the Earl of Nottingham, the Duke of Argyle, the Earl of Ilay, the Duke of Devonshire, and the Lord Townshend would certainly not have been in the number of his friends. However, the Commons did not rest here. For, though Sir William Strickland's bill for inflicting pains and penalties on the Earl was not seconded, yet, to shew their resentment at this proceeding, they resolved that the King should be addressed, to except him out of the Act of Grace, which was intended to be brought into the House (2). The King had likewise, two days before, upon information that the Earl of Oxford designed to come to Court, thought fit to forbid him.

The Session now drew towards an end, and the Houses were chiefly employed in finishing the bills that were depending, when, on the 15th of July, the Earl of Sunderland delivered in the House of Peers, the Act of Grace, which the King had promised in his speech of the 6th of May. It was immediately read and passed, and then sent down to the House of Commons where it met with the like dispatch.

All things being ready, the King came the same day, in the afternoon, to the House of Peers, and, having given the Royal assent to all the bills, closed the Session with the following speech, which was read to both Houses by the Lord-Chancellor:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I Cannot put an end to this Session without expressing my thanks to you for the dispatch you have given to the public business, and declaring the satisfaction I promise myself in meeting you again early the next winter, with the same good dispositions for the service of your Country.

" The

(1) It is said, some moved not to receive it. Annals.
(2) As this address (which was presented by the whole House on the 5th of July) sets forth the just resentment of the Commons; it is here inserted, with the King's answer:

Most gracious Sovereign,

" We your Majesty's most faithful subjects, the Commons of Great-Britain in Parliament assembled, do most humbly represent to your Majesty, That, in our impeachment exhibited against Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer, we did set forth, That he the said Earl did traitorously adhere to, aid, and abet the late French King, then an enemy to her late Majesty, and did begin and carry on a clandestine and separate Correspondence and Negotiation with the Minister of the said French King; in consequence of which it is evident, that great part of the forces maintained at the expence of so much British treasure, in order to reduce the power of France; as likewise great part of the same end, were, in reality, made subservient and instrumental to awe the good Allies of her Majesty into a compliance with the hard terms dictated by France. The unhappy Catalans were abandoned; the Emperor, Empire, and King of Portugal, were left to treat for themselves; the Kingdom of Sicily was given to the Duke of Savoy, as an inducement and reward to him for quitting the common cause, in direct defiance and violation of the Grand Alliance, and of the declared sense of most of our good Allies, and especially of the Dutch, who, to this day, have never assented to that condition of the treaty of Utrecht. A shameful and dishonourable treaty of peace was at last concluded, by which impracticable terms of trade were imposed on Great-Britain; the demolition of Dunkirk, which had been addressed for by Parliament, was eluded by a treacherous connivance, as the making of a new canal at Mardyke; and the security which was proposed, by removing the Pretender out of France, was, in the like manner, evaded by a treacherous connivance at his residing in Lorrain.

It is owing to your Majesty's unwearied endeavours for the good of your subjects, and that just regard which is paid to your Majesty by foreign Princes and States, that we see ourselves delivered, in a great degree, from the effects of these pernicious measures, which might otherwise have proved fatal to your Kingdoms: But as we reflect, with equal gratitude and admiration, on your Majesty's being able to retrieve such

"The measures we have taken in this Parliament, have, by the blessing of Almighty God, effectually defeated all the attempts of our enemies, both at home and abroad: And, as the principles, on which those measures are founded, are equally conducive to the supporting the just rights of the Crown and the liberties of the people, I shall always persevere in them myself, and distinguish those who adhere to them with the same steadiness and resolution.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you, in the most affectionate manner, for the supplies you have granted me, and for that constancy and zeal, which you have shewn in reducing our national debts, notwithstanding the many incidents and obstructions you have met with in the carrying on of that great work. As you have furnished me with the means of disappointing any designs of a foreign enemy against these my Kingdoms; so I cannot but ascribe, in a great measure, the happy prospect of our affairs abroad to that public spirit, which has appeared in your proceedings, and has convinced the world, that no insinuations or artifices can divert you from your duty to your Sovereign, and a disinterested regard to your fellow-subjects.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It is with great pleasure, that I see the tranquility of the Nation so well established, as to admit of an Act of Grace, which I have long desired a fit opportunity to grant. I hope, that such as shall, by this means, be restored to the enjoyment of security, and the protection of those laws, against which they have offended, will have a due sense of this my indulgence, and give me the most acceptable return they can possibly make me, that

"of becoming friends, instead of enemies, to their Country."

Then the Parliament was prorogued to the 12th of August; and afterwards, by several prorogations, to the 21st of November.

Thus ended this Session of Parliament, famous for the transactions relating to the Earl of Oxford, but chiefly for laying the foundation of paying the public debts, without any breach of Parliamentary credit.

The expectation of the Act of Grace had long agitated the minds of people. Some, through their impatience for want of it; Others, thro' fear of being excepted out of it; and others, through their dislike of the general tenor of it, had appeared dissatisfied about it, and spoke contemptibly of it (1).

This Act of Grace and free Pardon was as a finishing to the whole transaction of the Rebellion, and therefore it will not be improper to give an account of the persons who received benefit by it, and also of those who were excepted out of it.

The exceptions by name were no more than, the Earl of Oxford, pursuant to the Commons address, Lord Harcourt, Mr. Prior, Mr. Thomas Harley, and Mr. Arthur Moor; with five mean persons, Crisp, Nodes, O Bryan, Redmayne (the Printer) and Thompson. Besides these, the Assassins in Newgate (confined there ever since the Assassination plot in King William's Reign) were also excepted by name. The other exceptions were but five, except such as are usual in all general pardons. No Act of Grace for many ages past, in like circumstances, had been clogged with fewer exceptions, considering the number of Rebels then abroad, and their unwearied diligence to disturb the peace of the Kingdom (2).

As for those who received the benefit of it, they were first the Lords in the Tower under sentence of death, who were immediately delivered. This was directed by an exception in the Act of Grace, miscarriages, especially in a time which has been disturbed by public tumults and rebellion; we think it is a great aggravation of guilt in those who gave up so many national advantages, at a time when they laboured under no such difficulties at home, and when the continued successes of a long and glorious war had put them into a condition of gaining the most beneficial terms from the enemy.

Your faithful Commons did likewise exhibit several other charges against the said Earl, representing him, in many notorious instances, as a person who had abused the trust and confidence which her late Majesty had reposed in him, and sacrificed the honour of his Sovereign, and the good of her people, to private views of interest and ambition.

Your faithful Commons have not been wanting in their endeavours to bring the said Earl to justice; but, by reason of the unhappy differences that have, in this proceeding, arisen between the two Houses, we have found ourselves disappointed of our just expectation, and reduced to the necessity either of giving up rights and privileges of the highest importance to all the Commons of Great-Britain, or seeing this great offender escape with impunity for the present.

For these reasons, we do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that your Majesty will be pleased to except Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer out of the Act of Grace, which your Majesty has been graciously pleased to promise from the Throne, to the end the Commons may be at liberty to proceed against the said Earl, in a Parliamentary way.

To this address his Majesty was pleased to return the following answer.

Gentlemen,

"I will give directions, in relation to the Earl of Oxford, as you desire; and it is with pleasure I observe the sense expressed in your address of my endeavours for the security, honour, and advantage of these Kingdoms."

(1) This gave ground to the following expression in a treatise published at that time, 'That the character of King George was not only Great and Godlike, but even extended further than that of God himself. For (says the Author) God Almighty, however merciful in his nature, yet has proclaimed pardon to none but the penitent; whereas King George has pardoned, not those who have repented only, but even those who contemned the very grace they have received, and insulted the King that forgave them, receiving the grace with unthankfulness, and with ungrateful reproaches against the hand that gave it.'

(2) Among the exceptions were all the persons of the name and clan of Macgregor, mentioned in an Act of Parliament in Scotland, in the first year of King Charles I. It seems the Family or Clan of Macgregor, alias Campbells, had been in Rebellion in the time of 1717. Grace, namely, ⁴ All persons impeached in Parliament, before the 6th of May 1717, whose impeachment remains undetermined.⁵ So that they who were impeached for Rebellion, and being convicted were under sentence of death, were not by this article excepted, because the impeachment was determined in law. Consequently, the Earl of Carnwarth, with the Lords Widdrington and Nairn, Peers, condemned by the House of Lords, were immediately discharged. The Lord Duffus was continued under confinement, with an allowance of 3 l. a week.

Likewise the prison-doors were set open all over England: Seventeen Gentlemen under sentence of death in Newgate were released; as also a great many in the Marshalsea and Fleet, and in the hands of Messengers; and not only those who were under sentence, but several others who were not tried.

In the Castle of West-Chester, about two hundred prisoners taken at Preston were set free, none being detained but the Lord Charles Murray, son of the Duke of Albion, and he was only referred to be a particular object of the King's clemency, a pardon having passed for him a few weeks after.

In like manner the prisoners in the Castle of Lancaster were delivered; these were in general the common soldiers of the Rebels, the rest of them were either sent to the Plantations at their own request, or dead in prison, or had made their escape. The prisoners in the Castle of Carlisle, being twenty-six Gentlemen, the chief of the distressed people in Scotland; most, if not all, taken in actual Rebellion, and under sentence of death, were likewise released.

In Scotland, all the prisoners remaining in the Castles of Edinburgh and Stirling, as the Lord Rollo, the Earl of Strathallan, and several others of rank were all discharged.

Commissioners, for inquiring into the forfeited estates, had been appointed some time by the Parliament. They had managed their inquiry with great application, but had met with great difficulties and obstructions from the creditors of the attainted persons, who, by the ordinary course of justice, were in possession of the estates. The Lords of Session had also, at the petition of some persons, pretending to be creditors, sequestered all the most considerable forfeited estates, and appointed factors with power to distrain tenants for non-payment of rents, on behalf of those creditors. These factors, or receivers, representing, that they acted by the authority of the Court of Session, absolutely refused, though ordered by the Commissioners, either to pay the rents into the Exchequer, or to give security for so doing. In vain did the Commissioners appoint Receivers, as they could not give them a power to distrain. Nor would the Court of Session, upon the petition of the Commissioners, recall the sequestrations (1). The Barons of the Exchequer were next applied to, but they likewise refused to comply with the Commissioners, upon which they ordered all the monies, arisen from the sale of the personal estates, into the Receiver-General of Scotland.

The yearly value of the real estates, of which the Commissioners had perfected the survey, amounted to 29694 l. 6 s. 8 d. sterling, per annum, as appeared by their report, which was published in July, by order of the House of Lords (2).

The Commissioners in England did not meet with so much difficulty, by whose report (which was also printed) the annual rents of the forfeited estates in England and Ireland amounted in the whole to 47626 l. 18 s. 5 d. ³. The improved rents of estates on lives, after the lives were expired, they computed at 4798 l. 6 s. 3 d. (3).

As

King James I., and were reduced. But, on King James's death, they took up arms again, not so much on any State account, as to plunder the Low-Lands, and injure the Country; whereupon a remarkable act passed against them. By this act they were all at the age of sixteen to appear before the Privy Council, and give surety for their good behaviour; and, in order to their extirpation, no Ministers, within the bounds of the Highlands, were to baptize any male-child, with the name of Grigor, or Macgregor. The famous Rob. Roy, head of this Clan, being in the Rebellion, occasioned perhaps the exception, by which the whole family of the Macgregors were excluded the benefit of the Act of Grace.

(1) These sequestrations were founded upon the words of the act for encouraging superiors, &c. ⁴ That no conviction or attainer shall exclude the right of any creditor remaining peaceable, for security of any just debts contracted before the commission of any of the aforesaid crimes.⁵ As these words seemed only to import, that, the creditors should be paid their just debts, the Commissioners submitted the matter to the Lords. Whether the payment of these debts was not better provided for by paying the rents into the Exchequer, for the benefit of the public and creditors, according to the express direction of the Act of Parliament, than by suffering the growing rents to remain at the disposal of the Receivers, who being the Trustees friends, and agents of the forfeiting persons, were like to injure both the public, and the creditors.

As the King resolved not to go into Germany this year, the Household removed to Hampton-Court, where he resided for the summer.

At the close of the Session, the following alterations and promotions were made: Mr. Stanhope, first Commissioner of the Treasury, was created Baron of Elvaſton, and Viſcount of Maſon; the Earl of Suffolk, Mr. Chetwynd, Sir Charles Cook, Mr. Dominique, Mr. Moleſworth, Mr. Pelham, Mr. Daniel Pulney, and Mr. Bladen, were appointed Commiſſioners of trade; Lord Cadogan was made General of all the forces in England; and Mr. Boſcawen Vice-Treafurer of Ireland, of which Kingdom the following perſons were made Peers: Trevor Hill, Viſcount Hilborough; Sir Thomas Southwel, Viſcount Southwel; Walter Chetwynd, Viſcount Fitzbarding; Alan Broderick, Viſcount Middleton; Lord Hamilton of Straſb Allan, Viſcount Beyn; John Allen, Viſcount of Kildare. Coniers & Arcey, brother to the Earl of Holderneſs, was removed from his employment of Gentleman of the Horſe, and one of the Commiſſioners for executing the office of Maſter of the Horſe. The Earl of Leiſeſter was appointed Conſtable of Dover-Caſtle, and Warden of the Cinque-Ports, in the room of the Earl of Dorſet; and the Duke of Portland was made one of the Lords of the Beſchamber.

Prince Eugene deſigns the Turkſe Belgrade, Aug. 5. Hilt. Reg.

Whilst the King was at Hampton Court, Count Volkra, the Imperial Miniſter, brought him the news of Prince Eugene's victory over the Turks at Belgrade. Prince Eugene, having aſſembled the Imperial army, before the Turks could draw their forces together, reſolved to beſiege Belgrade: To this end he marched his army over the Teyſſe, upon a bridge of boats laid for that purpoſe, and poſted himſelf on the other ſide of the Danube, in ſight of that fortrefs: This unexpected paſſage ſtruck the Infidels into ſuch a conſternation, that their troops ran away in the utmoſt confuſion, while the reſt of the Imperial army paſſed the Danube likewiſe over a bridge, that was laid with all poſſible diligence. The place was immediately inveſted, and lines of circumvallation and contravallation were made from the Save to the Danube, by which means the Imperial camp became ſo ſtrong, that it ſeemed as if one fortrefs had laid ſiege to another. This precaution had its effect; for, when the main army of the Turks was advanced to relieve Belgrade, they found the Beſiegers ſo ſtrongly intrenched, that they were under a neceſſity of opening trenches to approach their lines: But Prince Eugene had taken his meaſures ſo well before-hand, that, when the Ottoman army appeared, though they were much more numerous and formidable than could be believed, he was in a condition to expect them in his intrenchments, without diſcontinuing his attacks. It was undoubtedly a very extraordinary ſight, to ſee two ſieges at once, and even the Beſiegers themſelves beſieged; the place being ſhut up on all ſides by the Imperial army; and the Imperial army ſhut up on one ſide between two great rivers, and on the other between a town, defended by a ſtrong garriſon, and the enemy's camp ſtrongly intrenched: Thus there was a neceſſity either to conquer or periſh, and the leaſt falſe ſtep would have decided it. But, when things ſeemed reduced to this dangerous criſis, Prince Eugene, inſtead of waiting to be attacked in his intrenchments, marched out of them, and attacked the Turks in theirs, with ſo great bravery and conduct, that he gained a moſt compleat victory, over their almoſt innumerable forces, which was followed the next day by the ſurrender of Belgrade, the key of the Ottoman Empire.

Mean while, the great preparations, the Spaniards were making by ſea and land, drew the attention of all Europe. When the Emperor ſent his army into Hungary againſt the Turks, who had invaded the Dominions of the Venetians his Allies, the Pope, to whom wars of that kind are always agreeable, obtained repeated aſſurances from the King of Spain, both by letters, and by declarations from his Ambaſſador at Rome, That he would not undertake any thing againſt the intereſts of the Emperor, whilit his arms ſhould be employed in ſo religious a cauſe; and would even aid the Venetians with a ſquadron of men of war and gallies. For which purpoſe he obtained from the Court of Rome an Indulto, for raiſing a ſubſidy of two millions and a half on the Eccleſiaſtical revenues in the Indies; and another for five hundred thouſand ducats on the eſtates of the Clergy in Spain. Accordingly, the King of Spain ſent out the laſt year a ſmall ſquadron of ſix men of war and five gallies, 1717. galleys, which arrived too late in the Levant, to be of any service to the Venetians, who had before sustained a naval fight with the Turks, and had almost finished the operations of the campaign. But this year the preparations in Spain were so extraordinary, as gave a jealousy, that, instead of sending assistance to the Venetians, the Spaniards had a design to make some conquest themselves on the Emperor's Dominions in the Mediterranean. The event justified the suspicion. A strong squadron of men of war, with about nine thousand land-forces, commanded by the Marquis de Lede, sailed from Barcelona the 20th of July, and, landing at Cagliari in Sardinia, made a speedy and entire conquest of that Island which belonged to the Emperor, and was in no good condition of defence.

Spain attacked the Emperor.

During this expedition, the Marquis of Grimaldo, Secretary of State at Madrid, sent a letter to the Spanish Ministers in foreign Courts, to be published as a manifesto or declaration of the reasons of those proceedings, the substance of which was: 'That all Europe, as well as himself, might well be surprised to find the military preparations of his Master, which were designed to second the efforts of the Christian army according to promises made to the Pope thereupon, on a sudden turned against that very power, in the attack of Sardinia; but that, as he had opportunity of learning the reasons of such a conduct from his Majesty's own mouth, he thought fit to communicate the same, to be, That though his Majesty had born with great magnanimity the sacrifice of many of his territories to the public tranquillity by the late peace; upon the presumption that such a condescension would secure the repose of a Nation, whose good fortune was not answerable to its virtue; yet as the Arch-Duke, contrary to the faith of treaties, encouraged and supported the desertion of his subjects in Catalonia, by frequent succours from Naples, and other places, and seemed, by all his measures, resolved on all opportunities of giving him disquiet in his Dominions; his Majesty had looked upon the war with the Turks to have opened to him a gate of revenge, in recovering those territories which had been usurped from him by the Arch-Duke. That all overtures of pacification on his Majesty's side, had rather inflamed the Arch-Duke's conduct in his prejudice; and that because declarations had been published in many parts of Europe, injurious to his Majesty's honour and dignity, and particularly because the great Inquisitor of Spain had been seized, though furnished with his Holiness's passport, and in despite to that authority, necessary to support the due regards of his subjects; his Majesty was resolved to employ those forces in a lawful revenge, which were at first designed against the enemies of the Arch-Duke (1). These reasons did not appear satisfactory: For whatever, unfairness had been practised by the Emperor, it was long before the King of Spain's promise, not to molest the Emperor whilst he was at war with the Turks. And the detention of a single subject was too weak a ground for a proceeding of such violence. However, the King of Spain promised (by the Marquis Beretti Landi, his Ambassador at the Hague) to proceed no further against the Emperor, and to suspend all operations, in order to give time and opportunity to the powers of Europe to think of expedients for reconciling their differences, and securing the tranquillity and balance of power in Italy. The Marquis also complimented the King of Great-Britain and the States, with the arbitration of that important affair.

King George and the Regent of France were England not only guarantees of the neutrality of Italy, and France but the King was moreover engaged in a defensive Alliance with the Emperor. Pursuant therefore to the King of Spain's promise, they concerted measures in conjunction with the Imperial Minister, for an accommodation between the Emperor and King Philip, on such terms as should be equally advantageous and honourable to both, supply the defects of the treaties of Utrecht and Baden, and establish, on a more solid basis, the tranquillity of Europe; with a resolution of compelling by force that party, which should refuse to accede to those stipulations, and obstruct the general good. The Abbot du Bois came to London, the Lord Stanhope was sent to Madrid, and the Lord Cadogan to the Hague. These Negotiations gave birth to the famous treaty, called the Quadruple Alliance, which was concluded the next year. It was agreed, that the Emperor should renounce all pretensions to the Crown of Spain (a point King Philip had much at heart) and part with Sardinia to the Duke of Savoy, in lieu of which the Duke was to surrender Sicily to the Emperor. The Succession to the Duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, which the Queen of Spain (of the House of Farnese) claimed by inheritance, in default of male-issue, was to be settled on her eldest son: The King of Spain, not being satisfied with this partition, continued to make very formidable preparations by sea and land, without any regard to the admonitions of England and France. Upon which King George ordered a strong squadron of ships of war to be fitted out, as will presently be seen.

Before the Parliament met, the following incident happened. The Earl of Peterborough, of Peterborough, whether with a design only to travel, as was given out, or charged with some secret Negotiation, was gone into Italy. Before his departure, he had conferred with the Duke of Marlborough, and at Paris had talked with the Duke of Orleans: He was said to carry with him larger remittances than was usual for travellers, even of his rank. The Pretender was then at Urbino, where he had notice sent him from St. Germain to be upon his guard, there being a design to destroy him. He gave information of it to Rome, and Pope Clement XI. sent orders to all places

(1) The King of Spain had not yet acknowledged him for Emperor.

At the same time, the Cardinal Paulucci, Secretary of State to the Pope, wrote a circular letter to clear his Holiness from the imputation of any collusion in that affair, by greatly enlarging upon the resentment with which he treated so perfidious a breach of promise in his Catholic Majesty, not to fall upon any of the Dominions of the Emperor during his war with the Turks, and for the performance of which his Holiness had engaged in the most solemn manner.

1717. places round Urbino to examine all foreigners, especially English, and seize such as should be suspected.

The Earl of Peterborough came at that very time to Bologna with a few armed followers. He was immediately seized with his papers, and confined to Fort Urbino, and his people sent to prison. His papers were examined, but, nothing being found against him, he was himself interrogated. He said, he was come to pass some time in Italy for the benefit of the air, and that his people were armed for his defence. He was close confined for a month, and no person suffered to speak with him. He was at length set at liberty with all possible civilities, and afterwards had an authentic reparation for the insult, the Cardinal Minister having declared, that he had been seized unadvisedly, and without sufficient cause. The news of the Earl of Peterborough's confinement was highly resented by the people in England, but the King was content with demanding and receiving reparation for the affront. The Pope agreed to write with his own hand a letter to an Ally of Great Britain, by which he would declare, that the Legate of Bologna had violently and unjustly, without the knowledge of his Holiness, caused the Earl of Peterborough to be seized upon suspicions, which proved to be ill-grounded; that then the Cardinal Paulucci, Secretary of State, and the Cardinal Legate of Bologna, should send each a declaration to the English Admiral in the Mediterranean; the first to shew the Pope's disavowal, and the other to assure him, that, out of complaisance to his friends, and upon unjust suspicions, he had ordered a Peer of Great Britain to be apprehended on his travels, for which he had begged the Pope's pardon, and desired his Britannic Majesty's. This letter and these declarations were accordingly sent, and are preserved, to shew the Earl of Peterborough's innocence, and the falsity of the suspicions.

A difference between the King and the Prince.

On the 2d of November, the Princess of Wales was delivered of a Prince, at St. James's, and the King two days after paid her a visit, and returned to Hampton Court. The young Prince was baptized the 28th of the same month, and died not long after. This Baptism occasioned an unhappy difference between the King and the Prince. It seems, the Prince had designed the Duke of York, Bishop of Osnaburg, the King's Brother, to be one of the Godfathers, and had reason to believe the King was satisfied with his choice. But, when the ceremony came to be performed, the Duke of Newcastle stood Godfather with the King, not as proxy for, or representing the Duke of York, but for himself, and in his own name and person. This the Prince took ill of the Duke, not as he acted in obedience to his Majesty's command, but as if the Duke had done, or at least seemed officious to do, something which he was not commanded. This proceeding sensibly touched the Prince, and raised his indignation to that degree, that he could not help shewing it; but, as soon as the ceremony was over, spoke some warm words to the Duke, expressing his resentment at what he had done. Upon report of these words to the King, his Majesty thought fit to give a sudden mark of his displeasure, by sending his commands to the Prince to keep his own apartment till his pleasure was farther known; to which he immediately submitted: Soon after this his Majesty's farther pleasure was signified to the Prince, that he should leave St. James's; accordingly he quitted the Palace, the Princess going along with him, and retired to the house of the Earl of Granham, in Albemarle-Street; but the children, by the King's order, remained at St. James's. Soon after this, his Majesty's pleasure was signified to all the Peers and Peeresses of Great Britain and Ireland, and to all Privy-Counsellors and their Wives, that all persons, who should go to see the Prince and Princess of Wales, should forbear coming into his Majesty's presence. Besides, such, as had employments under the King and Prince both, were obliged to quit the service of one of them.

Soon after this difference, there was printed in the Amsterdam Gazette a letter in French, said to be written by one of the Secretaries of State to the foreign Ministers, dated at Whitehall, Decemb. 14, 1717, giving an account of the whole affair, of which the Author of the Critic (a weekly paper) published a translation (1).

The Parliament met the 21st of November, Third Session of K. George's Fifth Parliament. and the King came to the House of Peers with the usual solemnities. His speech had been prepared with great care, by reason of the importance of the occasion.

(1) The letter was as follows:

S I R,

His Majesty having been informed that several reports, for the most part ill grounded, are spread abroad concerning what has lately passed in the Royal Family, he has ordered me to send you the inclosed account of it.

As soon as the young Prince was born, the King caused himself to be informed of what was wont to be observed in the like cases in this Kingdom, in regard to the ceremony of Baptism; and having found by the records, that, when it was a Boy, and the King was Godfather, it was the custom for him to nominate, for second Godfather, one of the principal Lords of his Court, who for the most part was the Lord Chamberlain; he named for this function the Duke of Newcastle, who now bears that charge; naming at the same time for Godmother the Dutchess of St. Albans, first Lady of Honour to the Princess. Nevertheless, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales conceived such a dislike at this, that on Thursday last, after the solemnity of the Baptism was over, finding himself no longer master of his temper, he drew near to the Duke of Newcastle, and gave him very reproachful words, upon supposition that he had solicited that honour in spite of him: The King was still in the chamber, but not near enough to hear what the Prince said to the Duke. This last thinking himself obliged to inform the King of it, and the Prince having confessed the matter to the Dukes of Kingslon, Kent, and Roxburgh (whom his Majesty sent to him the next day upon this occasion) his Majesty ordered him by a second message, not to go out of his own apartment till further order: On Saturday the Prince wrote a letter to the King, and the next day (Sunday) another: But, his Majesty not finding them satisfactory, and having besides other reasons of discontent at several steps the Prince had taken, he caused him to be told yesterday in the afternoon, by his Vice-Chamberlain Mr. Cooke, that he should be gone from the Palace of St. James's; and to the Princess, that she might continue in the Palace as long as she thought convenient; but that, as for the Princesses her daughters, and the young Prince, the King

1717 tance of the matters he had to speak of, and was attended with the expected success. The speech was as follows :

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I AM very glad I have been able to bring the sitting of Parliament into a more proper and usual season of the year. I hope, such an early meeting will not only be a benefit to the public, but a convenience to your private affairs.

" As I have always had at heart the security and ease of my people, so I never kept up any troops, but for their protection, and have taken every opportunity to disband as many as I thought consistent with their safety. I have reduced the army to very near one half, since the beginning of the last Session of Parliament, and lessened them to such a number, as will neither be a burden to my good subjects, nor an encouragement to our enemies to insult them.

" You cannot but be sensible of the many attempts, which have been set on foot to disturb the peace of Europe, and of these Kingdoms. They only pretend not to see, who are not afraid of them. But, as no application has been wanting, on my part, to preserve the public tranquillity, I have the pleasure to find my good offices have not been altogether unsuccessful, and have reason to hope they will, in the end, have their full and desired effect.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" I question not, but you are very well pleased to find, that your endeavours for lessening the national debts have, at the same time, raised the public credit; and that whatever was proposed, for that end, is actually and completely effected. This success must chiefly be attributed to that just and prudent regard you have shewn to Parliamentary engagements.

" It was with a view of procuring and settling a lasting tranquillity, that I demanded the extraordinary Supply, which you granted me last Session. The credit, which this confidence reposed in me hath given us abroad, has already been so far effectual, that I can acquaint you, we have a much better prospect than we had. I have ordered an account to be laid before you of the very small part of that Supply, which, as yet, has been expended. Any further issues, that may be made of it, shall be laid before you. And you may be assured, that every part of it shall either be employed for your service, or saved to the public.

" I have ordered to be laid before you a state of the deficiencies of the present year, and the several estimates for the service of the next, which you will find considerably diminished. I rely upon your making the necessary provision for them; not doubting of the continuance of that zeal for the good of your Country, which hath been so eminently conspicuous in every Session of this Parliament.

" I cannot, in justice, avoid putting you in mind, that several arrears of pay and subsidy, incurred before my Accession to the Crown, are claimed by foreign Princes and States. I shall order them to be laid before you, to the end you may put them in a method of being examined and stated; which will very much tend to the honour and credit of the Nation.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I could heartily wish, that at a time, when the common enemies of our Religion are, by all manner of artifices, endeavouring to undermine and weaken it; both at home and abroad, all those, who are friends to our present happy Establishment, might unanimously concur in some proper method for the greater strengthening the Protestant Interest; of which, as the Church of England is unquestionably the main support and bulwark, so will she reap the principal benefit of every advantage accruing by the union and mutual charity of all Protestants.

" As none can recommend themselves more effectually to my favour and countenance, than by a sincere zeal for the just rights of the Crown, and the liberties of the people; so I am determined to encourage all those, who act agreeably to the constitution of these my Kingdoms, and consequently to the principles, on which my Government is founded.

" The eyes of all Europe are upon you at this critical juncture. It is your interest; for which reason, I think it is mine, that my endeavours for procuring the peace and quiet of Christendom should take effect. Nothing can so much contribute to this desirable end, as the unanimity, dispatch, and vigour of your resolutions for the support of my Government."

This speech, as it appears, was worded with great caution, particularly with regard to the army, and the Protestant Dissenters. The King, by saying he had so lessened the troops, that they would neither burthen his subjects nor encourage his enemies, prevented any intended addresses for a farther reduction. His wishing that all the friends of the Establishment would concur in some method for strengthening the Protestant interest, tended to the repeal of the severe laws made in the last reign against the Dissenters, which had been prevented by the commotions in the Kingdom, and which he thought might be accomplished this Session. He had, ever since his Accession, declared for Toleration, and seems here to promise his favour and countenance to such as should be of his mind.

The

King would have them remain with him in the Palace, and that the Princess should be permitted to see them as often as she desired it. However, the Princess, being unwilling to leave the Prince her Husband, went with him to the house of the Earl of Grantham her Lord-Chamberlain, where their Royal Highnesses lay last night.

The Lords
address.

The Lords without any debate voted an address, in which they thanked the King for disbanding so many troops, and for his unwearied application towards settling the peace of Europe, assuring him, that nothing should be wanting on their parts towards supporting him with the utmost zeal and vigour, till his endeavours had the desired effect. They concluded with saying, 'We have a grateful sense of your Majesty's concern for the Protestant Religion, and the Church of England, as by law established; which, as it has always been the chief of the Protestant Churches, so it can never be so well supported, as by strengthening and uniting (as far as may be) the Protestant interest.'

The Commons
address.

An address of thanks was also voted by the Commons, but not without some debates. It was moved by the High-Church party, that the King's general expression, to concur in some proper method for the greater strengthening the Protestant interest, should be thus softened, to concur in the most effectual methods for strengthening the Protestant interest of these Kingdoms, as far as the laws now in force will permit. But this motion was rejected, and the address passed as it had been drawn up; wherein, after having thanked the King for bringing the sitting of Parliament into a more proper season of the year, and assured him of their endeavours to answer his gracious intentions, by improving their early meeting (as much as they were able) to the public benefit, they expressed their lively sense of his concern for the welfare of the people by the reductions he had made from time to time of the land-forces. 'It is (say they) our peculiar happiness to see ourselves governed by a Sovereign, who is not influenced by any notions of greatness that are inconsistent with the prosperity of his subjects, and who proposes to himself the ease of his people, as the chief glory of his Reign.'

We acknowledge, with hearts full of duty and gratitude, your Majesty's unwearied endeavours to prevent the many attempts which have been set on foot to disturb the peace of Europe, and the quiet of these Kingdoms; and have the more reason to apprehend the ill consequences of such attempts, since there are those, who, as they would be thought to see no danger in them, give us reason to believe, that they would not be troubled at their success.'

Proceedings of the Commons.

This approbation of the King's sentiments was followed with assurances of most effectually supporting him in such measures as he should judge necessary, and of cheerfully granting such Supplies as the public service should require. Concluding, 'It is a pleasure to us, that the eyes of all Europe are turned upon us at this critical juncture, since we have thereby an opportunity of shewing the world the just confidence we repose in your Majesty, and our unshaken resolutions to support your Government, in such a manner as shall enable your Majesty to settle the peace of Christendom.'

The Commons began with fulfilling their promise concerning the Supplies. Estimates and accounts were called for, to see what was wanted to settle the establishment of the army, navy, and ordnance as usual. Ten thousand men, at 4*l.* a month each, were voted for the sea-service; and 224,857*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* was granted for the ordinary of the navy.

When the motion for a Supply for the army 1717. was made, it was opposed by Mr. Shippen, Sir Debates William Wyndham, and others. Mr. Walpole, about the army, made a speech that lasted above an hour, wherein, Dec. 4. besides the common topic of the danger of a standing army in a free Nation, he insisted on four principal points: '1. That whereas they were given to understand, that the army was reduced to sixteen thousand and odd men, it still consisted of about eighteen thousand, which was one third part more than the number of land forces in Great-Britain amounted to formerly in time of peace. 2. That there was no due proportion observed, either between the number of the horse, dragoons, and foot, or between the number of the officers and soldiers, that were kept standing, inasmuch that, of about 11000*l.* which the pay of a reduced regiment of foot amounts to, near 7000*l.* goes toward the pay of the Officers, and 4000*l.* only to the private soldiers. 3. That the keeping up so great a number of Officers was, in effect, the maintaining of an army almost double of what was intended, since the soldiers, that were wanting to complete the Companies and Regiments, might be raised with a drum, in twice four and twenty hours. 4. That the pay of General Officers, which amounted to above 20000*l.* was an expence altogether needless, and unprecedented, in time of peace.' Mr. Craggs, Secretary of War, answered Mr. Walpole, and observed, in general, 'That, in all wise Governments, the security of the State is the rule chiefly to be regarded; and that his Majesty, both in the augmentation, and the reduction of his forces, had not only consulted the safety but likewise the ease of his people. That, though, as was suggested, the Nation paid, at present, near eighteen thousand men, yet there were only sixteen thousand three hundred forty seven, who could give any jealousy, unless some people should think our liberties in danger from the Chaplains, Surgeons, Widows of Officers, and such inoffensive persons, who were included in the first number. That therefore there were not much above four thousand men more now in Great Britain, than there were kept up after the peace of Ryswick; which number must be thought very moderate by all, who wish well to the present happy Settlement, considering, that the embers of an unnatural Rebellion lately extinguished, were still warm, and the discontents industriously fomented by the enemies of the Government. That the Parliament had ever contented themselves with fixing the number of forces, that were thought necessary to be maintained; but had left to the Crown the manner of reducing and modeling that number. And therefore, if they should now do otherwise, it would be but an indifferent return to that gracious and tender regard, which, on all occasions, his Majesty had shewn to the security and ease of his subjects. That, after all, it was no less a piece of justice than matter of prudence, to keep up as great a number of Officers as possible; for, besides the occasion, which this Nation may have for them for the future, it was but reasonable to acknowledge the past eminent services of Gentlemen, who, having been brought up to no other trade but war, had no other way to subsist and provide for themselves and families. Mr. Craggs was supported by 1717. by several Members, particularly Sir David Dalrymple, who declared for keeping up sixteen thousand men at least one year longer, urging, 'That the discontents ran still as high in Scotland, as before the late Rebellion; of which he alledged several reasons. But Mr. Walpole and others were, on the contrary, of opinion, that twelve thousand men were sufficient. The debate having lasted some hours, the question was going to be put, Whether the number should be sixteen thousand, or twelve thousand, when Mr. Shippen made a speech, in which, among many other vehement expressions, he said, 'That the second paragraph of the King's speech seemed rather to be calculated for the meridian of Germany than Great-Britain: And that it was a great misfortune, that the King was a stranger to our language and constitution.' These reflections gave great offence to several Members, and Mr. Lechmere urged, 'That the same was a scandalous invective against the King's Person and Government, of which the House ought to shew the highest resentment; and therefore moved, that the Member, who spoke those offensive words, should be sent to the Tower.' Upon which Mr. Walpole said, 'That, if the words in question were spoken by the Member, on whom they were charged, the Tower was too light a punishment for his rashness: But, as what had been said in the heat of this debate might have been misunderstood, he was for allowing him the liberty of explaining himself.' But Mr. Shippen not thinking proper either to retract or excuse what he had said, he was voted to the Tower by a majority of one hundred and seventy-five against eighty-one.

The next day it was resolved, that the guards and garrisons in Great-Britain should be sixteen thousand three hundred and forty-seven effective men, and that the sum of £81,618 l. should be granted for their maintenance: That 130,361 l. 5 s. 5 d. should be given for the half-pay of the reduced Officers. After this was settled as usual the pay of the forces in America, and the garrisons of Gibraltar and Port-Mabon. When these resolutions were reported, several of them were debated. The pay of the army was reduced to 650,000 l. by a majority of fourteen voices only, one hundred and seventy-two against one hundred and fifty-eight. The sum for the half-pay Officers was reduced to 94,000 l. (1).

An attempt was made this Session to lower the value of guineas. Mr. Aylmer having taken notice of the great scarcity of the silver coin, occasioned chiefly by the exportation of silver, and importation of gold, proposed, that a speedy remedy might be put to the growing evil, by lowering the value of gold species. Upon this the King was addressed for the representations made by the Officers of the Mint to the Treasury, in relation to the gold and silver coins. Accordingly Mr. Lowndes presented to the House several papers relating to the coins, and particularly Sir Isaac Newton's representation to the Lords of the Treasury (2). Then Mr. Aylmer renewed his motion, and was seconded by Mr. Caswell, who made a long speech on the various values, which, at different times, gold and

(1) At the same time the following regulations were agreed to:

I. That no person shall be intitled to half-pay, who was a minor under the age of sixteen years at the time when the regiment, troop, or company in which he served was reduced. II. That no person shall be intitled to half-pay, except such persons who did actual service in some regiment, troop, or company. III. That no person, having any other place or employment of profit, civil or military, under his Majesty, shall be intitled to half-pay. IV. That no Chaplain of any garrison or regiment, who has an ecclesiastical benefice, or other preferment in Great-Britain or Ireland, shall be intitled to half-pay. V. That no person shall be intitled to half-pay, who hath resigned his Commission, and has had no Commission since. VI. That no half-pay shall be allowed to any person by virtue of any warrant and appointment, except to such persons who would have been otherwise intitled to the same as reduced Officers. VII. That half-pay shall not be allowed to any of the Officers of the five regiments of dragoons, and eight regiments of foot, lately disbanded in Ireland, except to such as were taken off the establishment of half-pay in Great-Britain.

(2) This representation, being reckoned a curious piece, is here inserted at large:

In obedience to your Lordships order of reference August 12, that I should lay before your Lordships a state of the gold and silver coins of this Kingdom in weight and fineness, and the value of gold in proportion to silver, with my observations and opinion, and what method may be best for preventing the melting down of the silver coin; I humbly represent, that a pound weight Troy of gold, 11 ounces fine, and 1 ounce alloy, is cut into 44 half guineas; and a pound weight of silver, 11 ounces 2 penny weight fine, and 18 penny weights alloy, is cut into 62 shillings; and, according to this rate, a pound weight of fine gold is worth 15 pounds weight, 6 ounces, 17 penny weight, and 5 grains of fine silver, reckoning a guinea at 1 l. 1 s.

Numb. XCIII. Vo l. IV.

6 d. in silver money. But silver in bullion exportable is usually worth 2 d. or 3 d. per ounce more than in coin. And, if at a medium such bullion of standard alloy be valued at 5 s. 4 d. half-penny per ounce, a pound weight of fine gold will be worth 14 pounds weight, 11 ounces, 12 penny weight, 9 grains of fine silver in bullion. And at this rate a guinea is worth but so much silver as would make 20 s. 8 d. When ships are laden for the East-Indies, the demand of silver for exportation raises the price to 5 s. 6 d. or 5 s. 8 d. per ounce, or above; but I consider not those extraordinary cases.

A Spanish pistole was coined for 32 reas, or 4 pieces of eight reas, usually called pieces of eight, and is of equal alloy, and the 16th part of the weight thereof. And a Doppio Moeda of Portugal was coined for ten crusados of silver, and is of equal alloy, and the 16th part of the weight thereof; gold is therefore in Spain and Portugal of sixteen times more value than silver of equal weight and alloy, according to the standard of those Kingdoms; at which rate, a guinea is worth 22 s. 1 d. But this high price keeps their gold at home in good plenty, and carries away the Spanish silver into all Europe; so that at home they make their payments in gold, and will not pay in silver without a premium. Upon the coming in of a plate-fleet, the premium ceases, or is but small; but, as their silver goes away and becomes scarce, the premium increases, and is most commonly about 6 per cent. which being abated, a guinea becomes worth about 20 s. 9 d. in Spain and Portugal.

In France, a pound weight of fine gold is reckoned worth 15 pounds weight of fine silver; in raising or falling their money, their King's edicts have sometimes varied a little from this proportion, in excess or defect; but the variations have been so little, that I do not here consider them. By the edict of May 1709, a new pistole was coined for 4 new Lewises, and is of equal alloy, and the 15th part of the weight thereof, except the errors of their Mints. And by the same edict fine gold is valued at fifteen times its weight of fine silver, and 1717-18. and silver coins have borne, with respect one with another, according to the plenty or scarcity of either; he suggested, That the over-valuation of gold, in the current coins of Great-Britain, had occasioned the exportation of great quantities of silver species; and, to that purpose, laid open a clandestine trade, which of late years had been carried on by the Dutch, Hamburgers, and other foreigners, in concert with the Jews, and other traders here, which consisted in exporting silver coins, and importing gold in lieu thereof, which being coined into guineas at the Tower, near fifteen pence was got by every guinea, which amounted to about 5 per cent. and, as these returns might be made five or six times in a year, considerable sums were thereby got, to the prejudice of Great-Britain, who thereby was drained of silver, and over-stocked with gold: Concluding, That, in his opinion, the most effectual way to put a stop to this pernicious trade, was to lower the price of guineas, and all other gold species.

This speech was received with applause, and an address was voted, and presented to the King, for a Proclamation to forbid all persons to utter or receive guineas at a higher rate than one and twenty shillings for each guinea. Pursuant to this address the Proclamation was issued the next day, after which the Commons adjourned till the 13th of January.

The lowering the value of gold, which was thought a proper expedient to procure a greater circulation of silver species, had, during the recess, a contrary effect, either, as was supposed, through the covetousness of some monied men, who hoarded up silver, in hopes that the same would be raised; or out of fear that gold would still be lowered; or through the malice of the disaffected, who, by the same method, thought, if not to distress the Government, at least to raise murmurings against it among the common people, upon account of the stop which was thereby put to petty trade. In order therefore to remedy this great evil, as soon as the Commons met, they came to a resolution, 'That this House will not alter the standard of the gold and silver coins of this Kingdom in fineness, weight, and denomination: The Lords came also to the same resolution, and ordered a bill to be brought in to prevent the melting down of the silver coin.

Upon a message delivered to the Lords by the Lord Chancellor, and to the Commons by Mr. Comptroller, both Houses adjourned for a few days. It was generally believed this adjournment was occasioned by some measures that were then taken, in order to reconcile the Royal Family, which not having the desired effect, it was expected the King would, on the day of meeting, have come to the House of Peers, and acquainted the Parliament with some matters of importance; but the Court took another course, and at this rate a guinea is worth 20 s. 8 d. half-penny. I consider not here the confusion made in the monies in France, by frequent edicts to send them to the Mint, and give the King a tax out of them. I consider the value only of gold and silver in proportion to one another.

The ducats of Holland, and Hungary, and the Empire, were lately current in Holland among the common people in their markets and ordinary affairs, at 5 guilders in specie, and 5 stivers, and commonly changed for so much silver monies in three guilder pieces, and guilder pieces as guineas are with us for 1 s. 6 d. sterling; at which rate a guinea is worth 20 s. 7 d. half-penny.

According to the rates of gold to silver in Italy, Germany, Poland, Denmark, and Sweden, a guinea is worth about 20 s. and 7 d. 6 d. 5 d. or 4 d. for the proportion varies a little within the several Governments in those Countries. In Sweden, gold is lowest in proportion to silver, and this hath made that Kingdom, which formerly was content with copper money, abound of late with silver, sent thither (I suspect) for naval store.

In the end of King William's Reign, and the first year of the late Queen, when foreign coins abounded in England, I caused a great many of them to be assayed in the Mint, and found by the assays, that fine gold was to fine silver in Spain, Portugal, France, Holland, Italy, Germany, and the Northern Kingdoms, in the proportions above-mentioned, errors of the Mints excepted.

In China and Japan, one pound weight of fine gold is worth but 9 or 10 pounds weight of fine silver; and, in East India, it may be worth 12. And this low price of gold in proportion to silver carries away the silver from all Europe.

So then, by the course of trade and exchange between Nation and Nation in all Europe, fine gold is to fine silver as 14 $\frac{1}{2}$, or 15 to one; and a guinea, at the same rate, is worth between 20 s. 5 d. and 20 s. 8 d. half-penny, except in extraordinary cases, as when a plate-silver is just arrived in Spain, or ships are laden here for the East Indies, which cases I do not here consider. And it appears by experience as well as by reason, that silver flows from those places where its value is lowest in proportion to gold, as from Spain to all Europe, and from all Europe to the East-Indies, China, and Japan; and that gold is most plentiful in those places, in which its value is highest in proportion to silver, as in Spain and England.

It is the demand for exportation which hath raised the price of exportable silver about 2 d. or 3 d. in the ounce above that of silver in coin, and hath thereby created a temptation to export or melt down the silver coin, rather than give 2 d. or 3 d. more for foreign silver; and the demand for exportation arises from the higher price of silver in other places than in England, in proportion to gold; that is, from the higher price of gold in England than in other places, in proportion to silver, and therefore may be diminished by lowering the value of gold in proportion to silver. If gold in England, or silver in East-India, could be brought down so low as to bear the same proportion to one another in both places, there would be here no greater demand for silver than for gold to be exported to India: And if gold were lowered only so as to have the same proportion to the silver money in England, which it hath to silver in the rest of Europe, there would be no temptation to export silver rather than gold to any other part of Europe: And to compass this last, there seems nothing more requisite, than to take off about 10 d. or 12 d. from the guinea, so that the gold may bear the same proportion to the silver-money in England, which it ought to do by the course of trade and exchange in Europe; but if only 6 d. were taken off at present, it would diminish the temptation to export or melt down the silver-coin, and by the effects would shew hereafter better than can appear at present, what further reduction would be most convenient for the public.

In the last year of King William, the dollars of Scotland, worth about 4 s. 6 d. half-penny, were put away in the North of England for 5 s. and at this price began to flow in upon us; I gave notice thereof to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and they ordered the Collectors of taxes to forbear taking them, and thereby put a stop to the mischief.

At the same time, the Lewidors of France, which were worth but 17 s. and three farthings apiece, passed 1717-18. course, to the great disappointment of some persons (1).

A design against the King's life by James Shephard About this time a design against the King's life was discovered. The Author of it seemed to be fitter for Bedlam than Newgate. His name was James Shephard, a youth of eighteen years, apprentice to a coach-maker in Devonshire-street. On the 24th of January, he came to the House of Mr. John Leake, a Nonjuring Clergyman, and, not finding him at home, left a letter with the maid, who delivered it to Mr. Leake's daughter. When Mr. Leake came home, the letter was given him, who, upon reading the superscription, found it directed for the Reverend Mr. Heath; upon which he doubted of its being for him; but being told by the maid, that it was left for him; and considering, that there was no such person as Mr. Heath, a Clergyman, in that neighbourhood, he opened the letter, and, having read it to himself, told his maid and daughter, it was a wicked and villainous letter, and then read it to them, and afterwards threw it into the fire. But, upon considering the matter, and suspecting that some person might have sent it, with a design to get his house searched, and fix an odium upon him, he went to Sir John Fryer, Alderman, the next morning, and acquainted him with the matter. Sir John advised him to secure the Writer of the letter, if he should call again at his house, as it seems he had promised to do. According to his promise he called again in three days, when 1717-18.

Mr. Leake asked him whether his name was James Shephard, and if he had left a letter for him on the Friday before? He answered in the affirmative; upon which he was seized and carried before Sir John Fryer; Shephard owned to him the bringing of the letter; and being asked, if he had a copy of it? he answered, he had no copy about him; but, if he had pen, ink, and paper, he could soon write one; which he did, and gave it to Sir John; who observing to him, that he had not put his name to it, he immediately subscribed it, affirming, that he believed it to be a true copy of the letter he had left at Mr. Leake's; and that if, at all, it differed only in some few words. The copy was as follows:

S I R,

'From the many discontents visible throughout this Kingdom, I infer, that, if the Prince now reigning could be by death removed, our King being here, he might be settled on his Throne without much loss of blood. For the more ready effecting of this, I propose, that if any Gentleman will pay for my passage into Italy, and if our friends will intrust one so young with letters of invitation to his Majesty, I will, on his arrival, smite the Usurper in his Palace. In this confusion, if sufficient forces may be raised, his Majesty may appear; if not he may retreat or conceal himself till a fitter opportunity.

Neither

fed in England for 17 s. 6 d. I gave notice thereof to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and his late Majesty put out a proclamation that they should go but at 17 s. and thereupon they came to the Mint, and 1400000 l. were coined out of them; and if the advantage of 5 d. one farthing a Lewidor sufficed, at that time, to bring into England so great a quantity of French money, and the advantage of three farthings in a Lewidor to bring it to the Mint, the advantage of 9 d. half-penny in a guinea, or above, may have been sufficient to bring the great quantity of gold which hath been coined in these last fifteen years, without any foreign silver.

Some years ago, the Portugal Moeders were received in the West of England at 28 s. apiece; upon notice from the Mint that they were worth only about 27 s. 7 d. the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury ordered their Receivers of taxes to take them at no more than 27 s. 6 d. Afterwards, many Gentlemen in the West sent up to the Treasury a petition, that the Receivers might take them again at 28 s. and promised to get returns for this money at that rate, alledging, that when they went at 28 s. their Country was full of gold, which they wanted very much: But the Commissioners of the Treasury considering, that at 28 s. the Nation would lose 5 d. apiece, rejected the petition. And, if an advantage to the Merchant of 5 d. in 28 s. did pour that money in upon us, much more hath an advantage to the Merchant of 9 d. half-penny in a guinea, or above, been able to bring into the Mint great quantities of gold without any foreign silver, and may be able to do still, till the cause be removed.

If things be let alone till silver money be a little scarcer, the gold will fall of itself; for people are already backward to give silver for gold, and will, in a little time, refuse to make payments in silver, without a premium, as they do in Spain, and this premium will be an abatement in the value of the gold: And so the question is, Whether gold shall be lowered by the Government, or let alone till it falls of itself, by the want of silver-money?

It may be said, that there are great quantities of silver in plate, and, if the plate were coined, there would be no want of silver-money: But I reckon that silver is safer from exportation in the form of plate than in the form of money, because of the greater value of the silver and fashion together; and therefore I am not for coining the plate, till the temptation to export the silver-money (which is a profit of 2 d. or 3 d. an ounce) be diminished: For, as often as men are necessitated to send away money for answering debts abroad, there will be a temptation to send away silver rather than gold, because of the profit, which is almost 4 per cent. And, for the same reason, Foreigners will chuse to send hither their gold rather than their silver.

All which is most humbly submitted to your Lordships great wisdom.

Mint-Office,
Sept. 21. 1717.

ISAAC NEWTON.

(1) The King consulted the Judges about some matters in dispute between Him and the Prince. He gave notice of it to the Prince, that he might send some persons to set forth and support his pretensions. His Royal Highness sent Sir Robert Raymond, Mr. Carter, Mr. Darnel, and Mr. Reynolds. The first point was, Whether the care of the education of the Royal Family belonged of right to the King? The Judges were most of them for the affirmative, alledging, besides other arguments, the example of King Charles II. who educated his two Nieces in the Protestant Religion, and married them to Protestant Princes against the will of the Duke of York, his Brother. They cited also the example of King William, who appointed Governors and Preceptors for the Duke of Gloucester, Son of the Princess Anne, presumptive heir of Great-Britain by the new establishment.

The other point was, Whether the King could retain for the maintenance of the Children some part of the hundred thousand pounds granted by Parliament to the Prince of Wales? The Judges were divided upon this point, but, however, in such a manner as seemed to favour the Prince. This consultation proved fruitless. The Prince and Princess stood their ground, and, though they left to the King the education of their Children, they refused to contribute towards the expense. The King made his Grandson, Prince Frederick, Duke of Gloucester, and formed the young Princesses Household.

(1) When

1717-18. pany crave leave to acknowledge; with the greatest sense of gratitude, the many marks of your Royal favour, which the Company have received, ever since your Majesty's happy Accession to the Crown: and in particular, the honour done them in becoming a Proprietor in their stock.

They therefore do, in the most humble and dutiful manner, beseech your Majesty will be graciously pleased to grant them the further honour of using your Royal Name for their Governor in the ensuing election.*

The King agreeing to their request, sent a message to the House of Commons, acquainting them, that, having condescended to permit himself to be chosen Governor of the South-Sea Company, he recommended it to the House to consider of proper methods to remove any difficulties that might arise on that occasion. Immediately a bill was brought in, and passed both Houses, enabling the King to be Governor, and exempting him from taking the usual oaths.

On the 3d of February, the King was unanimously chosen Governor by the whole Company, consisting of fifteen hundred and eighty-three persons. At the same time were chosen a Sub-Governor and Deputy-Governor. As every thing is influenced by party in England, the Whigs of the company had formed their plan, to chuse under the King Mr. Samuel Sheppard and Sir Theodore Janssen; but the Tories laid their measures so well, that Sir James Baleman, one of that party, was elected Sub-Governor, by a majority of nine hundred and eighty-three against six hundred, and the Whigs were forced to be satisfied with chusing Mr. Sheppard for Deputy-Governor.

One of the principal subjects of debate, this Session, was the bill for regulating the land-forces, and punishing mutiny and desertion. As the Court had occasion for their whole strength to carry this bill, care was taken that all the absent Members should be summoned, so that the House, when the bill was brought in, was more numerous than had been known for many years past. The debate ran chiefly upon the power of Courts-martial, to punish mutiny and desertion with death. Mr. Hutchinson began with urging, That a Court-Martial was never allowed of in England in a time of peace, as being inconsistent with the rights and liberties of a free people; and moved, that the offences committed by the soldiers be cognizable and punished by the Civil Magistrate. Mr. Hutchinson was seconded by Mr. Harley, who, to shew the danger of a standing army, governed by martial law, quoted, with great commendation, a book written by a noble member of that House, intitled, An account of Denmark. Upon this the Lord Moleworth (Author of that book) endeavoured to shew, that this was not a parallel case: That the present posture of affairs in Great-Britain was very different from the state of things in Denmark at that juncture; and that, the Commons having already declared it necessary to maintain standing forces; it was no less necessary to keep those forces within the bounds of duty and discipline by the ordinary rules of martial law, as was ever practised in all civilized Nations. General Lumley, and some others, were of Mr. Hutchinson's opinion; and, on the other hand, Sir Joseph Jekyll was for keeping up the martial law, at last, a year longer. But the main dispute was between Mr. Craigs and Mr. Walpole. After they had done speaking, Mr. Lechmere, who had been hitherto silent, rose up and spoke with great weight, particularly in answer to what Mr. Walpole, as well as Mr. Hutchinson, had advanced, that a Court-martial, in time of peace, was altogether unknown in England. He shewed; on the contrary, that the Court of Admiralty, which is allowed in times of peace, as well as of war, has an equal power in relation to seamen, with a Court-martial in relation to soldiers.

When the debate was over, and the question put, Whether Courts-martial should punish mutiny and desertion with death, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of eighteen voices only, two hundred and forty-seven against two hundred and twenty-nine. So that there were four hundred and seventy-six Members in the House, besides three Whigs, and six or seven Tories, who happened to be shut out when the question was put. The Abbot du Bois, the French Minister, having desired to be present at this debate, he was admitted incognito, a favour which, that day, had been refused to several Peers.

When the bill came to be read the last time, and the question put for passing it, there were a hundred and eighty-six votes for it, and but a hundred and five against it. This great majority was ascribed to Mr. Walpole's voting for it, and his having declared to his friends, 'That, tho', in the debate about the bill, he was for having mutiny and desertion punished by the Civil Magistrate, yet he had still rather those crimes should be punished by martial law than not at all.' The bill, having passed the Commons, was sent up to the Lords.

When the bill came before the Lords, it occasioned very warm debates, and many speeches were made on both sides, of which these are some of the most remarkable (1). The Lord Harcourt bill

Debates in the House of Lords about the mutiny bill
Pr. H. La

(1) When the bill was read the second time in a very full House, the Earl of Oxford began with saying, * That, as long as he had breath, he would speak for the liberties of his Country: and that he was not only against this bill, because he thought a Martial Court inconsistent with the rights and privileges of Englishmen, but also against the keeping up so great a number of forces; which, being altogether useless in a time of profound peace, could not but raise just apprehensions, that something was intended against our happy and ancient Constitution. To which it was answered, * That the Nation had the happiness to be governed by a Prince, who, since his Accession to the Throne, had convinced every body, that he desired no more troops than what were absolutely necessary for the safety and No. 93. Vol. IV.

tranquillity of his Dominions: That whoever would impartially and seriously consider the present circumstances of affairs, must own, that the number of troops that were kept standing was very small: That it could not be denied, that the Pretender had a great many friends both at home and abroad, who watched all opportunities to foment and take advantage of our intestine divisions: That, on the other hand, Great-Britain stood guarantee for the neutrality of Italy, which was then threatened with an Invasion: And therefore it was matter of prudence, as well as of necessity, to keep up a competent force, both to suppress any insurrection at home, or to repel any insult from abroad; and to make good our engagements for maintaining the repose of Europe. Hereupon a late Minister † said, He

1717-18. Harcourt spoke against the bill, and urged, among other things, 'That the Parliament, that is, the Representative of the whole Nation, were ever extreme jealous of the Legislative power, with which they are vested; and that the Lords, in a particular manner, ought to be tender of it; because it is a branch of their prerogative to be the supreme Court of Judicature; but that by this bill, whereby the King was enabled to establish Courts-martial, with power to try and determine any offences specified in the articles of war, the Parliament vested a sole Legislative power in the Crown, which was communicated and delegated to a Council of war. That this bill sets aside all other laws, both Civil and Ecclesiastical, in relation to the soldiery; and gives Courts-martial a larger jurisdiction than seemed necessary for maintaining discipline in the army; such jurisdiction extended not only to mutiny, desertion, and breach of duty, but also to all immoralities, and other offences, which might be committed by any officer or soldier, towards any of his fellow-subjects, whereby the law of the land might either be obstructed, or superseded by a Court-martial. That the Officers constituting a Court-martial did, at once, supply the place of Judges and Jurymen, and ought therefore to be upon their oath, upon their trying any offence whatsoever; whereas it is provided by this bill, that they shall be sworn, upon their trying such offences only as are punishable by death. That Martial Courts assume to themselves an arbitrary and unprecedented authority, of which they had a remarkable instance, an Ensign of the guards having been sentenced to death without being heard, which was contrary to Magna Charta, and to the birth-rights and privileges of Englishmen; and therefore they ought to refrain so dangerous a power.' On the other hand, the Lord Carteret said, 'That he had maturely considered the affair now in agitation; not as a person in a public station, but as a private unprejudiced man; and that he was convinced in his judgment and conscience, that it is necessary both for the support of the present happy Establishment, and the security of the Nation, to keep up the forces now on foot; and that he was confirmed in this opinion, by considering what thoughts the Pretender and his Friends had of this matter, and reflecting, that they have nothing more at heart, than to procure the disbanding of those forces, that have suppressed the late unnatural Rebellion. That he doubted not, but the whole body of the Nobility that made up that august Assembly, was inviolably attached to his Majesty King George: That his Majesty had also the best part of the landed and all the trading interest; that as to the Clergy he would say nothing—but that it was notorious, that the majority of the populace had been poisoned, and that the poison was not yet quite expelled. That the dangers which seemed to be apprehended from the present army may be chimerical, or, at least, easily remedied in any subsequent Session of Parliament; whereas the dangers with which the Nation is threatened from the Pretender and his Friends, in case there were no army to oppose them, are real, and the mischiefs that might ensue, upon the success of their designs, irreparable. That, if there had been such a standing force as we now have, timely to suppress the tumults and riots which were raised soon after his Majesty's Accession to the Throne, in all probability there had been no open Rebellion; that, on the other hand, if there had not been troops ready at hand to assist the civil power, in suppressing the late riotous assemblies of the wool-combers and weavers in the Counties of Devon and Somerset, there had by this time been another Rebellion. That the mentioning Magna Charta was, in his opinion, entirely foreign to the present debate: That the thing now in question, and that wherein they were immediately concerned, was to secure and support the Government, and the Protestant Succession, against vigilant, bold, and restless enemies; and that they had the more reason to be upon their guard, was surprized to hear, that the noble Lord, who spoke last, was not better acquainted with some matters of fact; but that he thought himself obliged to inform the House, That, by the treaty concluded and signed at Utrecht in March 1713, between the Ministers of Great-Britain and France, the late Queen, of glorious memory, was guarantee for the neutrality of Italy, and the Islands in the Mediterranean, only during the evacuation of Catalonia, and till the conclusion of a general peace: For the truth of which, his Lordship appealed to his Colleague in that Negotiation. He added, that, since that time, the state of things was quite altered, and those in the Ministry could best tell, what engagements had been entered into, either with the Emperor of France. Hereupon it was thought necessary to know the contents of those new treaties; and therefore it was moved, to address his Majesty, that the same might be laid before the House: Which address was agreed to, but was never presented.

On the 20th of February, it was moved, 'That it be an instruction to the Committee, that they do provide that no punishment shall be inflicted at any Court-Martial, which shall extend to life or limb.' Some reasons were given for supporting this motion; but it was answered, That such a clause would render the bill ineffectual, banish all manner of discipline from the army, and consequently render it entirely useless. Hereupon there arose a warm debate, which lasted from two o'clock in the afternoon, till seven in the evening.

Herein it was endeavoured to be shewn, That so numerous a force, as was allowed by that bill to be maintained in time of peace, was not only dangerous to itself to a free Nation, but was yet rendered more dangerous, by their being governed by martial law; a law unknown to our Constitution, destructive of our Liberties, and not endured by our Ancestors. To which it was answered, That, among the ancient Romans, the wisest people in the world, and the greatest lovers and assertors of public liberty, martial laws and discipline were invigorated by decrees of the Senate, and were in force in times of peace as well as in times of war. And replied to, in substance, that it was much better to attend domestic than foreign examples; whereupon were produced several instances drawn from the history of Great-Britain, that a standing army, in time of peace, was ever fatal, either to the Prince or to the Nation. But hereunto was urged, that those, who are vested with the Legislative power, ought not, on all occasions, to govern themselves by precedents, but rather, by the present situation of affairs, because it is very difficult to find examples perfectly agreeing with the various circumstances of times: That it was judged, the number of troops, which the Commons had thought fit to keep standing, was absolutely necessary for the security and safety both of the Government and Nation; and therefore it was no less necessary to make a law to keep that army within the rules of duty and discipline, unless they would render useless those very forces which must be owned to be necessary. Here-

1717-18. guard, in that the trumpeters of sedition and rebellion had again forcibly intruded into several Pulpits in Scotland.

Objections being raised against the preamble of the bill, wherein it was suggested, that the number of sixteen thousand three hundred and forty-seven men was necessary, it was moved, that the number should be reduced to twelve thousand. But this motion was rejected; as was also another, for leaving out the clause, which enabled the King to constitute articles of war. After this, the whole bill was agreed to, and passed by a majority of eighty-eight against sixty-one. However, several Lords entered their protest (1).

The

unto somewhat was again suggested, about the danger of a standing army made subject to martial law; but it was maintained, on the contrary, that the forces then on foot were necessary both for the support of the Government, and the protection of our Allies; that their Lordships ought to consider, that, when the late Rebellion broke out, they had double the number of regular troops, and yet the Government was obliged not only to send for some regiments from Ireland, but also for a body of auxiliary troops from Holland; and that, since the said forces were necessary, the bill in question, which was only to render them useful, was no less necessary. A Lord hereupon, among other things, said, That, before the noble Peer, who spoke last, was born, he had seen the time, when the Nation was in danger of losing their liberties by a standing army; and then his Lordship endeavoured to shew, that the power of life and death, which by that bill was given to a Court-martial, was unnecessary, unusual, and unjust. After this followed the speeches of Lord Harcourt and the Lord Carteret, as above in the context.

(1) As soon as the Parliament broke up, the Speakers against the Mutiny-bill published their speeches, for which they were severely censured by the Author of the Critic, and their speeches boldly examined. The King also, soon after the end of the Session, ordered articles to be published for the regulation and government of the army, pursuant to the power lodged in him by the Act. The substance of the articles is as follows:

I. All Officers and Soldiers (not having just impediment) shall diligently frequent divine service, in such places as shall be appointed for the regiment, troop, or company to which they belong; and such as either wilfully or negligently absent themselves from divine service or sermon, or else, being present, do behave themselves undecently or irreverently during the same, if they be Officers, they shall be severely reprehended at a Court-Martial; but, if private soldiers, they shall, for every such first offence, forfeit each man 1 s. to be deducted out of their next pay; and for the second offence shall forfeit 1 s. and be laid in irons for twelve hours; and, for every like offence afterwards, shall suffer and pay in like manner; and the money so forfeited shall be applied to the relief of the sick soldiers of such troop or company, to which the offender does belong.

II. If any sutler, in any of our forts, garrisons, camps, barracks, or guards, shall, during divine service or sermon, presume to sell any beer, brandy, wine, or other liquors, or any kind of victuals, or other merchandize, he shall be delivered over to the Civil Magistrate, to be punished according to law.

III. Whosoever shall use any unlawful oath or execration (whether Officer or Soldier) shall incur the penalties expressed in the first article.

IV. If any Officer or Soldier shall presume to blaspheme the holy and undivided Trinity, or the Persons of God the Father, God the Son, or God the Holy Ghost, or shall presume to speak against any known article of the Christian Faith, he shall be delivered over, by the commanding Officer, to the Civil Magistrate, to be punished according to law.

V. If any Officer or Soldier shall abuse or prophane any place dedicated to the worship of God, or shall offer violence to any Chaplain of the army, or any other Minister of God's word, he shall be liable to such penalty or corporal punishment, as shall be inflicted on him by a Court-Martial.

VI. If any Officer or Soldier shall presume to use any traitorous or disrespectful words against the sacred Person of his Majesty, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, or any of the Royal Family, or shall behave himself with contempt or disrespect towards the General, or other Commander in Chief of the forces, or speak words tending to his hurt or dishonour, he shall be punished according to the nature of his offence, by the judgment of a Regimental or General Court-Martial.

VII. If any Officer or Soldier shall excite, cause or join in any mutiny or sedition, in the company, troop, or regiment to which he belongs, or in any other company, troop, or regiment in his Majesty's service, or on any party or post, where the duty is done by detachment from several regiments, or otherwise, in the army, he shall suffer death, or such other punishment as a General Court-Martial shall inflict.

And if any Officer, Non-Commission Officer, or Soldier, shall hear any words tending to mutiny, or sedition, or, being any way privy thereto, do not immediately use his utmost endeavours to suppress the same, as also to discover it to his Superiors, if an Officer, he shall be cashiered; if a Non-Commission Officer or Soldier, he shall be severely punished at the discretion of a Court-Martial.

VIII. If any Officer or Soldier shall refuse to obey the lawful orders of his superior Officer, he shall be punished with death, or otherwise, as a General Court-Martial shall think fit.

X. All Officers and Soldiers who have received pay, or have been duly listed in our service, and shall desert the same, either in the field, upon a march, in quarters, or in garrison, and be convicted thereof before a General Court-Martial, shall suffer death, or such other punishment, as by the said Court shall be inflicted.

XII. If any Officer or Soldier shall persuade or advise any other Officer or Soldier to desert our service, he shall suffer such punishment, as shall be inflicted by the sentence of a General Court-Martial.

XVI. If any Officer, Non-Commission Officer, or Soldier, shall be accused of any capital crime, or of any violence or offence against the person, estate, or property of any of our subjects, which is punishable by the known laws of the land; the commanding Officers of every regiment, troop, or company, are hereby required to deliver over such accused person to the Civil Magistrate, so soon as applied to; and are also to be aiding and assisting to the Officers of Justice, in the seizing and apprehending such offender, in order to bring him to trial, under pain of our highest displeasure.

XIX. No Officer or Soldier shall use any reproachful or provoking speeches or gestures to another, upon pain of imprisonment, and asking pardon of the party offended, in presence of his commanding Officer.

Nor shall any Officer or Soldier presume to send a challenge to any other Officer or Soldier to fight a duel, upon pain of being cashiered, if he be an Officer; or suffer the severest corporal punishment, if a Non-Commission Officer or private Soldier.

And if any Officer or Non-Commission Officer, commanding a guard, shall wittingly and knowingly suffer any person whatever to go forth to fight a duel, he shall be punished as above: And all Seconds also, and Carriers of challenges, in order to duels, shall be taken as Principals, and punished accordingly.

All Officers, of what condition soever, have power to part and quell all quarrels, frays, and other disorders,

A bill about the forfeited estates.
Pr. H. C.

The affair of the forfeited estates caused likewise great debates. A bill was brought in for vesting the forfeited estates in Great-Britain and Ireland in Trustees, to be sold for the use of the public; and for giving relief to lawful Creditors, by determining the claims; and for the more effectual bringing into the respective Exchequers the rents and profits of the estates till 1717-18. This bill was attended with warm debates in both Houses, which, though they did not obstruct its passage, produced some very equitable clauses. The time of claiming was prolonged, and twenty thousand pounds sterling was reserved, out of the sale of the estates in Scotland, ders, though of another company, troop, or regiment; and to command Officers to arrest, and Soldiers to prison, until their proper Officers be acquainted therewith.

And whoever shall refuse to obey such Officers, (though of inferior rank) or draw his sword upon him, shall be punished as a General Court-martial shall appoint.

Nor shall any Officer or Soldier upbraid another for refusing a challenge, since, according to these our orders, they do but do the duty of soldiers, who ought to subject themselves to discipline; and we do acquit and discharge all men who have quarrels offered, or challenges sent to them, of all disgrace or opinion of disadvantage in the obedience hereunto; and whosoever shall upbraid them, and offend in this case, shall be punished as a Challenger.

XXI. Every Non-Commission Officer and Soldier, who shall insult himself in our service, shall, at the time of his so insulting, or within a month afterwards at the farthest, be taken before a Justice of Peace by the insulting Officer, or the Officer commanding the troop or company into which he is lifted, and shall there take the following oath.

I swear to be true to our Sovereign Lord King George, and to serve him honestly and faithfully in defence of his Person, Crown, and Dignity, against all his enemies and opposers whatsoever, and to observe and obey his Majesty's orders, and the orders of the Generals and Officers set over me by his Majesty.

So help me God.

XXVIII. All Officers and Soldiers are to behave themselves orderly in quarters and on the march; and whoever shall commit any waste or spoil, either on walks of trees, parks, warrens, fish ponds, houses, or gardens, corn-fields, inclosures, or meadows, or shall maliciously destroy any property whatever belonging to any of our subjects, or belonging to any person whatever, unless by order of the then Commander in Chief of our forces, to annoy rebels, or other enemies in arms against us, he or they, that shall be found guilty of offending herein, shall (besides such penalties as they are liable to by law) be punished according to the nature and degree of the offence, by the judgment of a Regimental or General Court-Martial.

XXIX. No Officer shall demand billets for quartering of more than his effective men, nor quarter any women or children in the house assigned him for the quartering of Officers and Soldiers, without the consent of the owner; nor shall take money for freeing of Landlords from quartering of Officers or Soldiers, under pain of being cashiered for it.

XXX. Every Officer commanding a regiment, troop, company, or party, whether in settled quarters, or on the march, shall see his own quarters, and the quarters of every Officer and Soldier under his command, paid, according to the rates specified in the act of Parliament now in force.

And, upon every payment to be made in quarters, the said Officer shall give public notice thereof to the Landlords, in order to see them satisfied as aforesaid: And in case any such regiment, troop, company, or party, shall be ordered to march, before money may be come to the hands of the commanding Officer as aforesaid, he is hereby required, before his departure out of any town or village, to make up the accounts with all persons concerned in money due to them for quartering of Officers and Soldiers, for what time soever he shall have happened to remain there; and grant to every such party a signed certificate for the same, therein specifying the name of the regiment, troop, or company such Officers or Soldiers do belong to, under pain of being cashiered for it, upon proof of having wilfully offended herein.

XXXI. On marches, the commanding Officers are to apply to the proper Magistrates for the carriages necessary for the service, and to pay for them according to the Act of Parliament in that behalf, taking care not to abuse, nor to suffer any under their command, to beat or abuse the waggons, or other persons attending such carriages, nor to put more than twenty hundred weight on any wayne or waggon so furnished to them by the Country.

And whatever Officer shall be convicted of offending herein, or of refusing to grant certificates in case of failure of money, as in the preceding article, shall, by the judgment of a General Court-Martial, be cashiered, or otherwise punished, according to the degree of his offence.

XXXII. All Officers commanding in garrisons, in quarters, or on marches, shall keep good order, and redress all such abuses or disorders as may happen to be committed by any Officer or Soldier under their command: And if on complaint made to any such commanding Officer, of beating of Landlords, or extorting of more from them than they are obliged by law to furnish; of Soldiers disturbing of fairs or markets, or committing of any other kind of riots, to the disturbing or disquieting our people; he, the said Commander, who shall refuse or omit to see justice done on the offender, and reparation made to the party injured, so far as part of the offender's pay can enable him, he shall, upon proof thereof, be punished by a General Court-Martial, as if he himself had personally committed the crimes or disorders complained of.

XXXVII. If any Officer shall protect any person from his Creditors, otherwise than is allowed by the present Act of Parliament; or any one who does not actually serve in the ranks, and consequently do all the duties of a Soldier (according to the true intent and meaning of the said act) he shall be cashiered for it.

XLIV. In case any Officer, Non-Commission Officer or Soldier, be accused of any violence or offence against the person, estate, or property of any of our subjects, punishable by any of our Civil Courts or Magistrates, the Officer, to whom such accusation is brought, shall not proceed to the trial of such offender or offenders by a Court-martial, within the space of eight days, unless at the desire of the person or persons injured; and in case no application be made to the commanding Officer in quarters, during the space of eight days, by the person or persons injured, the offender or offenders may be tried by a Court-martial for any offence mentioned in these articles; provided that, within the space of the said eight days, the person injured hath not proceeded to the prosecution of such offender before a Civil Court or Magistrate, and notice given thereof to the Officer, commanding in the quarters where such offence shall be committed.

XLV. These our rules and articles are to be observed by, and do in all respects regard our troops and regiments of horse and foot guards, as well as our other forces.

XLVI. The foregoing rules and articles shall be read and published at the head of every regiment, troop, and company mustered or to be mustered in our service, once every two months at farthest, and are to be duly observed by all Officers and Soldiers in our service; and also by our companies of Gunners, and other military Officers of our trains of artillery, with such alterations only as relate to the payment of Soldiers quarters and carriages, which in the Kingdom of

Before the Session ended, the King sent a message to the Commons, which was read by the Speaker as follows:

The King's message to the Commons.
 Pr. H. C. 'His Majesty being at present engaged in several Negotiations of the utmost concern to the welfare of these Kingdoms, and the tranquility of Europe; and having lately received information from abroad, which makes him judge that it will give weight to his endeavours, if a naval force be employed where it shall be necessary, does think fit to acquaint this House therewith; not doubting, but that, in case he should be obliged, at this critical juncture, to exceed the number of men granted this year for the service, the House will, at their next meeting, provide for such exceeding.'

This message was well received, and it was unanimously resolved to present an address to thank the King for his unwearied endeavours to promote the welfare of his Kingdoms, and to preserve the tranquility of Europe; and to assure him, that they would make good such exceedings of seamen, as he should find necessary to obtain those ends.

On the 21st of March, the business of the Session being over, the King went to the House of Peers, and, having passed all the bills, ordered the Lord-Chancellor to read the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I Cannot put an end to this Session, without returning my hearty thanks to so good a Parliament, for the dispatch which has been given to the public business. You will, I hope, in your private capacities, feel the convenience of an early recess; and, I am persuaded, the public will receive great benefit, by the seasonable zeal and vigour of your resolutions in support of my Government. Nothing can add so much to the credit and influence of this Crown, both at home and abroad, as the repeated instances of your affection to me. This steadiness and resolution of yours will, I hope, enable me to procure, against your next meeting, such treaties to be concluded, as will settle peace and tranquility among our neighbours. If, through the blessing of God, my endeavours to this end prove successful, I shall have the satisfaction to silence even those, who will never own themselves convinced; and to let all the world see plainly, that what I have most at heart, is the good and welfare of my people, who may then be eased in their taxes, and enriched by their trade.'

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

'I must return you my particular thanks for the Supplies you have so cheerfully granted, and

Ireland are to be regulated by the Lord-Lieutenant thereof, and in our islands, provinces, and garrisons beyond the seas, by the respective Governors of the same, according as the nature of the thing shall require: And notwithstanding it is expressed in the 16th article of these our rules and orders, that every commanding Officer is required to deliver up to the Civil Magistrate all such persons (under his command) as shall be accused of any crimes which are punishable by the known laws of the land; yet in our garrison of Gibraltar, island of Minorca, forts of Placentia and Annapolis-Royal, where our forces now are, or in any other place beyond the seas, to which any of our troops may hereafter be commanded, and where there is no form of our Civil Judicature in force, the Governors or Commanders respectively are to appoint General Courts-martial to be held, who are to punish criminals by their sentence, as has been practised heretofore, and authorized by former articles of war.

(1) There was also a debate in the House of Commons about the trade with Sweden, which had been interrupted by a proclamation. The Merchants having presented a petition for opening the trade, Mr. Jackson (late Resident at Stockholm) was called in and asked by Mr. Cragg, whether he was of opinion, That, if the trade were opened with Sweden, our Merchants would be upon a better foot than they are at present? Mr. Jackson answered, 'That, in his opinion, the contrary would happen: For now that the Swedes are distressed for want of our commodities, particularly corn and salt, they are inclined to facilitate to us, underhand, the purchase of their iron; whereas, if the prohibition of trade with them was taken off, they would immediately provide themselves with what they want; and, knowing at the same time, that there are amongst us a set of men, who make it their study and business to embarrass the Government, the Court of Sweden would be more stiff than ever, and render the purchase of the iron more difficult to us.' Some Members of the House being offended at Mr. Jackson's reflection on a set of men (by which it was plain he meant the Tory-party) cried out, Custody, Custody: But the No. 93. VOL. IV.

more moderate contented themselves with putting him upon explaining himself. Hereupon Mr. Jackson replied, That he meant the Merchants, who presented unreasonable petitions. This being by some looked upon rather as an aggravation than an excuse, the cry of Custody, Custody, was repeated; but Mr. Walpole brought him off, by suggesting, 'That that Gentleman had lived so long in a despotic Government, where petitions and representations of that nature are accounted capital crimes, that he had forgot the rights and privileges of his Countrymen; and therefore moved, that his unguarded expressions might be excused; and, nobody opposing Mr. Walpole, Mr. Jackson withdrew. Then, the Petitioners and some other Merchants being called in, and farther heard, they represented, among other particulars, 'That, since the prohibition of trade with Sweden, they bought Swedish iron of the Dutch, 4*l.* per ton dearer than before; and that, whereas the English were formerly about 30000*l.* per annum gainers by the trade with Sweden, they now lost about 90000*l.* But this was contradicted by Mr. Cragg, who suggested, That the exports from Stockholm for England had never amounted to 120000*l.* in one year; and therefore the difference of the profit and loss could not come up to this last sum. After some other speeches, the debate was adjourned till that day month, before which the Session ended.

There was another debate about a bill for erecting Hospitals and Workhouses in Bristol, in which there was a remarkable clause, abrogating the Sacramental Test in the case of the Guardianship of the Charities. However, the bill passed with the clause.

A bill, directing that St. Giles's Church should be rebuilt, instead of one of the fifty new Churches, occasioned a debate in the House of Lords, and was opposed by some of the Bishops, as a misapplication of the money granted for pious uses. They also proposed that the words of Pious Memory should be added in the preamble after the Queen's name; but the bill passed without any amendment, upon which it was protested against by five Bishops and several Lords.

1717-180 " and for the late instance of your confidence in " me. I promise you, that my endeavours shall " not be wanting to make use of both to the " best advantage, for the good of my people.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" The practices which are daily used by a
 " most restless and unhappy set of men, to dis" turb a Government, by whose clemency they " are protected, require our utmost attention " and vigilance. I must therefore recommend " it to you, that, in your several stations and
 " countries, you will endeavour to quell that spi" rit of disaffection, which our common ene" mies are so industrious to foment."

Then the Lord-Chancellor prorogued the Parliament to the 20th of May; and afterwards, by several prorogations, to the 11th of November.

Changes in the Ministry.

About this time there were some changes in the Ministry. Sir Edward Northey was removed, and Mr. Lechmere was made Attorney-General in his room. The Earl of Sunderland was made President of the Council, and first Commissioner of the Treasury. The other Commissioners were, Aylmer, Wallop, Baillie, and Clayton. Mr. Craggs, and the Lord Stanhope (who and Lord Cadogan were soon after created Earls) were appointed Secretaries of State. The Earl of Berkley was placed at the head of the Admiralty, with Sir George Byng, Sir John Jennings, Mr. Cockburne, Mr. Cbetwynd, Sir John Norris, and Sir Charles Wager. The Earl of Holderness was made first Commissioner of the Board of Trade. In April, the Lord-Chancellor Cowper (who had been made an Earl) resigned the Great Seal, and went immediately into the Country. Though it had been reported some months that he desired to retire, yet his resigning his employment, at that juncture, was a great surprize to the public, and no small grief to all unprejudiced persons. The judges Tracy, Pratt, and Mountague, were made Commissioners of the Great Seal; but, about a month after, the Lord Parker was made High-Chancellor, and Sir John Pratt Chief-Justice.

*Great pre-
 in Spain.*

The great scene of action this summer was in the Mediterranean. Though the King of Spain had promised to suspend all operations, after the conquest of Sardinia, and refer his differences with the Emperor to the mediation of England, France, and Holland, he rejected all their proposals for an accommodation, and continued his warlike preparations by sea and land. By the care and diligence of his Prime Minister Cardinal Alberoni, a formidable armament was ready, by the month of May, at Barcelona, consisting of thirty ships of the line and frigates, seven galleys, four bomb-vessels, four hundred and forty transport-ships, forty mortars, fifteen hundred mules, one hundred and fifty thousand fascines, three hundred thousand stakes for intrenchments, a vast quantity of warlike stores, and provisions for many months. On board this fleet were embarked thirty-six battalions, six regiments of horse, four of dragoons, one thousand artillery men, a hundred and fifty carpenters and other mechanics, a company of sixty miners, and a brigade of fifty engineers. To furnish the Supplies, the Receivers of the revenue were ordered to pay in certain sums to the Royal

Treasury: The Grandees, Prelates, Provinces, 1718.
 Cities, taxed themselves voluntarily for this expedition, and raised regiments at their own expence. These preparations had been the work of more than two years.

This powerful fleet set sail the beginning of June: The design of it was not known but by the event. It was not doubted, but the conquest of the Kingdom of Naples was aimed at, and all possible measures had been taken to prevent it. Alberoni had deceived all Europe; for Sicily was what the Cardinal intended to attack, and the reasons which determined him to it were very plausible.

In the first place, Sicily not belonging at that time to the Emperor, this expedition seemed to give no handle to the Courts of London and Paris, since, by their late treaties, they had only engaged to assist the Emperor, in case his Dominions were attacked, and not the Duke of Savoy, who was not supposed to be in danger.
 In the next place, the Cardinal was informed of the Duke's inclination to be reconciled with the Emperor, and give him Sicily without any regard to the rights of Spain. Lastly, Sicily not being in a state of defence, the conquest would be easy, and prepare the way for the others he intended to make.

During these preparations in Spain, King George had ordered (as hath been said) a strong A strong squadron to be fitted out in the spring. The squadron fitted out.
 Marquis de Monteleone, the Spanish Ambassador at the Court of England, being alarmed at it, represented, in a memorial dated the 18th of March, 'That so powerful an armament, in time of peace, could not but cause umbrage to the King his Master, and alter the good intelligence that reigned between the two Crowns.' The King answered, 'It was not his intention to conceal the subject of that armament: And he designed soon to send Admiral Byng with a powerful squadron into the Mediterranean, in order to maintain the neutrality of Italy, against those who should seek to disturb it.'

In the mean time, the Negotiations were car- The Qua- ried on with all possible diligence. The Abbot duple Al- du Bois, in the name of the Duke of Orleans, a- liance.
 greed with the British Ministers at London upon the terms for an accommodation between the Emperor and the King of Spain, and had frequent and long Conferences on that subject with the King. These Negotiations produced at length the treaty called at first the Triple Al- liance between Great-Britain, France, and Holland, and, after the Accession of the Emperor, stiled the Quadruple Alliance. As this treaty is one of the most remarkable events of this Reign, and an evident proof of the ascendant, which two politic Princes in conjunction may have over the rest, it will not be improper to insert the plan and principal articles.

The design of the Negotiations was declared to be, the preservation of the public tranquility, by removing the jealousies which were increasing between some of the Princes of Europe. Then were settled the terms of a peace between the Kings of Spain and Sicily and the Emperor.
 These terms, accepted by the Emperor, were followed by a separate treaty of Alliance between him and the three powers who so far concerned themselves in the peace, as to engage to compel by force of arms the Kings of Spain and Sardinia to accept the conditions offered them.

The

1718. The terms imposed on the Emperor and Spain were contained in eight articles:

I. For quieting the disturbances raised contrary to the peace of Baden, and the neutrality of Italy, the King of Spain was to restore to the Emperor, within two months after the ratification of the treaty, the Kingdom of Sardinia, and renounce all right and title to the same.

II. In consideration of this, and of King Philip's renunciation to the Crown of France for himself and posterity, the Emperor was also to renounce for himself, heirs and successors, all right and pretension to any Dominions, of which the King of Spain was acknowledged rightful possessor by the treaty of Utrecht.

III. In consequence of this renunciation, and because the Duke of Orleans had renounced all right to the Crown of Spain, on condition the Emperor should never succeed to that Kingdom, his Imperial Majesty was to acknowledge Philip V. lawful King of Spain and the Indies, and to give him the titles and prerogatives belonging to him as such.

IV. In return, his Catholic Majesty was to renounce all rights and claims to the Dominions of the Emperor in Italy or the Netherlands; amongst which the Marquissate of Final (yielded to the Genoese by the Emperor in 1713) was to be comprehended. He was likewise to renounce the right of reversion of Sicily to the Crown of Spain, which he had reserved to himself in the treaty of Utrecht.

V. The Duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia were to be accounted for ever as male fiefs of the Empire, and were to descend in default of the male heirs to the Queen of Spain's eldest son. As the consent of the Empire was necessary, the Emperor was to use his utmost endeavours to obtain it. Leghorn was to remain a free port; and the King of Spain was to yield to his Son the town Porto Longone, with what he possessed in the island of Elba, as soon as the Prince of Spain should be in possession of Tuscany. None of these Duchies was to be possessed by a Prince who should at the same time be King of Spain, nor was the King of Spain ever to take upon himself the Guardianship of that Prince.

The Mediators took several other precautions. It was never to be allowed, during the lives of the possessors of Tuscany and Parma, that any forces of any Country whatsoever, whether their own or hired, should, either by the Emperor, the Kings of France or Spain, or even by the Prince appointed to the Succession, be introduced in any garrison, city, port, or town of those Duchies, but for security of the Succession six thousand Swiss were to be put into Leghorn, Porto Ferraro, Parma, and Placentia. His Britannic Majesty was so convinced of the necessity of this expedient, that he offered to lend his own forces till the Swiss could be raised.

VI. The next article was of greater importance, and was that with which King George and the Duke of Orleans purchased (as may be said) at the expence of Spain and Savoy, the aid the Emperor was to furnish in defence of the order of the Succession so favourable to them. By this article the King of Spain for the sake of the public tranquillity was to consent, that the Emperor should be put in possession of Sicily, and renounce the right of reversion of that Kingdom settled by the instrument of cession, and the treaty of Utrecht, on condition however of having the reversion of Sardinia instead of it.

VII. and VIII. The Emperor and King of Spain were to defend each other in the possession of their Dominions, and to perform the conditions of this treaty within two months after ratification. After which all other points were to be settled at a Congress.

The treaty between the Emperor and the King of Sicily was of the same nature, only the Mediators spoke more like sovereign arbiters from whom there was no appeal. The preamble ran in a very high strain. The Mediators began with observing, That the cession of Sicily by the treaty of Utrecht to the House of Savoy, instead of promoting the peace, as was intended, had proved the chief obstacle of the Emperor's refusing to accede to that treaty, as all Europe could witness. Wherefore (say the Mediators) the powers, by whom the treaty of Utrecht was first set on foot, believe that article, which is not essential to the treaty, may justly be altered, even without the consent of the parties concerned, as it tends to the perfection of the treaty by the Emperor's renunciation, and as by the exchange of Sicily for Sardinia the war will be prevented with which Italy is threatened, in case the Emperor should attack Sicily, which he has never renounced, and which he has a right to recover after the breach of the neutrality of Italy by the seizure of Sardinia. It is therefore agreed,

I. The King of Sicily shall restore that Kingdom to the Emperor, within two months, at farthest, after the ratification of this treaty.

II. In return, the Emperor shall give to the King of Sicily the Island of Sardinia, which he shall enjoy, with the title of King; but the reversion, in default of heirs-male, shall be reserved to the Crown of Spain.

As there was no proportion between Sardinia and Sicily, it was fit the Emperor should seem at least to make some farther satisfaction. To this end, the Mediators in the two next articles agreed, that the Emperor should confirm to the King of Sicily all the cessions made to him by the treaty of Turin in 1703, on condition, however, that all other claims, which he might have by that treaty, should be void. The Emperor was likewise to acknowledge the right of the House of Savoy to succeed to the Crown of Spain, in case of failure of heirs in Philip V. according to the renunciations and treaties of Utrecht.

But it signified little to make these regulations, if proper measures were not taken for their support and execution. In this the Mediators were not wanting. France and the Emperor, in conjunction with Great Britain, promised mutual assistance to put the Emperor in possession of Sicily, and to maintain the Succession of the British Crown in the Protestant Branch, and to exclude the Spanish Branch from the Crown of Spain. To these engagements were added the particular measures that were to be taken, to induce or compel the Kings of Spain and Sicily to submit to what had been determined for them, in concert with their enemy.

It was agreed to allow them three months, to consider,

1718. consider, which time was deemed sufficient to examine the conditions, and declare whether they would accept them, after the example of his Imperial Majesty, as unalterable terms to extinguish the present, and hinder a future war. But, if contrary to the wishes of all Europe, these two Princes, after the expiration of the two months, refused to comply, the Mediators were to join their forces, and compel them to submit.

It was expressly agreed, that, if one of the Mediators should be attacked on account of the succours lent the Emperor, the others should declare war against the Aggressor, and not lay down their arms, till the Emperor was in possession of Sicily, and secure as to his Italian Dominions.

If one of the two Kings should accept of the terms, he was to join with the Mediators to compel the other to do the like. If the King of Spain refused to comply, the Emperor was to be assisted in the conquest of Sardinia: If the King of Sicily refused, the Emperor was to be enabled to subdue Sicily: If both stood out, Sicily was first to be attacked, and then Sardinia, the custody of which was to be left to the King of Great-Britain, till the Duke of Savoy had agreed to the treaty.

After having settled the means of taking Sardinia from Spain, and Sicily from Savoy, the penalties were fixed, in case these two Princes should carry their resistance so far, as to make it necessary to have recourse to arms. The Emperor was allowed to recover that part of Milan, yielded to Savoy by the treaty of Turin; and it was to be agreed to what other Prince the Emperor should give the eventual investiture of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, in exclusion of the Queen of Spain's sons.

To shew, however, that nothing but justice and peace was intended, it was agreed, that the Emperor (whatever progress his arms might make) should be contented with the advantages stipulated for him: But, if he could not recover Sicily by arms or treaty, he was to be free from any engagement entered into by this treaty, of consenting to make peace with the Kings of Spain and Sardinia. It was moreover agreed, that the Emperor, when in possession of Sicily, should renounce all pretensions to Spain and the Indies, whether King Philip consented or not to the peace, since the guaranty of the Mediators would be to the Emperor a security equal to the renunciations of the King of Spain, for Sicily, the Italian Dominions, and the Netherlands.

Such was the Quadruple Alliance, by which King George and the Duke of Orleans intended to preserve the tranquility of Europe: But, contrary to their expectations, it proved the occasion of all the quarrels and disputes which afterwards ensued between Great-Britain and Spain.

The States-General, in whose name this decisive treaty was made, did not absolutely refuse to ratify it, but under various pretences suspended their consent. They did not approve of such violent measures; and, having no particular interest in the quarrel, were willing rather to proceed by fair means (1).

To

(1) A letter from a Swiss to his friend at Geneva, concerning the part the States-General ought to act, as to the differences between the Emperor and Spain, was published about this time, wherein a brief account is first given of what had passed in the affair, and then the reasons why the States are not obliged to enter into any Alliance about it:

“Whilst the Emperor (says the Letter) was in the heat of war with the Turks, the King of Spain, thinking it a favourable opportunity for pushing his pretensions, resolved not to let it slip. He armed with all possible diligence, and with all the secrecy things of that nature are capable of. He caused all the men of war he had, to be made fit for the service, new ones to be built, others to be bought; he gathered together all the transports he possibly could; he reinforced considerably his old regiments, raised new; and, in short, attacked the island of Sardinia, which you know he made himself master of.

What did the King of Spain do in this interval? Why, he drew up and published a manifesto to justify his recourse to arms.

The Marquis Beretti Landi (whose departure is still lamented here) presented a memorial to the States-General, wherein, after having exhibited the reasons which prevailed with the King of Spain to attack Sardinia, he offered, in the most obliging manner in the world, in the King his Master's name, to put all his concerns into their hands, and to accept of them for Mediators.

The States-General were, indeed, sensible of his Catholic Majesty's generosity; but considering, that it was an affair which did not particularly concern them, and that that mediation might directly or indirectly entangle them in the quarrel, they concluded, that it was not their business to undertake it at any rate; and thereupon they answered the Marquis Beretti Landi in very general terms.

What happened afterwards? Why, England and France, acting with the laudable design of preventing the disorders which this kindling war would infallibly be attended with, enter upon measures agreeable to such a design. In this view, the Abbot Du Bois was sent to London; the affair was there canvassed; projects of accommodation were formed; care was taken to let the Emperor know soon what they were; Colonel Stanhope was sent to Madrid, to communicate the proposals to his Catholic Majesty, or at least to sound him upon them. But hitherto not one word was spoken to the States-General: Far from consulting them, or hearing their sentiments of the matter, or acting in concert with them, or desiring them (in conjunction with themselves) to contribute to the re-establishment of the tranquility of Europe; far from all this, I say, a profound silence was kept as to their part; they were carefully deprived of the knowledge of whatsoever was done: In a word, the States-General were not in the question.

But neither was this all; for, after having well examined and debated upon the articles of peace between the Emperor and the Kings of Spain and Sicily, they were committed to writing; and a treaty of Alliance was thereupon concluded between France, England, and the States-General, the chief end whereof was to engage, by all possible methods, the Emperor and the Kings of Spain and Sicily to subscribe to the conditions expressed in the said treaty.

This treaty being made between France and England, it was sent to Vienna, Madrid, and Turin, to be approved and accepted; and then only, after all these steps, it was proposed to the States-General.

Thus you have an account, in few words, how all things were transacted. I shall shew you by and by, that their High-Mightinesses are not any way obliged to enter into the said treaty. For this purpose, we have nothing to do to examine whether the terms of accommodation, contained in the said treaty, are reasonable and equitable, or not; for even supposing, that they are both the one and the other, I affirm, that the State is not obliged by any engagement to enter into that 1718. To this treaty were added still more effectual methods: King George offered his mediation to the Grand Seigneur for a peace between Him and the Emperor: The mediation was accepted, and a treaty signed at Passarowitz.

Whilst these things were transacting, the King, as he had declared to the Spanish Ambassador, ordered a fleet, strong enough to oppose the progress of the Spaniards, to sail for the Mediterranean, under the command of Sir George Byng.

The fleet being ready at Spithead, Sir George Byng went to Portsmouth, where he received his instructions, dated the 26th of May (1). These instructions were as follow:

I. Whereas the Crown of Great-Britain, by the several treaties made at Utrecht, the 14th day of March 1713, N. S. with the Emperor and the late most Christian King, became obliged to see an exact observation of the armistice and neutrality then established in Italy, and was guarantee for the full performance of the stipulations at that time solemnly agreed to on that head: And whereas, by a treaty made between Us and our good Brother the Emperor of Germany, at Westminster, the 25th day of May 1716, we stand engaged to assist, maintain, and defend him in the possession of all the Kingdoms, Provinces, and Rights, which he then actually enjoyed in Europe: And whereas the Catholic King hath, in an hostile manner, invaded the territories belonging to the said Emperor, and, by force of arms, hath taken from him the Island and Kingdom of Sardinia, and is still making great and warlike preparations for carrying on his designs further against the other Dominions belonging to his Imperial Majesty in Italy, contrary to the tenor of the aforesaid treaties: And whereas, since this unhappy rupture, we, as a friend to both parties, have not ceased to employ our best offices, in order to accommodate the differences, and put an end to this war, which, if continued, will endanger the public tranquillity of the rest of Europe: And whereas we have made particular and earnest instances with our good Brother the King of Spain, that he would consent to a suspension of arms, during which the Negotiations for peace might be more easily and effectually carried on:

And whereas his said Catholic Majesty hath appeared to us not averse to the suspending his further enterprizes, and thereby facilitating our good offices towards a happy accommodation: We therefore, for the better fulfilling the several engagements we lie under by the treaties aforementioned, and for promoting, in the best and most effectual manner, the measures that may tend to the bringing about an entire reconciliation and perfect friendship between the said parties now engaged in war, and thereby putting a stop to the fatal consequences, which might otherwise ensue from these hostilities, have thought it fit and necessary, for the purposes aforesaid, and for the welfare of Europe in general, to send a strong fleet of our ships of war into the Mediterranean under your command.

II. You are therefore, upon the receipt of these our instructions, forthwith to proceed to the Mediterranean with our said fleet; and, being arrived in the Straights, you shall immediately give notice to the Catholic King, by our Minister residing at his Court, of your arrival in those seas, and that you are instructed, in our name, to promote all measures, that may best contribute to the composing the differences that are arisen between Him and the Emperor.

III. You shall from thence, without loss of time, wind and weather permitting, proceed to Port-Mabon, and, being arrived there, you shall by express give advice of the same to the Viceroy of the Kingdom of Naples, and to the Governor of the Duchy of Milan, and let them know the purport of your instructions, that you are come with our fleet into those parts, to make good our treaties with the Emperor, and to hinder the further violation of the same by the arms of the Catholic King: And to that end you will hold a correspondence with the said Viceroy and Governor during your stay in the Mediterranean, and let them know, that you are to take measures in concert with them, for preventing any further breach of the neutrality of Italy, which by our treaty we are obliged to see preserved: And, as you may probably at Port-Mabon get the best intelligence of the preparations and proceedings both of the Imperialists and that Alliance, and that it is its interest not to meddle by any means; and that for several reasons.

In the first place, as their High Mightinesses never set up as guarantees for the neutrality of Italy, so nothing obliges them to make steps, in order to restore peace there.

Secondly, Since their High-Mightinesses refused to accept the mediation which the King of Spain so civilly offered them, because they were afraid of bringing themselves into a scrape, they have much stronger reasons to refuse to come into the treaty above-mentioned, now that the King of Spain appears unwilling to accept it, as it is; for them to act otherwise would be to declare themselves parties, after having refused to be Mediators, and, without the least necessity, to fall out with his Catholic Majesty, of whom, hitherto, they have no manner of reason to complain.

In the third place, It is incontestably certain, that this State ought, with all imaginable care, to avoid whatever may involve it in a new war.

However the States-General, after all the endeavours of the Spanish Ambassador to retard the conclusion of the treaty, did at last accede to the Quadruple Alliance on the 22d of December, N. S.

No. 93. VOL. IV.

(1) The instructions were inclosed in a letter from Secretary Craggs:

Cockpit, May 27th, O. S. 1718.

S I R,

I inclose to you his Majesty's instructions, as well with relation to your conduct in the Mediterranean, as to the treaty with the Moors.

After what passed yesterday between my Lord Somersdown, my Lord Stanhope, you and me, when we were together at Lord Stanhope's lodgings, there remains nothing for me but to wish you a good voyage, and good success in your undertakings. I do it very heartily, and am with great truth,

S I R,

Your most obedient,

Humble servant,

J. CRAGGS.

1718. and the Spaniards, you will accordingly take such stations with our fleet under your command, as may be most proper to obstruct any new hostilities, and to put these our instructions in execution.

IV. And as a suspension of arms, and a forbearance of all acts of hostility on each side, in those parts is absolutely necessary for the setting on foot and concluding the proper Negotiations of peace, you are accordingly to make instances with both parties to cease from using any further acts of hostility. But, in case the Spaniards do still insist with their ships of war and forces to attack the Kingdom of Naples, or other the territories of the Emperor in Italy, or to land in any part of Italy, which can only be with a design to invade the Emperor's Dominions, against whom only they have declared war by invading Sardinia; or if they should endeavour to make themselves masters of the Kingdom of Sicily, which must be with a design to invade the Kingdom of Naples; in such case you are, with all your power, to hinder and obstruct the same. But if it should so happen, that at your arrival, with our fleet under your command, in the Mediterranean, the Spaniards should already have landed any troops in Italy, in order to invade the Emperor's territories, you shall endeavour amicably to dissuade them from persevering in such an attempt, and offer them your assistance to help them to withdraw their troops, and put an end to all further acts of hostility. But, in case these your friendly endeavours should prove ineffectual, you shall, by keeping company with, or intercepting their ships or convoy, or, if it be necessary, by openly opposing them, defend the Emperor's territories from any further attempt.

V. And whereas we have thought it for our service, to send four battalions of our forces on board our fleet under your command; upon your arrival at our town of Port-Mahon, you are to put the said four battalions on shore there, to relieve the garrisons in our island of Minorca; and you are to take the said garrisons on board your ships of war, in order to employ the same in such a manner, and according to such instructions as you shall receive from us.

VI. And whereas we have thought fit to recall our trusty and well beloved Charles Cornwall, Esq; whom we had appointed our Plenipotentiary for concluding a peace with the Moors, and have impowered you to renew that Negotiation, you are therefore to dispose of the ships now under the command of the said Vice-Admiral Cornwall, and employ the whole squadron, or any part thereof, in the manner you shall judge most proper for promoting the several respective services, wherein you are employed in the Mediterranean.

He sails from Spit-head,
June 4.

The Admiral sailed the 4th of June from Spithead with twenty ships of the line, two fire-ships, two bomb-vessels, a hospital-ship, and a store ship. Being got into the Ocean, he sent the Rupert to Lisbon for intelligence, and, arriving on the 30th N. S. off Cape St. Vincent, he dispatched the Superbe to Cadix with Mr. Allix his Secretary, who carried a letter from him to Colonel Stanbope (the present Earl of Harrington) the King's Enjoy at Madrid, wherein he desired that Minister to acquaint the King of Spain with his arrival in those parts, in his way to the Mediterranean, and to lay before him the instructions he was to act under with his squadron, of which he gave a very ample detail in his letter. The Envoy shewed the letter to Cardinal Aberoni, who, upon reading it, told him with some warmth, 'That his Master would run all hazards, and even suffer himself to be driven out of Spain, rather than recall his troops, or consent to any suspension of arms:' adding, 'That the Spaniards were not to be frightened; and he was so well convinced of their fleet's doing their duty, that, if the Admiral should think fit to attack them, he should be in no pain for the success.' Mr. Stanbope, having in his hand a list of the British squadron, desired his Eminence to peruse it, and to compare its strength with that of their own squadron; which the Cardinal took, and threw on the ground with much passion. Mr. Stanbope, with great temper, desired him 'to consider the sincere attention, which the King his Master had always had to the honour and interest of his Catholic Majesty, which it was impossible for him to give greater proofs of, than he had done by his unwearied endeavours, through the whole course of the present Negotiations, to procure the most advantageous conditions possible for Spain, in which he had succeeded even beyond what any unprejudiced person could have hoped for; and that, though by the treaty of Utrecht for the neutrality of Italy, which was entered into at the request of the King of Spain himself; as also by that of Westminster the 25th of May, 1716, his Majesty found himself obliged to defend the Emperor's Dominions, when attacked, he had hitherto only acted as a Mediator, though ever since the enterprize against Sardinia, by his treaties he became a party in the war, and for this year last past had been strongly called upon by the Emperor to comply with these engagements; and that even now, when it was impossible for him to delay any longer the sending his fleet into the Mediterranean, it plainly appeared by the Admiral's instructions, which he communicated to his Eminence, and by the orders he had himself received, that his Majesty had nothing more at heart, than that his fleet might be employed in promoting the interests of the King of Spain; and hoped, his Catholic Majesty would not, by refusing to recall his troops, or consent to a cessation of arms, put it out of his power to give all the proofs of the sincere friendship he always desired to cultivate with his Catholic Majesty.' All that the Cardinal could be brought to promise, was to lay the Admiral's letter before the King, and to let the Envoy know his resolution upon it in two days: But it was nine days before he could obtain and send it away, the Cardinal probably hoping, that the Admiral would delay, in expectation of it, in some of the Ports of Spain, and thereby give time for their fleet and forces to secure a good footing in Sicily. The answer was wrote under the Admiral's letter in these words: 'His Catholic Majesty has done me the honour to tell me, the Chevalier Byng may execute the orders, which he has from the King his Master. Escurial, 15 July, 1718.

The Cardinal Aberoni.

Mr. Stanbope, seeing things tending to a rupture, gave private and early notice of his apprehensions.

1718. henfions to the English Consuls and Merchants, settled in the Spanish sea-port towns, advising them to guard and secure their effects against any danger of a breach between the two Crowns.

The Admiral pursuing his voyage with unfavourable winds, it was the 8th of July, N. S. before he made Cape Spartel, where the Superbe and Rupert rejoined him, and brought him advice of the mighty preparations which the Spaniards had made at Barcelona, and of their fleet sailing from thence the 18th of June, N. S. to the eastward. In passing by Gibraltar, Vice-Admiral Cornwall came out and joined him, with the Argyle and Charles Galley. The Squadron wanting water, and the wind continuing contrary, they anchored off Cape Malaga, where having completed their watering in four days, they proceeded to Minorca, where the Admiral was to land four regiments of foot, which he carried out from England, in order to relieve the soldiers there in garrison, who were to embark, and serve in the Squadron. On the 23d of July, N. S. he anchored with the Squadron off Port-Mabon. Here he received advice, that the Spanish fleet had been seen, the 30th of June, within forty leagues of Naples, steering South-east: Upon which he dispatched away expresses to the Governor of Milan, and Viceroy of Naples, to inform them of his arrival in the Mediterranean; and, having shifted the garrisons of Minorca, he sailed from thence the 25th of July, N. S. and arrived the 1st of August in the Bay of Naples.

It is impossible to express the joy of those people, at the long-wished for sight of a fleet, which alone could assure their safety. They had been under the greatest terrors, expecting that the prodigious armament of Spain would have fallen upon that Kingdom: And though their fears were relieved for the present by the descent of the Spaniards into Sicily, yet the rapidity with which they had over-run the greatest part of that Island, and a reasonable suspicion, that the Duke of Savoy would not much expose his troops to defend the remainder of a Country, which, by the terms of the Quadruple Alliance, was to be taken from him, and given to a Potentate, whose power in Italy he dreaded, made them look for the enemy soon in Naples, where the strong party that had appeared among the Sicilian Nobility for Spain, made them apprehend, that no less a faction would rise in their favour, upon their invading that Kingdom, where the Germans had but twelve (some say eight) thousand men, and the whole Country was ill provided for defence. The common people indeed were generally in the interest of the House of Austria, which was greatly owing to the prudent Government of the Marshal Count Dawn, their Viceroy, a man endowed with all the qualities fit for that high employment, and the same person who had defended Turin so well, when it was besieged by the Duke of Orleans in 1706, till it was relieved by the Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene. He was of a courteous and affable disposition, but exact and steady in the Administration of Justice; by which means he had suppressed the Banditti, who used to infest the Country; and had put a stop to the murders that were so frequent in the City, not suffering the Churches to exercise their infamous claim of sanctuary for such flagitious crimes. He did not indeed affect that show of grandeur, which the Italians are fond of; but, as his frugal manner of living freed him from the necessity of oppressing them, so there was never any complaint of that kind against him. He was very zealous for the interests of his Master, which he promoted by just and wise measures; and a certain conformity of manners, wherein he and the Admiral resembled each other, begat such a quick confidence and friendship between them, as helped to carry on the service of the common cause with unusual harmony and dispatch.

The fleet sailing with a gentle gale into the Bay of Naples, consisting of twenty-one sail of the line of battle, most of them great ships, and three of them bearing flags, afforded such a spectacle, as had never been seen in those parts before. The whole City was in a tumult of joy and exultation. The shore was crowded with multitudes of coaches and people; and such an infinite number of boats came off, some with provisions and refreshments, others out of curiosity and admiration, that the sea between the fleet at anchor and the shore was literally covered. The Viceroy, being incommoded with the gout, sent Colonel Count Hamilton to make his compliments to the Admiral, and to let him know the feeble condition he was in; but that, nevertheless, he intended to come off, and make him a visit. The Admiral returned the civility by his first Captain, who, waiting on the Viceroy, told him, the Admiral was sensible of the honour he intended him, but desired he would not give himself the trouble, especially as he was ill; and that he would immediately wait on his Excellency. The Admiral going ashore, attended by the Flag-officers and Captains, in their boats, was saluted, at his landing, by all the cannon round the City and Castles, and was carried to the Duke de Matalone's palace, which had been prepared for his reception during his stay at Naples. From thence he was conducted to Court through an infinite throng of people, with the greatest acclamations of joy, and all the honours and ceremonies paid to a Viceroy; where entering into Conference with Count Dawn, he learnt, that the Spanish army, consisting of about thirty thousand men, commanded by the Marquis de Lede, had landed the 2d of July, N. S. in Sicily, and had soon made themselves masters of the City and Castles of Palermo, and of great part of the Island; that they had taken the Town of Messina, and were then carrying on the siege of the Citadel; that the Viceroy did not know how far the Piedmontese garrison was to be depended on; but that they must soon be obliged to surrender, if not relieved. That the last letters he had received from Vienna gave hopes, that the King of Sicily might be entered, by this time, into a particular Alliance with the Emperor, having desired the assistance of his troops, and agreed to receive them into the Citadel. The next morning the Viceroy visited the Admiral, and, renewing their Conference on the measures to be taken in that conjuncture of affairs, it was agreed, that the Viceroy should send General Wetzel with two thousand German foot in Tartans to Messina, to relieve the Citadel and Fort St. Salvador; and, as the Admiral was directed by his orders to obstruct any attempts of the Spaniards on Sicily, he consented to take those troops under his protection; and, accordingly, the transports being got 1718. got ready, he sailed with them the 6th of August, N. S. from Naples, and arrived the 9th in view of the Faro off Messina.

Here the Admiral paused. He saw with concern a new war rekindled in Europe by the ambition of Spain: He weighed with deep consideration the consequences of his instructions, which made a rupture with that nation unavoidable, if they persisted in their enterprize on Sicily; and being ardently desirous of trying every method of Negotiation, before he proceeded to the extremity of his orders, he dispatched Captain Saunders, his first Captain, to Messina, with a letter to the Marquis de Lede, acquainting him, 'That the King, his Master, being engaged by several treaties to preserve the tranquility of Italy, had honoured him with the command of a squadron of ships, which he had sent into those seas; and that he came fully empowered and instructed to promote such measures, as might best accommodate all differences between the powers concerned. That his Majesty was employing his utmost endeavours to bring about a general pacification, and was not without hopes of success. He therefore proposed to him to come to a cessation of arms in Sicily for two months, in order to give time to the several Courts to conclude on such resolutions, as might restore a lasting peace.' But he added, 'That, if he was not so happy to succeed in this offer of service, nor to be instrumental in bringing about so desirable a work, he should then hope to merit his Excellency's esteem in the execution of the other part of his orders, which were, to use all his force to prevent further attempts to disturb the Dominions his Master stood engaged to defend.' The next morning the Captain returned with the General's answer, 'That it would be an inexpressible joy for his person to contribute to so laudable an end as peace; but, as he had no powers to treat, he could not of consequence agree to any suspension of arms, even at the expence of what the courage of his Master's arms might be put to; but should follow his orders, which directed him to seize on Sicily for his Master the King of Spain. That he had a true sense of his accomplished expressions; but his Master's forces would always be universally esteemed in sacrificing themselves for the preservation of their credit, in which cases the success did not always answer the ideas that were formed.'

The Spanish fleet defeated by Admiral Byng. Hist. Reg. Corbett.

The Admiral had received intelligence, that the Spanish fleet departed from Paradise (which is a road at the entrance of the harbour of Messina) the day before his arrival off the Faro, which made him conclude, that they were retired to Malta; and therefore, upon receiving the Marquis de Lede's answer, he immediately sailed, with intention to come with his squadron before Messina, in order to encourage and support the garrison in the Citadel; but, as he stood in about the point of the Faro towards Messina, he saw two of the Spanish scouts in the Faro; and being informed at the same time by a Felucca, which came off from the Calabrian shore, that they saw from the hills the Spanish fleet lying by, the Admiral altered his design, and sending away General Witzel with the German troops to Reggio, under the convoy of two men of war, he stood through the Faro with his squadron, with all the sail he could, after their scouts, imagining they would lead him to their fleet, which accordingly they did; for before noon he had a sight of their whole fleet lying by, and drawn into a line of battle, consisting of twenty-seven sail of men of war, small and great, besides two fire-ships, four bomb-vessels, seven galleys, and several ships laden with stores and provisions, commanded by the Admiral Don Antonio de Castaneta, and under him four Rear-Admirals, Chacon, Mari, Guevara, and Cammock. On the sight of the English squadron, they stood away large, but in order of battle. The Admiral followed them all the rest of that day, and the succeeding night with small gales North-Easterly, and sometimes calm, with fair weather. The next morning early, the 11th of August, N. S. the English being got pretty near up with them, the Marquis De Mari, Rear-Admiral, with six Spanish men of war, and all the galleys, fire-ships, bomb-vessels, and store-ships, separated from their main fleet, and stood in for the Sicilian shore; upon which Admiral Byng detached Captain Walton in the Canterbury with five more ships, after them; and, the Argyle and Canterbury getting within gun-shot of the headmost ship, about six in the morning, the Argyle fired a shot to bring her to; which she not minding, the Argyle fired another, and the Canterbury, being something nearer, fired another, upon which the Spanish ship fired her stern-chace at the Canterbury, and then the engagement began. The Admiral pursuing the main body of the Spanish fleet, the Orford, Captain Falkingham, and the Grafton, Captain Haddock, came up first with them about ten o'clock, at whom the Spaniards fired their stern-chace guns. The Admiral sent orders to those two ships not to fire, unless the Spaniards repeated their firing; which they doing, the Oxford attacked the Santa Rosa of sixty-four guns, and took her. The St. Carlos of sixty guns struck next, without much opposition, to the Kent, Captain Matthews. The Grafton attacked warmly the Prince of Asturias of seventy guns, formerly called the Cumberland, in which was Rear-Admiral Chacon; but the Breda, Captain Barrow-Harris, and the Captain, Captain Archibald Hamilton, coming up, Haddock left that ship much shattered for them to take, and stretched a-head after another ship of sixty guns, which had kept firing on his starboard-bow, during his engagement with the Prince of Asturias. About one o'clock the Kent, and soon after the Superbe, Captain Maister, came up with, and engaged the Spanish Admiral of seventy-four guns, who with two ships more fired on them, and made a running fight till about three, and then the Kent bearing down upon him, and under his stern, gave him her broadside, and fell to the leeward. Afterwards the Superbe, putting for it to lay the Admiral aboard, fell on his weather-quarter, upon which the Spanish Admiral shifting his helm, the Superbe ranged up under his lee-quarter, on which he struck to her. At the same time the Barfleur, in which was the Admiral, being a stern of the Spanish Admiral within shot, and inclining on his weather-quarter, Rear-Admiral Guevara, and another sixty gun ship, which were to windward, bore down upon him, and gave him their broadsides, and then clapped upon a wind, standing in for the land. The Admiral immediately tacked and stood after them, until it was almost night; but there being little wind, and they galing away out of his reach, he left pursuing them, and stood in to the fleet.

1718. fleet, which he joined two hours after night. The Effex, Captain Rowzier, took the Juno of thirty-six guns; the Mountain, Captain Beverly, and the Rupert, Captain Field, took the Volante of forty-four guns; and Rear-Admiral Delaval in the Dorsetshire took the Isabella of sixty guns. This action happened off Cape Passaro about six leagues distance from the shore. The English received but little damage. The ship, that suffered most, was the Grafton, which being a good failor, her Captain engaged several ships of the enemy, always pursuing the headmost, and leaving those ships, which he had disabled or damaged, to be taken by those, that followed him. Admiral Byng lay by some days at sea, to refit the rigging of his ships, and to repair the damages the prizes had sustained; and the 18th received a letter from Captain Walton giving an account, that he had taken four Spanish men of war, one of sixty guns, commanded by Rear-Admiral Mari, one of fifty-four, one of forty, and one of twenty-four guns, with a bomb-vessel, and a ship laden with arms; and burnt four men of war, one of fifty-four guns, two of forty, and one of thirty guns, with a fire-ship and a bomb-vessel (1).

The Admiral's proceedings after the battle.

The Admiral, having thus received a full account of the whole transaction, dispatched away his eldest son, Mr. Byng, to England; who, arriving at Hampton-Court in fifteen days from Naples, brought the agreeable confirmation of what public fame had before reported, and upon which the King had already written a letter to the Admiral with his own hand (2). Mr. Byng met with a most gracious reception from the King, who made him a handsome present; and sent him back with Plenipotentiary Powers to his father to negotiate with the several Princes and States of Italy, as there should be occasion, and with his Royal Grant to the Officers and Seamen of all the prizes taken by them from the Spaniards.

Remarks on the conduct of the Spaniards, Corbet.

The conduct of the Spaniards in the action of Passaro did not answer the vigour of the resolutions they had taken before it. Upon notice of the approach of the English Squadron, they held a consultation, in which the question was not, Whether they should fight or retreat, but in what station they should expect them; Whether go out from Messina to meet them, or pass through the Faro to the Southward, and, lying by in order of battle, receive them there? Which latter opinion prevailed. But, when the Admiral came up near to them, they soon abandoned their order of battle, and falling into confusion and uncertainty, whether to resist or fly, by doing neither they became an easy prey, and the English might be rather said to have made a seizure, than to have gained a victory. There was indeed some disproportion in the strength of the two fleets; but the inequality was not such, as deterred the Spaniards from a resolution of fighting, though it was but ill supported afterwards in the execution. But this justice is due to the Admiral Castañeta, and to Rear-Admiral Obacon, that they made as good a defence with their own ships, as could be expected, and the former was wounded in both legs. It was reported, that, at a consultation of the Spanish Admirals, Rear-Admiral Cannock gave his opinion, that they should remain at anchor in the road of Paradise, ranging their ships in a line of battle, with their broadsides to the sea; which measure would certainly have given the English Admiral infinite trouble to attack them. For the coast is so bold, that the largest ships could ride with a cable ashore; and, further out, the currents are so various and rapid, that it would have been hardly practicable to get up to them, but impossible to anchor or lie by them in order of battle. Besides, they lay so near the shore, and could have received such assistance of soldiers from the army to man and defend them; and the annoyance, which the Spaniards might have given from the several batteries they could have planted along the shore, would have been such, that the only way of attacking the ships seemed to be by boarding and grappling with them at once, to prevent being cast off by the currents; which would have been a very hazardous undertaking, wherein the Spaniards would have had many advantages, and the English Admiral have run the chance of destroying his fleet, or buying a victory, if he succeeded, very dear (3).

Admiral

(1) Captain Walton was one, whose natural talents were fitter for achieving a gallant action, than describing one; yet his letter on this occasion carries in it such a strain of military eloquence, that it is worth inserting here:

Monsieur le Chevalier Byng.

• Though I have not yet heard from you directly, I am informed of the victory which the fleet has gained under your command, and I was unwilling to delay the satisfaction that my approbation of your conduct might afford you. I thank you for it, and desire you to express my satisfaction to all the brave people who have signalized themselves on this occasion. Secretary

(3) Mr. Corbet, in his account of the expedition to Sicily, inserts here the following digression concerning the affairs of the Spaniards:

The counsels of Spain were, at this time, under the management of two Italians, the Queen and the Abbot Aberoni, whom she had raised to the dignity of Cardinal and Prime Minister. They had vast designs in their view, and by secret intrigues with the King of Sicily, and other Italian Princes and States, had laid no less a scheme, than to exterminate the House of Austria and the Imperial power out of Italy. And it was thought to be owing to the doubts they had of the sincerity of the King of Sicily, that the storm fell first upon his Dominions, which was intended elsewhere. The armament they fitted out was suitable to the greatness of the undertaking; never any Nation sent to sea

Admiral Byng, having collected his ships after the action, put into Syracuse the 19th of August, N. S. where he found Captain Walton and his prizes. Syracuse was at that time blocked up by a detachment of the Spanish army, into which City Count Maffei, the Duke of Savoy's Viceroy, had retreated with difficulty from Parlermo, and had in the place a numerous garrison. But the first and principal point of the Spanish General was to get Messina into his hands, as the safest port for their fleet, and the most proper place to facilitate and secure the conquest of the rest of the Island, and from whence they designed to transport their numerous horse, and the greatest part of their foot, over to Calabria, and to have carried the war into the Kingdom of Naples. The Citadel of Messina was defended by a Piedmontese garrison, commanded by the Marquis d'Andorno; but the Duke of Savoy, being unable to support the siege, had solicited the Emperor for his assistance, and a Convention was made between the Viceroy of Naples and the Count de Bourge, Resident of Savoy, whereby the Viceroy was to send a detachment of German troops, to be admitted into the Citadel on joint and equal terms of command; for which service Baron Wetzel was dispatched away with two thousand foot, as has been before related. But the success of the English fleet had raised such a confidence in the garrison, of their security against any attempts from the Spaniards, that the Resident endeavoured to elude an agreement, the necessity of which he thought no longer subsisted, pretending want of power to make such a concession without an equivalent, but that he would write to his Court for farther orders. This coming to Admiral Byng's knowledge, he represented in strong terms to Count Maffei the unfairness of such a proceeding, and how contrary it was to what he himself had agreed to, in their Conference together the day before, upon that subject. That such a disagreement, at a time that the Citadel was so vigorously attacked by the enemy, might be a means of their taking it, which the reputation of the English fleet would not suffer him to be an idle spectator of; and therefore, if he was resolved to stay till he had instructions from the Court of Turin, he should likewise send to his Court for farther orders; and, in the mean time, would retire from the Island to some other place, to refresh his men, and refit his ships, till he should receive new directions from England. This had such an effect upon the Viceroy, that he gave immediate orders for putting the agreement in execution, and for admitting German troops into the Citadel. This point being adjusted, the Admiral (having sent away Vice-Admiral Cornwall, with such of his ships, as wanted refitting, and all the prizes, to Port-Mabon, with orders to not suffer the least embezzlement to be made, but to preserve every thing intire, till the King's pleasure should be known) failed himself, on the 23d of August, N. S. from Syracuse, and arrived, the 26th, at Reggio, where General Wetzel informing him, that he hourly expected a reinforcement of four thousand men from Naples, which, with those he had with him, and the garrison in the Citadel, would make about nine thousand men, and, upon their arrival, he should form a project for raising the siege of the Citadel, if the Admiral would stay to countenance and protect him with his fleet; he readily consented, knowing the extreme importance of not letting Messina fall into the hands of the enemy, and being directed by fresh orders from England to do all he could to prevent it. But, those forces proving insufficient for the execution of the intended project, the General contented himself, with supplying the Citadel from an army so numerous, so well appointed, and so provided with all necessaries for a distant expedition; the least implement was not forgotten. All which was owing to the indefatigable care of Don Joseph Patinbo, a man of great abilities, who went in the expedition, and had the absolute direction and management of the whole enterprize, except the military command. The world was amazed to see Spain exerting a vigour, she had not shewn for above a Century past. Some of the principal prisoners, and Castaneta himself, assured the Admiral, that they intended, the summer following, to have at sea fifty sail of the line of battle; which the great preparations in the ports of Biscay, and other ports of Spain, made very probable. Those in Biscay, which were one man of war of seventy guns, and two of sixty, newly built, with an incredible quantity of timber, pitch and tar, and other navel stores, for building more, were all destroyed by an English squadron, assisted by a detachment which the Duke of Berwick spared from his army, at the solicitation of Colonel Stanhope the English Minister, who contrived the design, and, serving as a Volunteer in the enterprize, principally contributed to the execution of it.

It should seem but ill policy in a Court, intent on such mighty designs, to provoke and irritate, without cause, a Nation, the most capable in the world of thwarting and defeating them. And yet they seemed to make it a studied point to vex and distress the English by all manner of ways in their commerce, inasmuch that their trade with Spain was almost ruined and lost. They demanded arbitrary and heavy duties from the English factories residing in their ports, from which the treaties expressly exempted them; and, upon refusal of payment, their houses were surrounded by soldiers, their warehouses and chests broken open, and their goods sold at public outcry. The Royal Officers used them with such injustice and insolence, as if they knew they made their Court by doing so. Every post brought complaints to the English Minister at Madrid, of new grievances and oppressions. The memorials delivered to that Court for redress were numberless, without the least regard had to them. When any transportation of troops was intended, they immediately embargoed all the English Merchant-ships in their ports, compelling their Masters, with great circumstances of severity, to enter into their service, imprisoning them in common goals, if they refused, and obliging them to unload their cargoes, though perishable, and consigned to other markets. They proceeded so far in their unjust treatment, that their Cruizers brought into the ports of Spain whatever English Merchant-ships they met with in the open sea, though bound to Italy, or other parts, and compelled them to unload their cargoes, and enter into their service. Such, as were not used by them for transports, had their seamen taken away to serve in their men of war. Rear-Admiral Cannock pressed no less than sixty for his own ship, and one of the Masters, endeavouring to keep his men, had both his ears cut off. The battle of Passaro was fortunate to those poor people, for, when the issue of it was known, forty-five English transports made their escape from Messina to Reggio, several of them laden with military stores and provisions; and, their Masters applying to the Admiral, he granted them a convoy to the ports in Italy, where they desired to go; but some chose to stay and enter into the Emperor's service, to transport his troops from Genoa and Naples to Sicily.

1718. from time to time with fresh troops from Reggio; notwithstanding which, the Spaniards pushed on the siege with so much vigour and success, that the Governor surrendered the Citadel by capitulation, on the 29th of September, N. S. to the great surprize and dissatisfaction of the Germans. The Piedmontese part of the garrison was transported by sea to Syracuse, and the Germans to Reggio.

Admiral Byng receiving advice, that Rear-Admiral Cammock with three Spanish men of war, and as many frigates, which had escaped from the battle, was at Malta, and that a rich English Merchant-ship, homeward bound from Turkey, was detained in the port, and in some danger; as likewise five Sicilian galleys, which had taken refuge there ever since the arrival of the Spanish fleet in Sicily; he stood over to that Island, where he learnt that Rear-Admiral Cammock had failed from thence five days before with four ships, which he had cleaned there. The Marquis de Rivaroles, General of the Sicilian galleys, coming off to the Admiral, made great complaints of the partiality and ill usage of that Government, in suffering him to be exposed to daily affronts from the Spaniards, and prayed his protection and assistance to get away from thence; upon which the Admiral sent his first Captain with his compliments to the Grand Master, and desired, that those galleys might have free liberty to come out to him. The Grand Master sent off three great Crosses of the order to the Admiral, and with much politeness gave him all the assurances possible of freedom for the galleys to do what they pleased; upon which the Admiral sent word to the Marquis to come out. But he returning an answer, that the Spanish ships had laid themselves in the way to stop his passage, and threatening to sink him, if he offered to stir, the Admiral sent to the Grand Master a second message, that, if he suffered the neutrality of the ports to be violated, or any ill treatment to be given to the galleys, he should take the measures, that would be necessary on that occasion; but the Grand Master protesting, that no violence should be used, and that he would be answerable for it, the Admiral sent again to the Marquis to come out, assuring him, that, if the Spaniards offered the least obstruction, he would assist him to destroy them in the very port. But, the Marquis continuing under great perplexity and terror, the Admiral, tired with his delay, sent him word, that he was well satisfied of the honour of the Grand Master in preserving the privilege of the port; and therefore, if he would not make use of the present opportunity, he should suspect, that his fears were affected, and used only as an artifice to stay there, and would give himself no farther trouble about him; and accordingly weighed, in order to depart; but this message wrought so upon the Marquis, that he immediately hastened out with his galleys, without any obstruction from the Spaniards; but they were in so miserable condition, that the Admiral was forced to lend them seamen and pilots to navigate them, and caulkers to stop their leaks. The Turkey ship came out likewise, and joined the Admiral, who sent the galleys under a convey to Syracusa; and having seen the Turkey Merchant-ship clear of danger, he arrived the 2d of November, N. S. in the bay of Naples, from whence he sent Rear-Admiral Delaval, with two eighty gun-ships and a fire-ship, home to England. Here the Count de Luzan, son-in-law to the Marquis de Rialp, Secretary of State at Vienna, brought the Admiral a gracious letter from the Emperor written with his own hand, and his picture set round with large brilliant diamonds.

The taking of Messina was a point of great consequence, as it made the Spaniards masters of all Sicily, except Syracusa, Trapani, and Melazzo (where the Duke of Savoy had still garrisons) and as it deprived the English fleet of a port to winter in, there being no other good harbour in those parts. The Emperor saw before him a difficult task, to get possession of an Island, which the Quadruple Alliance had designed for him. The Duke of Savoy had only the three aforementioned towns to deliver up, which he scrupled doing without the promised equivalent; and the Emperor had it not to give him. But, tho' the Emperor had gotten these places, the recovery of the rest of the Island was to be a work of conquest. The Spaniards had an army well appointed, well paid, and the affections of the people on their side. They would have little feared any enterprizes of the Germans, if the sea had been neutral between them.

The Duke of Savoy finding himself under circumstances of difficulty, the Spaniards, on the one hand, taking most of his towns in Sicily from him, and the Emperor, on the other, by virtue of the Quadruple Alliance, demanding his evacuation of the rest, whilst the Island of Sardinia, allotted to him by the same treaty, remained in the hands of the enemy; and having jealousy, that, when the Imperialists had obtained their Island, he should be left to get the other as he could, and desiring to have some reasonable security for the one, before he parted with his interest in the other, a Convention was made between those Princes at Vienna (Monsieur de St. Saphorin, the King's Minister, assisting) dated 29 December, 1718, whereby it was agreed to form an army for an expedition to Sardinia as soon as possible, towards which the Emperor was to furnish six thousand five hundred foot, and six hundred horse, at his own expence, and the Duke of Savoy was intirely to evacuate Sicily, and join five thousand men of his troops from that Island to act with the Imperialists on that service; and in the mean time, till they could be transported from Sicily, they were to co-operate with the Germans against the common enemy. This treaty of Convention was sent to Naples for the Viceroy, the Duke of Savoy's Minister, and Admiral Byng, to consult together of the best means to put it in execution. The business hung long perplexed with difficulties on the part of the Minister of Savoy, from a jealousy and distrust of the Germans; but the Admiral interposing, and removing by degrees all scruples, an agreement was at last concluded and signed between them, upon which the Minister of Savoy delivered to the Viceroy his Master's orders to Count Maffei to evacuate the towns in his possession to the Imperialists. But the expedition against Sardinia did not go on, as will be shewn hereafter.

The winter being now set in, the Viceroy and Admiral Byng held frequent consultations together, about the farther operations against the enemy. It was judged absolutely necessary to maintain the post of Melazzo, which had been long blockaded, and was now besieged by the Spanish

1718. Spanish army, both sides making this their principal point during the winter, the one holding their footing in the Island by means of this place; the other, by taking it, to shut them out. All the troops from Reggio, and some horse from Naples, being got into the town, under the command of the Generals Caraffa and Veterani, it was resolved, in a Council of war held the 14th of October, to fall upon the enemy. Accordingly, the next morning by break of day, they marched out in two columns, the first consisting of six, and the other of five battalions, and attacked the Spanish intrenchments, which they carried, after an engagement of four hours, and got possession of their camp in the center and on the left, with three pieces of cannon. But, the soldiers falling to plunder, the Spaniards rallied on their right; and the Marquis de Leds coming up at the same time with fresh troops from Messina, who had lain short the night before, they attacked the Germans in their turns, and drove them back into their camp, under the walls of the town, whose artillery protected the retreat, and prevented a greater slaughter. In the action, about twelve hundred men were killed and wounded on each side, and General Veterani was taken.

Melazzo is an ill fortified town, on the North-side of the Island of Sicily, not far distant from the Faro, standing on a neck of land, which runs out into the sea like an Isthmus. Caraffa being recalled to Naples, Baron Zumjungen arrived at Melazzo the 27th of November, N. S. to command the forces; and being followed by the Generals Wachtendonck and Seckendorf, with large supplies of troops from Italy, and the place being too strait to contain them, they carried their intrenchments out of the town, within less than pistol shot of those of the Spaniards; so that, neither side being able to advance farther, both lay all the winter in an unwholesome situation, it being low bad ground, and the trenches filled with water in rainy, and by the sea in blowing weather; so that great numbers of men perished on both sides. The Germans had no provisions but what came from time to time in small imbarcations from Calabria, and other parts of Naples. Rear-Admiral Cammock, who was got with his squadron into Messina, and the inhabitants of the Island of Lipari, who are esteemed bold mariners, and have many armed vessels, lay in the way of intercepting those supplies; and the least disappointment must have starved the garrison, for their consumption was very great, and they had no magazines. It was very hard service, unknown and astonishing to the pilots of that Country, to employ ships cruising in those dangerous seas, during the rigour of the winter. For, when the westerly or northerly winds blow, there is so little sea-room in that narrow station, and the currents set in so strong upon the Calabrian shore, accompanied with a vast rolling sea, that it is extremely difficult for ships to work to windward, or indeed to hold their own, and avoid standing on a lee-shore. The Admiral had appointed a squadron, under the command of Captain Walton, to cruise upon this station, to hinder Rear-Admiral Cammock from coming out of the Faro, and to secure the passage of the vessels with provisions for the German camp. It chanced to prove such tempestuous weather, that no provisions had arrived in a month at Melazzo, and Captain Wal- ton was blown off from his station, and had not been seen nor heard of in six and twenty days. Rear-Admiral Cammock took hold of this opportunity to get out of Messina, the moment the weather abated, and, appearing before Tropea with English colours, sent a letter a-shore to the Governor, under a fictitious name of one of the English Captains, acquainting him, that he was come thither by Admiral Byng's orders, to convey the imbarcations with provisions to Melazzo, and pressed him to dispatch them away, the place being in the utmost distress. Had this stratagem succeeded, it would have intirely ruined the Emperor's affairs in Sicily; but the Governor happened to be a wary man, and observing the letter to be written on Genoa paper, from that single circumstance conceived a suspicion, which made him refuse to send the imbarcations out to him. In the mean time, the Admiral, being made sensible of the extremities the Germans were reduced to, had no other way left, than to fill four men of war (just arrived at Naples from Port-Mabon) with provisions, directing their Captains to attempt, at all hazards, to get to Melazzo, which three of them did with much difficulty and danger (the fourth being disabled by bad weather) and came providentially to the relief of the garrison, at a time they must otherwise have surrendered to the enemy, or perished by famine. A few days after, Captain Walton recovered his station, upon the sight of whom, Rear-Admiral Cammock retired into Messina.

Melazzo being rescued from danger, and reinforced daily with fresh supplies of men and provisions, the Spaniards, despairing to take the place, turned the siege into a blockade, and worked hard in fortifying their own intrenchments, in order to keep the Germans pent up in the town, and obstruct the descent of the army expected in the spring.

The Admiral having made a proper disposition of ships in different stations round the Island, to keep the sea open to the Germans, and shut to the Spaniards, was preparing to depart with the rest, that had suffered by bad weather, to rest at Port-Mabon, when the Viceroy intreated him to assist at a Conference to be held at the Palace, where he met the General Caraffa, Wetzel, and the Marquis de Fuencalada, General of the Neapolitan galleys. The Viceroy opened it by acquainting them, 'That, a truce with the Turks being concluded, Prince Eugene was sending from Hungary a body of about six thousand horse, and ten thousand foot, which, added to the troops in Melazzo, was thought a sufficient number for the conquest of the Island. That they would probably arrive at Naples in the beginning of March, and he should be glad to know their sentiments of the properest place for their landing in Sicily, and touched on several propositions about it, as at Syracusa or Taormina, on the East-side of the Island, or at Patti on the North-side, not far Westward from Melazzo.? General Caraffa objected to the landing at Syracusa, 'as it would be a means of prolonging the war: That the place was too distant from Melazzo; and, Augusta and Catania lying in the way, the siege of those places would cost more time and men, than could be spared, besides the garrisoning them afterwards. That their march from thence lay for the most part over barren mountains, amongst a disaffected people,

1718. people, where they should find no subsistence but what they carried with them; and that passing afterwards through narrow defiles into the plain of Melazzo, where the enemy lay, was to attack them at too great a disadvantage: And therefore he concluded for seeking the enemy as soon as possible, and for that end to land as near to them as might be.' General Wetzel, being next to speak, preferred the landing at Syracusa, 'as it would be a work of ease and safety, and done without interruption: That it would probably draw some of the enemy's force that way, and so relieve the troops in Melazzo: That it would expose the army too much to land in the neighbourhood of the enemy, who, seeing them approaching from the sea, would easily guess at the place they designed to land, and, leaving a guard in their camp, march a sufficient body of troops to oppose the descent, which was a difficult and tedious work in itself, especially with regard to the debarking the horse.' Caraffa asking him, how long he thought the enemy might be marching to the landing-place, after they knew where it would be, and Wetzel allowing eight hours, Caraffa replied, the foot could be all landed in that time, and formed into proper order to receive the enemy, and the landing the horse might be afterwards a work of leisure. But Wetzel adhered to his opinion. The General of the galleys next, in a very long discourse, 'excused himself from giving any opinion upon a subject, that related to the land-service, and, referring himself to what the two Generals had said before him, concluded, that great caution ought to be taken, which ever opinion should be followed.' The Admiral gathering from their discourse, that part of the expected troops were to embark at Fiume and Triefse, and to come round by sea to Reggio, and probably pass on through the Faro, to Naples, told them, 'That land-forces should be trusted to the sea as little as possible, especially in the early and uncertain season: That, if they landed at Manfredonia on the Atlantic side, the trajectory would be short, and their march more certain to their rendezvous at Naples.' He then went on to deliver his opinion, 'That the troops they expected were not sufficient to recover the Island from the enemy. That it was a great error to hold the Spaniards in contempt, whose behaviour hitherto in Sicily had given no reason for it. That they were become used to arms and hardships, and the Germans would find them like other men. That, according to a calculation he had made, when those troops should be joined to the forces in Melazzo, they would not be able, after leaving the necessary garrisons in the towns, which the Duke of Savoy was to deliver up, to bring into the field a greater number than what the Spanish army was reported to be; and that, without a considerable superiority, little success was to be expected in a Country, where the ill-will of the people towards them, and their inclinations to the Spaniards, were so very evident, that they were to hope for no assistance, but expect every distress from them.' He added, 'That they were not to look upon the enemy as a mouldering army, for, notwithstanding the care of his cruisers, they received frequent recruits from Spain and Sardinia, and even from Italy, in open vessels and boats, which was not always in his power to prevent. And besides, the Marquis de Lede had lately raised four regiments of foot, and one of horse, in the Island itself.' The Viceroy acknowledged the force of the Admiral's reasonings, but lamented the distance of the Court of Vienna, which hindered them from seeing into, and considering enough these difficulties, and who pursued only one maxim, that, if they sent men, they ought to conquer. The Admiral proposed, that an Officer should be sent to Vienna, to represent the posture of affairs to that Court in a better light than they seemed to view them in, and to bring back their final resolutions concerning the operations of the war; and Count Hamilton was pitched upon for that purpose.

The Conference being ended, the Admiral took his leave of the Viceroy, and set sail the 3d of February for Port-Mahon, to refit his ships, and put them in a condition to go on early with the operations of the campaign, leaving his eldest son at Naples to manage his correspondence with the Viceroy, and to inform the Court of England of all occurrences in those parts.

The defeat of the Spanish fleet made a great Complaint noise, and England was upbraided with it as in- of Spain. consistent with the rules of good faith, for the observance of which she had always been so famous.

Cardinal Alberoni, in his letter to the Marquis de Monteleone at London, called it an unworthy action. 'His Majesty (says the Cardinal) approves of the justness of your expressions (1), to expose the breach of faith of that Ministry,

(1) Soon after the news of the action in the Mediterranean, the Marquis de Monteleone wrote a letter to Mr. Secretary Cragg, to which the Cardinal here refers. The letter begins thus:

S I R,

'The news that is spread in the world of Admiral Byng's having attacked the Spanish fleet, and obtained considerable advantages over them, obliges me naturally not to act in any affair, till I receive orders and instructions from the King my Master, concerning an action so surprising and unexpected, and that even seems to agree but very little with the Declarations made to the Court of Madrid by the said Admiral; since they gave to understand, that the English fleet would proceed no farther than as a guarantee to defend the Dominions of the Archduke, in case they were invaded.

Nevertheless, as I cannot doubt in the least but that your Excellency makes serious reflections on the just No. 94. Vol. IV.

resentments which the King, my Master, and all the Spaniards, must needs have, to see themselves thus assaulted and abused, with so much animosity, by a Nation to whom they have shewn the most favour, and see them act contrary to reason, politics, and even against their own interest, to increase the exorbitant power of the Germans in Italy, I cannot dispense with my not acquainting your Excellency with the good and generous intentions of the King my Master, that were communicated to me by his letters of the 20th of August, N. S. as also the orders he gave concerning the arrival of the fleet of Mexico at Cádiz, which in silver and other effects is valued at nine millions of crowns.

His Majesty informs me, that notwithstanding Admiral Byng's declaration, and the intimation that has been given him of the articles lately signed, whereof I send a copy to your Excellency, and that although the said declaration and articles rather denote an obvious design of making war, than that of maintaining 1718. Ministry, in relation to the over-hasty proceedings of Admiral Byng, when nothing was pretended to but a mediation, to facilitate the project of peace, or, at most, to defend the territories actually in the possession of the Archduke in Italy, when my Lord Stanhope was in Spain, at a small distance from the Court, to propose projects of peace and a suspension of arms. In truth (added he) no impartial person can hear, without surprize, that the fleet of his Britannic Majesty did, without any provocation, necessity, or pretence, and forgetting the title of peaceful Mediator, which his Master assumes, attack the fleet of Spain, only to frustrate the expedition against Sicily, after having been at Naples to concert with Count Daun to base an action; received great sums of money, by way of supposed arrears, and, finally, after having come near to Messina, and sent trusty Officers to confer with the Commanders of the King's army, and to assure them, that he would commit no act of hostility.

The best part of Europe (continued the Cardinal) is impatient to hear how the British Ministry can justify so rash a violence. He said, the preserving the neutrality of Italy was a weak argument, since every one knew, that neutrality had long been at an end, and that the Princes, guaranties of the treaty of Utrecht, were entirely free, not only by the scandalous breaches of the Austrians, in the evacuation of Catalonia and Majorca, but also because the guaranty was no longer binding, than till a peace was made with France. He reproached the British Ministry for reviving and supporting the neutrality, not by an amicable mediation, but by open force, and by artfully abusing the confidence and security of the Spaniards. In proof of what he advanced, he observed, that Admiral Byng, struck with remorse of his unjust conduct, alledged, in his account of the engagement, contrary to the truth, that the Spanish ships drew up first, in a line of battle, and fired upon the English. If he had no design to attack them, Why did he pursue them from the Faro to Syracuse? Why did he send four of the prime sailors of his fleet to come up with them?

On the contrary, Mr. Secretary Craggs, in his answer to the Marquis de Monteleone's letter (referred to by the Cardinal) said, that it appeared by the Admiral's account that the Spaniards began the hostilities: That the action might well be expected by his Catholic Majesty, and therefore ought not to have surprized him, since Admiral Byng, by his letter of the 20th of June, O. S. plainly informed him of his instructions, to which a haughty answer was returned, bidding him follow his orders (1).

Whether hostilities were begun by the English or by the Spaniards, or whatever irregularities there were in the proceedings on either side, the action was not only decisive, but necessary to disconcert the Cardinal's projects, which tended to no less than the involving all Europe in a war, the flames whereof had been so lately extinguished. This is sufficient to justify, in the eyes of true Politicians, a slight breach of faith, supposing there had been any. The Cardinal could never recover this shock; his complaints and invectives, to which he had recourse, a perfect understanding between the two Nations, and undertaking an impartial mediation; yet it is resolved not to make the least change in any thing that relates to trade; that the effects arrived in the said fleet shall be delivered as before to those to whom they belong; and, in a word, that it is his Majesty's will and intention that the treaty of Peace and Commerce should be religiously observed, and that the English should continue to enjoy all the advantages and grants that were given them heretofore.

This last and so singular instance of his Majesty's justice and moderation ought not certainly to have been prevented by the said event, of which he must have received the news a few days after he had given so evident a mark of his favourable dispositions towards the English Nation.

The article mentioned in this letter were delivered by Earl Stanhope to the Court of Madrid, a day or two after the action of Syracuse, and were as follows:

I. That the Catholic King shall have three months to accept of the treaty, reckoning from the day it was signed.

II. That, if his Catholic Majesty does not accept of the same within the said term of three months, then the Confederates shall supply the Emperor with such forces as are stipulated in the treaty of Alliance.

III. That if, in consequence to the assistance given to the Emperor, the King of Spain should declare or make war against any one of the Confederates, either by invading his Dominions, or seizing his subjects, ships, or effects, then the other Confederates shall immediately declare and make war against his Catholic Majesty, and shall carry on the same till such time as satisfaction shall be given to their wronged Ally.

IV. That, in case his Catholic Majesty should refuse to accept of the said treaty, the Confederates shall unanimously dispose of his expectations on the Dominions of Tuscany and Parma, in favour of some other Prince.

V. That the Emperor shall not act within the said term of three months, upon condition that the King of Spain does not act on his side; but that, if his Catholic Majesty, instead of accepting the said treaty, should within the said term act any hostilities, which might prevent the execution of any disposition of the said treaty, then the Allies shall immediately, and without waiting the expiration of the said term, supply the Emperor with such forces as are therein stipulated.

(1) As to the favours shewn the English in regard to their trade (mentioned in Monteleone's letter) Mr. Craggs said, he had the King's commands to repeat the following grievances:

1. Impolts have been laid on our merchandizes, directly contrary to our treaties of Commerce with the Crown of Spain.

2. Several kinds of goods have been prohibited, which are expressly allowed by the same treaties.

3. The schedules for their annual vessels have been denied the South-Sea Company, contrary to the express letter of the treaty; without any better reason given for it, than that it was not for the convenience of the Court of Madrid to grant them.

4. Our Merchant-ships have been seized in all the ports of Spain: The Spanish men of war and privateers have brought them in by force; have obliged them to take out their cargoes, and, to their inexpressible loss, have constrained them to transport the troops, horses, ammunition, &c. for this very expedition which has disordered the affairs of all Europe. I am even assured what I can scarce believe, that owners of these vessels, for endeavouring to struggle with such unheard of proceedings, have had their ears cut off: And that the first thing done by the Spaniards, upon their entering Messina, was to thrust the King's Consul into prison. He then desired him to examine how consistent these things are with the favourable declaration he had made for the trade of Great-Britain.

1718. could not restore his designs, and served only to throw him from that high station, where chance much more than merit had placed him. But, before his fall, he made those two Princes very uneasy, whose superior genius had defeated his projects.

As King George had several reasons for assembling the Parliament, he fixed the day of meeting by Proclamation to the 11th of November. He not only wanted to have the steps he had taken approved, but also to be authorized to support them. Besides, he was acquainted with the enterprising genius of Cardinal Alberoni, knew, he breathed nothing but vengeance, and was preparing some design in favour of the Pretender, as appeared by some expressions which had dropped from him. He was not ignorant that too many were ready for a second Rebellion, which perhaps might succeed, unless proper measures to prevent it were taken. All these considerations induced him to have a speedy recourse to the Parliament.

On the day appointed, the King came to the House of Peers, and opened the Session with the following speech, which was read by the Lord Chancellor to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"SINCE your last recess, I have, by the Blessing of Almighty God, concluded such terms and conditions of peace and alliance between the two greatest Princes of Europe, as will, in all human appearance, induce others to follow their example, and make any attempts to disturb the public tranquillity, not only dangerous, but impracticable.

"These engagements, I am persuaded, will be so much the more agreeable to all my good subjects, as they bind the contracting powers to support the Succession to these Kingdoms in my Family, to which some were not at all, and others not so fully bound by any former treaties.

"During the whole course of these Negotiations, a most strict regard has been had to the interest of Spain, and better conditions have been stipulated for that King, than were insisted upon in his behalf, even at the treaty of Utrecht. But the war in Hungary (which, by our mediation, is since happily ended) having tempted the Court of Spain unjustly to attack the Emperor, and the hopes they have since conceived of raising disturbances in Great-Britain, France, and elsewhere, having encouraged them to believe, that we should not be able to act, in pursuance of our treaties, for the defence of the Dominions invaded by them, nor even to the support of those other essential and necessary conditions of the treaty of Utrecht, which provide against the great Monarchies of Europe being at any time hereafter united under one Sovereign; they have not only persisted in such a notorious violation of the public peace and tranquillity, but have rejected all our amicable proposals, and have broke through their most solemn engagements for the security of our commerce.

"To vindicate therefore the faith of our former treaties, as well as to maintain those, which we have lately made, and to protect and defend the trade of my subjects, which "has in every branch been violently and unjustly oppressed, it became necessary for our naval forces to check their progress. It was reasonable to hope, that the success of our arms, the repeated offers of friendship, which I have never ceased to make in the most pleasing manner, and the measures taken in concert with the Emperor and the most Christian King to restore the public tranquillity, would have produced a better disposition in the Court of Spain; but I have received informations, that, instead of listening to our reasonable terms of accommodation, that Court has lately given orders at all the ports of Spain, and of the West-Indies, to fit out Privateers, and to take our ships.

"I am persuaded, that a British Parliament will inable me to resent such treatment, as becomes us; and it is with pleasure, that I can assure you of the ready and friendly resolution of our good Brother the Regent of France, to concur and join with me in the most vigorous measures.

"The firm confidence I repose in the affection of my people, together with my earnest desire to ease them of every charge not absolutely necessary, determined me, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of our great Alliance, to make a very considerable reduction of our land-forces; nor could I better express, than by so doing, how little we apprehend the attempts of our enemies to disturb the peace of my Kingdoms, even tho' Spain should think fit to continue some time in war. Our naval force, employed in concert with our Allies, will, I trust in God, soon put a happy end to the troubles, which the ambitious views of that Court have begun, and secure to my subjects the execution of the many treaties in force relating to our commerce.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I must desire you to grant me such Supplies, as will inable me to carry on the service of the year. I have given orders to have the proper estimates laid before you, whereby you will perceive, I have reduced the expence as much as our circumstances can well admit. I have the pleasure to observe to you, that the funds, appropriated for sinking the public debts, have answered above expectation. I must, however, recommend to you to consider of proper methods for improving them, by preventing the frauds and abuses daily committed in the public revenues, not doubting, in all your proceedings, you will have that regard to the inviolable preservation of the public credit, which may quiet the minds of all those, that have trusted to parliamentary engagements.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"There never was a time when your unanimity, your vigour and dispatch, were more necessary to so many good ends, as those we have now in view. I have done my part. It remains with you to give the last finishing to this great work. Our friends and our enemies, both at home and abroad, are waiting the event of your resolutions. And I dare promise

1718. " promise myself, that the first have nothing to " apprehend, nor the other to hope from your " conduct in this important juncture, who have,
 " during the whole course of my Reign, given " such lively proofs of your zeal and affection to
 " my Person, and of your love to your Country."

How plausible and important soever this speech might be, it occasioned great debates. The addresses that were to be presented drew the attention of both parties: On the manner in which they should be expressed, depended, as it were, the operations of the Session.

Debates on an address of thanks.

 Pr. H. C.

The King was no sooner withdrawn, but the Lord Carteret moved for 'an address of thanks to his Majesty, for his care in preserving the public peace, and the balance of power in Europe: For the considerable reduction of the land-forces; and for having obtained further securities of the Succession in his Family: As also to congratulate the seasonable success of his naval forces; and to assure him, that the House would support him in the pursuit of those prudent and necessary measures he had taken to secure the trade and quiet of these Kingdoms, and the tranquility of Europe.' The Lord Carteret was seconded by the Lord Tenham; but several Lords excepted against the congratulating the King upon the seasonable success of his naval forces, and the promise to support him in the pursuit of those prudent and necessary measures he had taken, because it was, in effect, to approve a sea-fight, which might be attended with dangerous consequences, and give the sanction of that August Assembly to measures, which, upon examination, might appear either to clash with the laws of Nations or former treaties, or to be prejudicial to the trade of Great-Britain. That, according to the constant usage of that House, they ought to proceed with the utmost caution and maturest deliberation, in an affair, wherein the honour, as well as the interest of the Nation, were so highly concerned. And Lord Strafford insisted, 'That, before they approved the sea-fight, they ought to be satisfied whether the same happened before or after the signing of the Quadruple Alliance; and therefore moved for an address, that Sir George Byng's instructions might be laid before the House.'

To this it was answered by Earl Stanhope, 'That there was no manner of occasion for such an address, since, by his Majesty's command, he had already laid before the House the treaties, of which the late sea-fight was a consequence; and, in particular, the treaty for a defensive Alliance between the Emperor and his Majesty, made at Westminster the 25th of May, 1716; and the treaty of Alliance for restoring and settling the public peace, signed at London the 22d of July, O. S. After this, he accounted at large for the justice and equity of those treaties, which were calculated to preserve, restore, and settle the peace of Europe, by rendering the treaty of Utrecht effectual, particularly in preventing the union of the two great Monarchies of France and Spain under one Sovereign, and securing the Succession of these Kingdoms in his Majesty's Family. At the same time he shewed, how the Court of Spain had violated the treaty of Utrecht, and acted against the public faith, in attacking the Emperor's Dominions, while he was engaged in a war against the enemies of Christendom; and in what manner they had rejected his Majesty's friendly offices, and repeated offers of mediating an accommodation between the Emperor and his Catholic Majesty. To which purpose he gave the House an account of his late Journey to, and Negotiations in, Spain. He added, that it was high time for Great-Britain to check the growth of the naval power of Spain, in order to protect and secure the trade of the British subjects, which had been violently oppressed by the Spaniards: To which purpose several letters were read. He concluded with observing, that both with relation to Sir George Byng's instructions, and in all other respects, in this whole affair his Majesty had acted by the advice of his Privy Council: That he was one of that number: And he thought it an honour to have advised his Majesty to these measures, because he was persuaded they intirely agreed with the honour and interest of his Country: That he doubted not, but, upon the strictest examination, those measures would be approved by all true Englishmen, and that he was ready to answer for them with his head.' This speech made a great impression on the whole Assembly; and though several Peers still urged, that the making war, before the declaring of it, was a manifest violation of the laws of Nations; and others raised less material objections; yet, after a five hours debate, it was carried for the address, as moved by the Lord Carteret, by eighty-three votes against fifty. The principal Speakers on the Court-side were, the Lords Carteret and Tenham, and the Earls of Sunderland and Stanhope; and, on the other side, the Dukes of Bucks, Devonshire, and Argyle; the Earls of Nottingham, Cowper, Oxford, and Ilay, the Lords North and Grey and Hartcourt.

In the mean time the same affair was debating in the House of Commons. The Lord Hinchinbroke moved, that the House in an address of thanks should declare their intire satisfaction in those measures, which the King had already taken for strengthening the Protestant Succession, and establishing a lasting tranquility in Europe; and particularly in relation to the Crown of Spain; and their resolution to enable him, in concurrence with his Allies, not only to resent the injuries, that Crown had already done to our commerce, in breach of the treaties subsisting between the two Nations, but to support him in the most effectual manner, in such further measures, as he should judge necessary to compleat the public tranquillity in Europe, and to check the growth of that naval power which must otherwise prove dangerous to the trade of these Kingdoms, and to the repose of Europe. This motion was attended with a very warm debate (1). The opposing side chiefly objected to the words intire satisfaction in those measures

(1) The Speakers for the motion were, the Lord Hinchinbroke, the Lord Tyrconnel, Sir David Dalrymple, Mr. Lechmere, Mr. Secretary Craggs, Mr. Smith, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Sir Gilfrid Lawsons, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Aylmer, Mr. Boscowen, Mr. Bladen, and Serjeant Mead; against the motion were, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Hyslop, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Snel, Mr. Hungerford, Mr. Horne, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. Cowper, Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, the Lord Moleworth, and General Ref.

1718. which his Majesty had already taken. In order to have these words left out of the address, it was alleged, 'That it was unparliamentary and unprecedented, on the first day of a Session, to enter upon particulars. That the business in question being of the highest importance, peace or war, deserved the maturest deliberation. That, before they approved the measures that had been taken, they ought to examine the treaties, and the reasons, on which those measures were founded, which must needs take up some time; and therefore they ought, for the present, according to the usual custom, to content themselves with returning his Majesty thanks for his most gracious speech, with general assurances of their zeal and affection for his Person and Government; and then appoint a day to take the speech into consideration.' To this it was answered, 'That, though all applications from this House to the Throne differed according to the various circumstances of affairs, yet there were not wanting precedents to support the expressions excepted against, of which some instances were produced. That the measures, which had been taken, were grounded on treaties, that had been laid before them, and which might be examined into as soon as the House thought fit. But that it was necessary, at this critical juncture, when the eyes of all Europe were fixed on this Parliament, early to come to a vigorous resolution, which would not fail having its due weight abroad.' This was warmly opposed by Mr. Walpole, who urged, 'That it was against the common rules of proceeding in that House, to approve a thing before they knew what it was: That he was thoroughly convinced of, and as ready as any person in that August Assembly, to acknowledge his Majesty's great care for the general peace of Europe, and the interest of Great-Britain: But that the giving sanction, in the manner proposed, to the late measures, could have no other view than to screen Ministers, who were conscious of having begun a war against Spain, and who would now make it the Parliament's war. He concluded with observing, that, instead of an intire satisfaction, they ought to shew their intire dissatisfaction with a conduct, that was contrary to the laws of Nations, and a breach of solemn treaties.' Upon this, Mr. Craggs gave the House an exact account of the measures, which the King and his Ministers had pursued for restoring and securing the tranquility of Europe; and said, in particular, 'That, upon that view, a treaty of defensive Alliance between his Majesty and the Emperor had been signed in May 1716, and by that very Gentleman, then in high station, who now excepted against these measures. That, at the same time, his Majesty sincerely desired and endeavoured to maintain a perfect friendship with the King of Spain, and had even proposed a defensive Alliance to him, before he made one with any other power. That, notwithstanding the engagements his Majesty was under to guarantee the neutrality of Italy, and to defend the Emperor in the possession of his Dominions, which, upon the invasion of Sardinia, might have justified his Majesty's assisting him against Spain, yet the King chose rather to act as a friendly Mediator, and, in concert with the Regent of France, endeavoured to find out means of reconciling the interests of the Emperor and the King of Spain, as the only way to put a stop to the war, that threatened Italy, and in which all Europe might be involved. That the Catholic King was often sollicitated by the British Ministers at Madrid, to concur with his Majesty's good intentions, and to give such instructions to the Spanish Minister here, as would put it in his Majesty's power to stand up for the interests and advantages of Spain in the ensuing Negotiations. That the Catholic King having declined to concert measures with Great-Britain, and demanding, in general, satisfaction for the breaches he pretended the Emperor had made upon the treaty of Utrecht, the balance of power in Europe, and the security and liberty of the Princes and States of Italy; all that his Majesty, with the Regent's assistance, could do, was to obtain of the Emperor such conditions, as were thought most agreeable to his Catholic Majesty; namely, an absolute renunciation of the Monarchy of Spain and the Indies, and a very considerable settlement in Italy for a Prince of Spain, particularly the Great Duchy of Tuscany. That, as the Emperor's pretensions to Sicily were the principal reasons of his opposing the treaty of Utrecht, from which he could not afterwards be brought off by the treaty of Baden, it became necessary, towards an accommodation, to dispose of that Island in favour of his Imperial Majesty, of whom, upon that consideration, his Majesty and the Regent of France obtained the disposition of Sardinia in favour of the King of Sicily. That these were the principal articles of the treaty of Alliance, for restoring and settling the public peace, commonly called the Quadruple Alliance, which was a long while depending, and at last signed here, on the 22d of July 1718. That, in order to support the views of this treaty, and to add weight to the endeavours to restore the tranquility of Europe, his Majesty acquainted the Commons, towards the end of the last Session of Parliament, that he intended to employ a naval force, when it should be necessary; whereupon this House unanimously resolved to return his Majesty their thanks for his unwearied endeavours to promote the welfare of his Kingdoms, and to preserve the tranquility of Europe, and to assure his Majesty, that they would make good such exceedings of men for the sea-service, of the year 1718, as his Majesty, in his Royal wisdom, should find necessary to obtain those desirable ends*. That this unanimous resolution undoubtedly implied an intire satisfaction in the measures his Majesty was, at that time, concerting for preserving the tranquility of Europe; and, if an action has since happened, and in consequence of those measures, this cannot, with any justice, be called the war of the Ministers, but the war of the Parliament. That, however, it was not with design of making war, but only of restoring peace, that his Majesty sent a strong Squadron into the Mediterranean. That, pursuant to this view, as soon as Sir George Byng reached the coast of Spain, he wrote a letter to that King, desiring him to accept his Majesty's mediation, and to desist from the hostilities already begun; offering him his service, either to withdraw his troops, or even to assist him, in case the Emperor should not consent to a suspension of arms, which the Admiral proposed, while an accommodation should be negotiated. That the Spaniards having with haughtiness rejected his Majesty's repeated amicable projects, and not only 1718. perished in the violation of the public peace, by the invasion of Sicily, but likewise broke thro' the most solemn treaties for the security of our trade, it became necessary for his Majesty's naval forces to check these insolent and violent proceedings, as well to maintain the faith of his Majesty's engagements, and prevent the consequences of this war, as to protect and defend the trade of the British subjects, which labours under the heaviest hardships and difficulties.* And this particular was confirmed to the House by Colonel Bladen, who produced a list of many Merchant-ships taken or detained by the Spaniards. Several Members on the opposing side, having, like Mr. Walpole, made solemn professions of their duty and affection to the King, and of their readiness to acknowledge his care and constant endeavours for the security and welfare of his people and the tranquility of Europe; distinguished between his Majesty and his Ministers, and shewed an unwillingness to approve the measures pursued by the latter, till the treaties, on which these measures were founded, had been fully and maturely examined. Mr. Craggs readily admitted of the distinction between the King and his Ministers; adding, 'That he observed, with a great deal of pleasure, how unanimous they were all for the King; and that he should be extremely sorry, if the Ministers should be the occasion of any delay in the House's expressing their duty and affection to him. That, he owned, Ministers were not infallible: That he had the honour to be one of his Majesty's servants, and had gone as great lengths as any in the measures that had been taken; but that he was positive, that, in the course of this whole affair, nothing had been done, that was not intirely consistent with the faith of treaties, and the honour and interest of the nation. That he durst promise, both for himself and the rest of the Ministers, that, if the House came into this vote, which he thought of the highest importance at this critical juncture, no manner of advantage would be taken of it to palliate any faults, which, through human frailty, might have been committed; and that, for his own part, he was ready to undergo the severest examination, whenever the House should think fit to inquire into the conduct of the Ministry.' This speech had great weight with the majority of the House; and Mr. Craggs was so strongly supported, that the address, as moved by the Lord Hinchinbroke, was at last carried by two hundred and ten voices against one hundred and fifty-five. And, on the 13th of November, the Commons, as well as the Lords, presented their address to the King.

No. 94. Vol. IV.

A Supply granted.
Fr. H. C.

The Commons pursuant to their address immediately voted a Supply. They allowed for the sea service thirteen thousand five hundred sailors at 4*l.* a month each, amounting to 702,000*l.* Twelve thousand four hundred thirty-five men were voted for the land service, whose pay amounted to 526,964*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* These sums, with what was voted for making good deficiencies, for the ordinary of the Navy, and other things, amounted in all to 2,257,581*l.* 19*s.* This Supply was raised by a land-tax of three shillings in the pound, the malt-tax, and a lottery for 500,000*l.* The bills for the land and malt-tax were presented, and both passed in one day, a dispatch not to be paralleled in any Parliament since the Revolution.

The King judging by the disposition of the Parliament, that it would be a proper time to execute a design, he had long been meditating, resolved to attempt it this Session. Ever since his Accession to the Throne he had assured the Church of England of his protection, but at the same time declared for a just Toleration, by removing the odious distinctions between Churchmen and Non-conformists. In the former Session he had plainly enough discovered his intention, but the prosecution of it was prevented, by the misunderstanding among the Whigs. The Dissenters, besides the Occasional and Schism bills, lay under the weight of the Sacramental Test. As they had been zealous asserters of the Protestant Succession, they expected to be relieved from these burdens as soon as that Succession took place. To that end consultations had been held the last year, but without any effect*. The affair was now resumed, and debated by the Dissenters in many Meetings, in several parts of the Kingdom. The majority in these meetings were for a general repeal of the acts that they thought hardships upon them, or leaving matters as they stood. But they were assured that the King had pressed the affair to the utmost with the Ministers, and that the Lord Sunderland said, it was impracticable, and to attempt a repeal of the Test would ruin all (1). Upon this the Test was given up, after assurances that the Test-Act should also be repealed in a more proper time. Earl Stanhope therefore was to move for a repeal of the Occasional and Schism Acts passed in the latter end of the Reign of Queen Anne. Accordingly, on the 13th of December, he told the House of Lords, that, in order to unite the hearts and affections of the well-affected to the present Establishment, he had a bill to offer under the title of An Act for strengthening the Protestant interest in these Kingdoms, which he desired might be read. The bill was read, importing in substance a repeal of the acts against Occasional Conformity, and the growth of Schism, and of some clauses in the Corporation and Test-Acts. Many of the Peers were surprized at the bringing in this bill at a time, when none but such as were in the secret expected any such thing; and Earl Stanhope having moved, that it might be read a second time, it occasioned a long debate. The Author of the bill endeavoured to shew 'the equity, justice, reasonableness, and advantage of restoring Dissenters to their natural rights, and of easing them of these stigmatizing and oppressive laws, that had been made against them in turbulent times, and obtained by indirect methods, for no other reason, than because they ever shewed their zealous and firm adherence to the

(1) The King told the Lord Barrington (a Dissenter) 'that, if there were any hopes of carrying the whole, he would not be against it; but, if there were no hopes, as he was assured by his Ministers, he believed the Dissenters were too much his friends, to insist upon a thing which might be infinitely prejudicial to him, without doing them any good; but, on the contrary, a great deal of hurt.'

Repeal of the Schism and Occasional bills

1718. the Revolution and Protestant Succession: Urging, that this desirable union of all true Protestants, as it would certainly strengthen the Protestant interest, so would it rather be an advantage, than any prejudice to the Church of England by law established, which would still be the head of all the Protestant Churches; and the Archbishop of Canterbury become the Patriarch of all the Protestant Clergy.* He was seconded and supported by the Earls of Sunderland and Stamford, and some other Lords: But the Dukes of Bucks, and Devonshire, the Earls of Nottingham, Aylesford, Oxford, Cowper, and the Lord North and Grey, either strenuously opposed the bill, or endeavoured to put off the second reading to a long day. It was alledged in general, 'that this bill, if passed into a Law, instead of strengthening, would certainly weaken the Church of England, by plucking off her best Feathers, investing her enemies with power, and sharing with them the civil and military employments, of which Churchmen only are now in possession.' The Duke of Devonshire in particular suggested, 'That it was irregular to bring in a bill of so great consequence, without previously acquainting the House.' But it was readily answered by Earl Stanhope, 'That his Grace had forgot, that about two years before he had brought in himself, in the same manner, a bill of much greater consequence;' meaning the bill for suspending the Act for Triennial Parliaments. The Earl of Nottingham said, among other things, 'That the Church of England is certainly the happiest Church in the World, since even the greatest contradictions contribute to her support; for nothing could be more contradictory, than a bill, which is said to be calculated to strengthen the Protestant interest, and the Church of England, and which, at the same time, repeals two acts, that were made for her further security.' After which he gave his reasons against the repealing those laws. Earl Cowper made also a long speech against some parts of the bill, and, among other things, said, 'That he had no manner of prejudice against the Dissenters, but rather a tender regard for them: That as he had been bred in, so he had ever communicated with, the Church of England, which he believed to be the best Protestant Church, and the most agreeable to the primitive pattern of Christianity. But that, however, if he had happened to be at Geneva, he would not have scrupled to have communicated with the Protestants there. That he was for giving the Dissenters as much ease, as was consistent with the safety of the Constitution in Church and State, and would readily give his vote for the repealing of the Schism act; but that he could not but oppose that part of the bill now laid before them, whereby part of the Test and Corporation acts were effectually repealed with relation to the Dissenters, because he looked upon those acts as the main bulwark of our excellent Constitution in Church and State, and therefore would have them inviolably preserved and untouched.' The Earl of May said, 'That every body knew he was educated in a different way from the Church of England; but, nevertheless, he could not but be against this bill, because, in his opinion, it broke the Pacta Conventa of the treaty of Union, by which the bounds both of the Church of England and of the Church of Scotland were fixed and settled; and he was apprehensive, if the articles of the Union were broke with respect to one Church, it might afterwards be a precedent to break them with respect to the other.' The Lord North and Grey urged, 'That this was an affair of so great importance, that it ought to be maturely considered and debated in a full House,' and therefore moved, That the second reading might be put off for a month. The Duke of Bucks was of his opinion, but the friends of the bill, being unwilling to let this affair cool by adjourning it so long, proposed, that the second reading might only be put off till the 18th of December, which was agreed to without dividing.

Upon that day, the bill was read a second time, and a motion made for committing it; but, this being opposed by the Earl of Nottingham, and some other Peers, the Earl of Cholmondley suggested, That, before they proceeded any further in an affair, wherein the Church was so nearly concerned, he thought it very proper to have, in the first place, the opinion of that venerable bench, pointing to the Bishops. This being unanimously assented to, the Archbishop of Canterbury stood up, and declared against the bill, for which he gave his reasons, importing in substance, 'That the acts, which by this bill were to be repealed, are the main bulwark and supporters of the established Church. That he had all imaginable tenderness for all the well-meaning conscientious Dissenters; but he could not forbear saying, that some among them made a wrong use of the favour, and indulgence, that was shewn them upon the Revolution, tho' they had the least share in that happy event: And therefore it was thought necessary for the Legislature to interpose, and put a stop to the scandalous practice of Occasional Conformity, which was condemned by the soberest part of the Dissenters themselves. And, as to the act against Schism, though it might carry a face of severity, yet it seemed needless to make a law to repeal it, since no advantage had been taken of it against the Dissenters ever since it was made.' The Archbishop of York (Sir William Dawkes) spoke on the same side, and said, 'That the arguments used the other day for this bill had no more weight with him, than they had with his brother of Canterbury. He urged in particular the danger of trusting the Dissenters, the open and avowed enemies of the Church, with power and authority; and endeavoured to account for the acts against Occasional Conformity and Schism, by saying, they were never to be gained by indulgence.' To that purpose he quoted a passage out of a treatise, intitled, A Persuasive to Lay Conformity, written by Dr. Headley Bishop of Bangor, who, as he said, had, since the writing of that book, embraced and maintained other principles. The Bishop of Bangor answered the Archbishop of York, particularly with relation to the passage quoted out of his treatise. He said, 'He was so far from having altered his principles, that, both before and after he had been promoted to the station he held in the Church, he had endeavoured to bring over the Dissenters; but that he ever was of opinion, that gentle means are the most effectual for that purpose. After this, he shewed at large the unreasonableness and ill policy of imposing Religious Tests, as a qualification for civil or military employments, which abridges men of their natural rights, deprives the State of the service of many of its best subjects, and 1718. and exposes the most sacred institutions and ordinances to be abused by profane and irreligious persons. He also endeavoured to prove, that the Occasional and Schism Acts were, in effect, persecuting laws; and that, by admitting the principle of self-defence and self-preservation, in matters of Religion, all the persecutions of the Heathens against the Christians, and even the Popish inquisition, may be justified. As to the power, of which some Clergymen appeared so fond, and so jealous, he owned, that the desire of power and riches is natural to all men; but that he had learned both from Reason and the Gospel, that this desire must be kept within due bounds, and not intrench upon the rights and liberties of their Fellow-creatures and Countrymen.

After these and several other speeches of the Bishops (1), the debate was adjourned to the next day, when, after some clauses concerning the

(1) Dr. Smalbridge, Bishop of Bristol, urged, 'That the late King William having recommended to both houses from the Throne, That they would leave room for the admission of all Protestants, that were willing and able to serve; and a clause having been thereupon offered to be inserted in a bill depending in the Lords House, to take away the necessity of receiving the Sacrament, to make a man capable of enjoying any office, employment, or place of trust; the clause was rejected by a great majority, as well as another clause (offered also to be inserted in that bill) to prevent the receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper upon any other account than in obedience to the holy institution thereof: Adding, that soon after the Lords addressed King William, 'That he would maintain the Church of England, as by law established.' All which he applied to the present case, and so voted against the bill. He was answered by the Bishop of Gloucester, who, among other things, endeavoured to remove the imputation of hypocrisy cast upon the Dissenters. The Bishop of Lincoln made an historical deduction of the affair, and commended the zeal of a noble Earl, when Secretary of State, in promoting a Comprehension, according to King William's desire. He also took notice, that Religion was ever used by crafty men as a blind and pretence to carry on political designs; and he remembered, in particular, in the late Reign, 'That, while our arms were victorious abroad, the Church was in danger at home; but no sooner was a stop put to that glorious war, than the Church was in a flourishing condition.' The Earl of Nottingham, who was meant by that Prelate, and who was the promoter of the Occasional Bill, and had opposed the bill now in question, thought proper to justify his conduct, by saying, he was in those days but a young man, and had wanted opportunities to know the Dissenters, whom he had since found to be an obstinate sort of people, never to be satisfied. After which he entered upon the merits of the bill, and voted against it. The Bishop of London did the same, and urged, 'That, in all wise Governments, all offices and places of trust are in the hands of those of the National Church; which his Lordship confirmed by what is practised in Sweden.' The Bishop of Rochester spoke also on the same side, and said in substance, 'That he was not in the House at the first reading of this bill, but that the last Session of Parliament he foresaw from the bill about an Alms-house at Bristol, and the bill for applying part of the fund for the building of new Churches to the rebuilding of an old one (St. Giles's) both which he had opposed, that something of this nature would be attempted. That he was sorry he had been a prophet, since, in his opinion, this bill overturned the foundation of the security of the Church. That this bill even struck at the act of Uniformity, which was confirmed by the act of Union, and so was levelled against the Church of Scotland, as well as against the Church of England. For which reason he hoped, those Peers, who represented the Nobility of Scotland, would be against this bill, particularly a noble Lord, who was too great an enemy to Preticraft, to suffer himself to be Assembly-ridden. He concluded with observing, that we live in a changeable Country; and that the hardships, which the Dissenters now bring upon the Church, may one day or other be severely and with more justice retaliated upon them.' Hereupon Dr. Kennet, the new Bishop of Peterborough, spoke strenuously for the bill, and refuted most of the arguments used on the other side. He said, in substance, 'That he did not design to reflect on any of his Brethren for speaking against this bill, because he supposed they did it out of a sincere zeal for the Church: That, for his own part, he did not believe this bill to be against the Church, but rather for its advantage and security; and therefore he was for it: That he observed from history, that the Church was most safe and flourishing, when the Clergy did not affect more power than falls to their share, and were tender of the rights and liberties of their fellow-subjects; but that, when the Clergy promoted arbitrary measures and persecutions, as some did in King Charles the First's Reign, they first brought scandal and contempt upon the Clergy, and, at last, ruin both upon the Church and State.' Then he shewed the abuse of the word Church, which in a true sense is venerable; and illustrated the matter by the words Holy, and Temple of the Lord, which were sacred among the Jews; but, when those words came to be abused so far as to countenance Rebellion, as in the case of Dathan, Corah, and Ahiram, and other wicked practices, then they rather became words of execration. That, in like manner among us, the words Church, and the Church's danger, had often been made use of to carry on sinister designs; and then these words made a mighty noise in the mouth of silly women and children; but that in his opinion the Church, which he defined to be a Scriptural Institution upon a legal establishment, was founded upon a rock, and could not be in danger as long as we enjoyed the light of the Gospel, and our excellent Constitution.' After this he gave his reasons for his being for this bill, and animadverted upon three things, which had been advanced by other Prelates. 1. That the Dissenters got more than the Church by the Revolution, though they had the least share in it. For he shewed, 'they only got a Toleration, which they might have had under King James, if they would have complied with his measures, whereas the Church secured all she now enjoys, which would have been irrecoverably lost, had not the Revolution happened. 2. That the Churchmen, and even the Clergy, shewed more affection to the present Government than the Dissenters during the late Rebellion: To which he answered, 'That by the laws, which by this bill were to be repealed, the Dissenters were then under an incapacity to serve the Government, which evinced the necessity of this bill: And as for a Clergyman, who had given signal proofs of his zeal for the Government in the North, that it was well known he was never rewarded for it, but rather disregarded ever since by his neighbours. 3. As to what had been suggested, That all offices and places of trust ought to be in the hands of those of the established Church, his Lordship said, he hoped they should never draw precedents from Sweden. He concluded with returning thanks to the lay Lords for bearing so long and so patiently with that bench, leaving the issue of this debate to their judgments; and only taking notice, that as the wisdom of Solomon never more eminently appeared than in discovering the true mother of the child; so their Lordships might easily know the reason, why some persons spoke with so much tenderness for the acts, which by this bill were to be repealed.' Dr. Gifford, Bishop of Chyfter, was of the contrary opinion, and, in particular, excepted against a clause in the bill, whereby a punishment or censure was to be inflicted on such Clergymen, as should refuse to administer the Sacrament to any, that desired to receive it; which, he said, was against the Canons of the Church.

(1) St.

1718. the Test and Corporation Acts were agreed to be left out, the bill was committed, and, being read a third time, passed the House, and was sent down to the Commons, where it was also warmly debated; but at last carried by a majority of two hundred and twenty-one against one hundred and seventy (1).

War declared against Spain.

The manner in which the King had, in his speech, mentioned Spain, and his saying, that he was persuaded a British Parliament would enable him to resent such treatment, were plain intimations of his intention to declare war against that Crown. On the 17th of December, the King sent a message to the Commons to acquaint them, that all his endeavours, as well as those of the King of France, to procure redress for the injuries done to his subjects by the King of Spain, to the unspeakable detriment of their trade, or even to obtain a discontinuance of his unjust hostilities, having proved ineffectual, he had found it necessary to declare war against Spain.

After the reading of this message, it was moved for an address to assure the King, that they would with the greatest cheerfulness, and the utmost vigour, assist and support him in the war, till Spain was reduced to accept of reasonable terms of peace, and agree to such conditions of trade and commerce as the Nation was justly entitled to by their several treaties. Mr. Shippen and some others excepted against the motion, or against some expressions in it, which occasioned a warm debate. They alledged, they did not see the necessity of declaring war against Spain, but were rather inclined to believe, the grievances complained of by the Merchants might be amicably redressed. Mr. Stanhope assured the House, that he had presented, at least, five and twenty memorials to the Court of Spain upon that subject without any success. Mr. Metuen endeavoured to account for the dilatoriness of the Court of Madrid in the dispatch of commercial affairs, occasioned by the different regulations in the several provinces and ports of Spain; which might be the reason why the grievances had not been redressed so soon as might have been expected. It was also suggested, that the Ministers had shewn no great concern for the trade and interest of the Nation, since it appeared, by the answer from a Secretary of State to the Marquis de Monteleone's letter, that they would have passed by the violations of the treaties of Commerce, provided Spain had accepted the terms of the Quadruple Alliance; and that his Majesty did not seek to aggrandize himself by any new acquisitions, but was rather inclined to sacrifice something of his own, to procure the general quiet and tranquillity: That nobody could yet tell how far that sacrifice was to extend; but certainly it was a very uncommon piece of condescension (2). Mr. Horatio Walpole made also a long speech, wherein he found fault with the treaty of Quadruple Alliance, particularly as to the disposition of Sicily, in favour of the Emperor, which was a breach of the treaty of Utrecht. Mr. Walpole, his brother, likewise exclaimed against the injustice of attacking the Spanish fleet before a declaration of war. They were answered by Mr. Craggs, and Sir Joseph Jekyll closed the debate with saying: 'That some weeks before, when this affair was first mentioned in the House, he was shy of giving his opinion, because he had not then examined the several steps that had been taken in it; but that now he was fully convinced, that, if there was any injustice, it was on the side of the King of Spain; and that the conduct of his Majesty and his Ministers was entirely agreeable to the law of Nations, and the rules of Justice and Equity. Was it just, added he, in the King of Spain to attack the Emperor's Dominions (Sardinia) while he was engaged in a war with the Turks, without any declaration of war? Was it just in the same Prince to invade the Dominions of one of our Allies, the King of Sicily, without the least provocation? And was it not just in his Majesty to vindicate the faith of his treaties, and to defend and protect the trade of his subjects, which had been violently oppressed?' After these speeches, the address was carried by a majority of a hundred and seventy-eight against a hundred and seven, and presented the next day.

Earl Stanhope brought the same message to the House of Peers, and, the like address being moved for, it was carried without a division.

The Declaration of war was published with the usual solemnities, but not with the same acclamations as when war was proclaimed against France in the two former Reigns. The Declaration was well drawn, and began with an artful turn, which seemed to intimate as if the action of Syracusa had been a consequence of the ill success of the Earl of Stanhope's Negotiations at Madrid. For after the King had mentioned his being guarantee of the neutrality of Italy, his engagement to defend the Emperor's Dominions, and the King of Spain's invasion of Sardinia: 'We did send (says he) our fleet into the Mediterranean this last summer, with a full and earnest intention to make use of its appearance there for setting on foot Negotiations of peace towards recon-

(1) Sir William Thompson having urged against the Schism-Bill, that it deprived parents of their natural right of educating their Children as they pleased, Mr. Shippen answered, 'It was somewhat strange to see so able a Lawyer inconsistent with himself: For, when the twelve Judges were consulted in a case relating to a great Family, he was of the opinion of ten of them, that children may be taken from their parents, and educated as the good of the Nation required.' To this Sir William readily replied, 'That, as he never was consulted, so had he never declared his thoughts, in that nice case hinted by that Gentleman, and therefore he could not with any colour of justice be said to have changed his opinion: But that the Member who taxed him with it, and who thereby declared against the opinion of the ten Judges, if he would be consistent with himself, must now be for the bill that repeals the Schism Act, which restored parents to their natural right.'

The Lord Guernsey proposed the inserting a clause, that any person, when he came to take the Abjuration Oath, in order to his qualification, should acknowledge, that the Old and New Testament were given by Divine Inspiration, and profess his belief of the ever-blessed Trinity. But this motion was rejected. Pr. H. C.

It was observed that the Archbishop Wake had protested against passing the very bill, the repeal of which he now opposed, as did also the Earl of Nottingham, the Duke of Devonshire, and some others.

(2) By the Sacrifice was meant the Cession of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon, which, it was reported, the Regent of France had offered to the King of Spain, in case he would accede to the Quadruple Alliance.

1718. reconciling the parties engaged in war, and thereby preventing the many calamities that must ensue therefrom. And whereas we did likewise, to testify our most sincere inclinations to peace, send our right trusty and right well beloved Cousin and Counsellor James, Earl Stanhope, one of our principal Secretaries of State, to Madrid, with full power and commission to offer our most hearty endeavours for re-establishing the quiet of Europe, and for cultivating and improving the friendship of the King of Spain. And whereas, notwithstanding all the instances we could possibly make, all the tenders of amity and affection we could use, our Plenipotentiary returned without the least hopes of peaceable dispositions in the Court of Spain; and our Admiral in the Mediterranean, finding also no tendency to amicable measures, was obliged to assist and protect the Emperor's Dominions by force, which were in imminent danger by the further invasion of the Kingdom of Sicily, and by the great fleets and armies which the King of Spain had in those parts.

To shew that the war was not purely on the Emperor's account, the Declaration set forth the seizing of the effects and persons of the English, in violation of treaties and antient privileges; and then touched upon the true motives of the war, the dishabing the King of Spain to unite the Crowns of France and Spain, or to assist the Pretender. Those were just motives, which though personal to King George, and the Duke of Orleans, yet were of the utmost concern to the Nations they governed.

Intrigues of Spain.

Cardinal Alberoni was not idle whilst measures were taken to crush him. He raised troops, fitted out ships, put the coasts in a posture of defence, sent succours to Sicily, and provided for the safety of Sardinia. But, what efforts soever Spain might make, he was sensible of the impossibility to resist the three most powerful States of Europe combined against him. To efforts therefore he joined plots and intrigues to support his undertakings. He began with the Duke of Orleans, believing, if he could remove him, the forces of France would be at his disposal, at least they would not be employed against him, and King George, deprived of so powerful an Ally, would be obliged to moderate his zeal for the Emperor's interests.

*Alberoni's
fratilities discovered in France.*

The plot was easy to be laid, and was so well conducted, that the success seemed infallible. France abounded with malecontents, and the Regent had many enemies who either wished his removal, or the execution of the late King's will. These malecontents, in order to be supported, had recourse to the Spanish Court, where the resentment against the Duke of Orleans procured them a favourable hearing. The Prince de Cellamare, the Spanish Ambassador at Paris, was ordered to treat with them. The plot was soon formed; Bishops, Magistrates, Nobles, Priests, Monks, Officers, and Governors, were ready for the undertaking, and were numbered among the Conspirators. The project was to seize the Regent in some party of pleasure, which he frequently made about Paris with his Mistresses, the King's person was at the same time to be secured, and proper orders were to be issued to the Governors of the Provinces and Towns to assemble the Parliaments, for settling the Government, whilst the States of the Kingdom should meet, and make a final determination of matters. Many papers were kept in a readiness to justify these undertakings, and encourage the people to support them.

The mines were charged and ready to spring, when the affair was discovered. The first advice came from King George, who warned the Regent of some attempt contriving against his Person and Government. This notice, though general only, was of great use. The Duke of Orleans and the Abbot du Bois were very vigilant. Several persons were suspected, particularly the Duke and Dutches of Maine, and the Spanish Ambassador, all whom were narrowly watched, till the whole affair was discovered by the following accident. The Prince de Cellamare, for the greater safety, entrusted his dispatches to the Abbot de Portocarrero, nephew of the Cardinal of that name, and to one of the sons of the Marquis de Monteleone. These Gentlemen (with only Sir Joseph Hodges who passed for an English Lord) set out from Paris in a Post-chaise. They had not gone above two leagues before the chaise broke down in a slough. The postilion observed, the Abbot shewed much more concern for his portmanteau than for himself, and heard him say, he would not have lost it for a hundred thousand pistoles. The postilion, having conducted them to the first stage, returned to Paris, and gave immediate notice to the Government, of what he had seen and heard. Upon which they were pursued and overtaken at Poitiers. Their persons were seized, and the portmanteau sent to Paris, wherein were found two letters which plainly discovered the plot. The Prince de Cellamare was put under a guard, and his papers were sealed up with his and the Regent's seals, to be delivered to the persons the King of Spain should send to receive them. A few days after the Prince was conducted to the frontiers of the Kingdom. The Marquis de Pampadour and several other persons of note were imprisoned. The Duke of Maine was sent prisoner to the Citadel of Dourlens in Picardy, and the Duchesse to the Castle of Dijon in Burgundy. The Cardinal de Polignac was ordered to his Abby of Aubin, that place being allowed him for his prison.

On the 29th of December, war was declared at Alberoni's Paris against Spain. The Declaration was accompanied with a long manifesto, shewing the causes of rupture between France and Spain, and concluding with the following paragraph, in relation to Cardinal Alberoni's plot: 'We now see with horror what it was that made the Minister of Spain inaccessible to all projects of peace. He would thereby have seen all the odious plots which he formed against us prove abortive: He would have lost all hopes of laying this Kingdom desolate, of raising up France against France, of having the management of Rebels among all the orders of State, of kindling a civil war in the bosom of our Provinces; and, in fine, of becoming to us the scourge of Heaven, by putting in execution those seditious projects, and springing that mine which was, according to the words of the Ambassador's letter, to serve as a prelude to the Conflagration. What a recompence is this to France, for the treasures and blood of which she has been so profuse for the sake of Spain!'

To support the reasons alledged in the manifesto, armaments were prepared in France and England. The beginning of January, an army 1718-19. of thirty-six thousand men were on the march towards Spain. Ships of war were fitted out for several expeditions. The barrenness of the Country where the war was to be carried occasioned great expences, especially for provisions. The Duke of Orleans was at some loss for a General: Marshal Villars, to whom he offered the command, refused it, affirming he would never draw his sword against the House of Bourbon, but the Duke of Berwick, not being so scrupulous, accepted of the command.

Cardinal Alberoni's intrigues were not confined to France, he had formed the same designs against King George. The Pretender was treated with, who readily came into the Cardinal's views to annoy his enemy. The Duke of Ormond repaired to Spain the latter end of the year, and measures were taken to stir up their friends in Great-Britain, and engage them to support the designs of Spain.

The Pope was doubtless in the secret, and his affection for the Chevalier de St. George hindered him from consenting, that he should be exposed, till it was seen what success the first attempt might have. He suffered him, however, to go into Spain. The Pretender was watched, and there was need of address to escape the vigilance of the Germans, who were spread over the Ecclesiastical State. He had lately left Urbino, where he resided, and was come to live at Rome. He went from thence on a sudden, and caused it to be reported, that he was gone to Bologna. He sent thither the Earls of Mar and Perth, with one Paterfon, who was to pass for their Master. This artifice was attended with the expected success: All three were arrested at Voghiera by the Imperialists, but presently after released. As for the Pretender, he came to Nettuno without any accident, and embarked for Cagliari, from whence he came to Roses in Catalonia, the beginning of March.

He was magnificently received at Madrid, where he entered in one of the King's coaches, attended by the Guards, and was conducted to the palace of Buen-retiro. On the morrow he was visited by the King, the Queen, the Prince of Asturias, and the Great Officers of the Crown, and complimented by them as King of Great-Britain. Upon his arrival, the Squadron, which had been fitting out some time for this expedition, sailed from Cadiz towards England, consisting of ten men of war and transport-ships, with six thousand regular troops on board, mostly Irish, with arms for ten or twelve thousand men. The Duke of Ormond was the conductor of this undertaking, with the title of Captain-General of the King of Spain: He was to publish, in the proper places, a declaration in that King's name, wherein he said, that for many very good reasons he had resolved to send part of his land and sea-forces into England and Scotland, to serve as auxiliaries to King James: What had confirmed him in his resolution, was the certain advices he had received, that many of the two Nations, notwithstanding their strong inclination to acknowledge that Prince for their Sovereign, durst not openly declare for him, because they did not see him supported by any of the States of Europe, who had either power or will to assist them: That, to remove this difficulty, and others that might arise, he declared he was determined to use all his power for the restoration of a Prince, to a Country belonging to him by undeniable right: That he hoped Providence would favour so just a cause; but, that the fear of ill success might not hinder any person from declaring readily for him, he promised a secure retreat in his Dominions, to all that should join him, and, in case they were forced to leave their Country, he declared, that every sea or land Officer should have the same rank as he enjoyed in Great-Britain, and the soldiers should be received and treated like his own.

These preparations had not been so secret, but the King had received timely notice to take the necessary precautions: The Duke of Orleans, in return for the same favour, had acquainted him with all he could discover. A proclamation was published against the Duke of Ormond, and the other Lords that were with him, with a reward of 5000*l.* for seizing the Duke, and of 1000*l.* for each of the rest, and of 500*l.* for every Gentleman.

As the rumour of the invasion increased, some forces were ordered into the North and into the West of England: The States-General had notice to have two thousand men ready to transport into England when occasion required; and were, at the same time, desired not to suffer the suspicious embarkations of ammunition and men that were making at Amsterdam, which they agreed to, notwithstanding the endeavours of the Spanish Ministers to the contrary. Above all, the naval armament against the Spanish Squadron was hastened; and, upon the repeated advices of the Regent, the King came to the House of Peers, and said, That he had given orders to the Lord-Chancellor to declare to both Houses a matter of the greatest importance. Upon this the Lord-Chancellor read the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"H A V I N G received from our good Brother and Ally, the most Christian King, repeated advices, that an Invasion will suddenly be attempted from Spain against my Dominions, in favour of the Pretender to my Crown, I have judged it convenient to make you acquainted with it, and shall, on my part, take all the necessary measures to defeat the designs of our enemies.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"This attempt, if it proceed, must engage me in some farther expences by sea and land than provision has been made for. I must therefore recommend it to you, that I be enabled in such manner, as you shall judge convenient, to make the necessary dispositions for our security; and you may depend upon it, that I shall upon this, and all other occasions, have as much regard to the ease of my people, as shall be consistent with their safety.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The many proofs, I have had of the affection and loyalty of this Parliament, leave me no room to doubt of your steady and vigorous perseverance in support of my Person and Government upon this occasion."

This speech had all the effect the King could expect or desire. Both Houses assured him of their 1718-19. their support; and the Commons desired him to augment his forces by sea and land, in such manner as he should think fit, promising to make good any increase of expence on that account. With these assurances of the Parliament, the King had the satisfaction to see his Allies exert their zeal in his defence. The States sent over the two thousand men; and the Marquis de Prié, Governor of the Austrian Netherlands, six battalions of Imperialists. The Duke of Orleans offered no less than twenty battalions, but it was not thought proper to accept his offer. These precautions taken by the King were very just, but, as it happened, they proved needless. The Spanish fleet came with a fair wind as far as Cape Finistere, when a violent storm arose, which lasted two days and two nights. The fleet was entirely dispersed, and disabled from pursuing their course. The Admiral's ship of sixty-four guns, having lost all her masts, made for the coast of Spain, as did all the rest in the best manner they could. By this storm, the men and horses were for the most part rendered unseizable.

The design of the Spaniards defeated.

Some Spaniards landed in Scotland.

Though the Spanish Squadron miscarried, two frigates arrived at Kintail in Scotland. These frigates sailed from Port-Passage the latter end of February, and came to Kintail the 16th of April, without having seen any of the Spanish fleet in their way. They brought with them the Earls of Seaforth and Marischal, and the Marquis of Tullibardine, with three hundred and seven Spaniards, being a detachment of twelve men in a company of Don Pedro de Castro's regiment of foot, commanded by a Lieutenant-Colonel, with six Captains, six Lieutenants, and as many Ensigns. They brought also arms for two thousand men. The Lieutenant-Colonel was assured there were ten thousand men in arms ready to join him, but, very few appearing, he kept the frigates two days, resolving to go off again, but he was at last prevailed with to let them sail. The two Earls and the Marquis, who had ventured themselves with so small a force, went with the Spaniards and joined the Rebels. After this junction, they possessed themselves of Donan-Castle, and put in it a garrison of fifty men; but Captain Boyle, in the Worcester, and some other ships came before the place, and took the garrison prisoners. In the mean time, General Wightman was ordered by the Lord Carpenter, to march with the forces under his command in quest of the Rebels. He marched from Inverness the beginning of June, and, having halted one day at the head of Lochness, came up with them at a place called the pafs of Glenfhill, which they gave out they were resolved to defend; but, upon the approach of the King's troops, they immediately deserted it, and retired to another pass called Stracbell, where they were more advantageously posted. The General, having viewed their situation, made the following disposition for the attack: On the right were posted all the Grenadiers under the command of Major Milbourn, being about a hundred and fifty in number, who were sustained by Mountague's regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Laurence, and a detachment of fifty men commanded by Colonel Harrison; the rest of the regiment being in garrison at Inverlochy. These were supported by Haffel's Dutch regiment, and four companies out of Amerongen's. This wing had fifty-six of Lord Strachmaver's men in the flank, under the command of Ensign Mackay; and the whole wing was commanded by Colonel Clayton, who acted as Brigadier upon this occasion. The left wing consisted of Clayton's regiment, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Reading, and had on the flank about fourscore men of the Monroes, under the command of Mr. Monroe of Calcairn. The Dragoons, which were a hundred and twenty in number, commanded by Major Robertson, and had made their march from Inverness without the loss of a single horse, or the least inconvenience, were ordered to keep the road, having four cohorts placed in their front. The Major-General himself was posted in the centre, where every one had free access to him for orders.

The Rebels forces consisted of one thousand six hundred and forty Highlanders, besides three hundred Spaniards, and a body of five hundred Highlanders, who were posted on a hill, in order to make themselves masters of the baggage of the King's troops, it being always one of their chief aims. From this disposition it is evident, that the King's forces actually engaged did not exceed eight hundred and fifty men, besides the one hundred and twenty Dragoons, and one hundred and thirty-six Highlanders. The left wing was ordered to begin the attack; and the Rebels always, as they had fired their muskets, skipping off, and never venturing to come to a close engagement, were driven from rock to rock, the King's forces chasing them above three hours, till they gained the top of the hill, where the Rebels were immediately dispersed. The Earl of Seaforth and Lord George Murray were wounded. There were twenty-one men killed, and an hundred and twenty-one wounded. Officers included, of the King's troops, who lay on their arms all night, in order to bring off the wounded; and marched the next morning to Glenfhill, where about two in the afternoon the Spaniards surrendered themselves prisoners at discretion, and delivered up all their arms and ammunition. Their Commander said, the Earl of Seaforth and all the rest were shifting for themselves, and believed, they would endeavour to get off as soon as possible at the sea-port towns, where they could hope to have friends to let them escape. General Wightman acquainted the Lord Carpenter, that he had taken two hundred and seventy-four Spaniards prisoners, and was making a tour through the difficult part of Seaforth's Country, to terrify the guilty, and preserve the well affected, and that he had utterly dispersed the Rebels, the chiefs of whom, Seaforth, Tullibardine, Marischal, and others, were gone off to the Lewis or Orkney Islands. Thus ended Cardinal Alberoni's enterprize upon Great-Britain (1).

When

(1) A marriage was this year agreed upon for the Pretender, with a Daughter of Prince Sobieski, eldest Son of John Sobieski King of Poland, who had gained so much honour by raising the siege of Vienna. But the Court of Vienna thought fit to interest itself so much in preventing this intended marriage, that the Princess was stopped in passing through Tirol into Italy, and carried into confinement at Inspruck. Great application

1718-19. When the King sent the message to both Houses about the Spanish Invasion, the Lords were debating upon the famous Peerage bill. This bill, by which the number of Peers was to be limited, is said to have been chiefly intended to put a restraint on the Prince of Wales, when his Succession should take place, from whom the present Ministry could expect but little favour. Be this as it will, the Whigs had exclaimed against the numerous promotion of the Peers by Queen Anne, particularly the creation of twelve Peers at once, in order to gain a superiority in the House of Lords, and, to prevent the like for the future, it was resolved to bring in a bill to fix the number of Peers (1). The person by whom this bill was moved for, was the Duke of Somerset, who, on the last day of February, represented in the House of Lords, that, the number of Peers being of late years very much increased, especially since the Union of the two Kingdoms, it seemed absolutely necessary to fix the same, both to preserve the dignity of the Peerage, and to prevent the inconveniences, that may attend the creation of a great number of Peers to serve a present purpose; of which they had a remarkable instance in the late Reign. He therefore made a motion for the bringing in a bill to settle and limit the Peerage in such a manner, that the number of English Peers should not be enlarged beyond six above the present number, which upon failure of male issue might be supplied by new creations; and that, instead of the sixteen elective Peers, twenty-five should be made hereditary on the part of Scotland, whose number upon failure of heirs male should be supplied by some other Scottish Peers. The Duke of Argyle (who was now Lord Steward of the Household) seconded this motion, which was also supported by the Earls of Sunderland and Carlisle, before they came to any resolution; and thereupon his Lordship, the Earl of Oxford, excepted against it, and said, 'as it tended to take away the brightest gem from the Crown, it was matter of wonder to see it supported by those, who, by the great employments they enjoyed, seemed under the strictest obligation to take care of the Royal Prerogative. That therefore there must be a secret meaning in this motion; but for his own part, though he expected nothing from the Crown, yet he would never give his vote for lopping off so valuable a branch of the prerogative, because this would put it out of the power of the Crown to reward merit and virtuous actions.' To this the Earl of Sunderland answered, 'that, though the number of Peers were limited, yet the Crown should still be the fountain of honour, and preserve its prerogative of creating new Peers upon the extinction of old titles for want of male issue, which happened frequently; and that those extinctions would give the Prince on the Throne sufficient opportunities to bestow honours upon Commoners of distinguished merit and abilities.' The debate being adjourned to the 2d of March, upon that day, Earl Stanhope delivered to a full House the following message from the King:

George R.

'His Majesty being informed, that the House of Peers have under consideration the state of the Peerage of Great-Britain, is graciously pleased to acquaint this House, that he has so much

application was made to the Emperor for her release; but he continued inflexible, and seemed the more to extend his authority in this affair, as the whole Family of Sobieski lay under great and uncommon obligations to him, on account of pensions and considerable allowances, which they received from him, in acknowledgment of the great services of the late King of Poland to the Empire. Prince James Sobieski, Father of this young Princess, held his subsistence chiefly at the Emperor's pleasure. On this occasion he went therefore to Vienna, to make his submission to the Emperor, whom he understood to be highly displeased with him; but his Imperial Majesty would be no ways reconciled to him, or agree to a continuance of his customary allowance upon any other terms, but his intirely breaking off the match.

Whilst intercession was making for her liberty, the Princess Sobieski escaped from her confinement in the beginning of May, in man's cloaths, and, repairing to Bologna, was there married by proxy to the Pretender, then in Spain. A few days after she went to Rome, where she was very kindly entertained by the Pope and some of the Cardinals. She seemed impatient to be conducted to her Spouse; but the hazard of the present conjuncture, and the uncertainty of his residence, till his projects were brought to some crisis, made the Pope continue her under his care at Rome. No other opportunity of correspondence could therefore be obtained but by letters; and, about the latter end of June, an account was brought to England of one Maffey, who was sent from Rome with dispatches from Her to the Pretender and Cardinal Alberoni; and, quickly after, Earl Cadogan had notice of a person of the same name in Holland, with letters and papers of consequence; whereupon, at his instances, Maffey's lodgings were searched, and his person and papers secured.

1718-19. at heart the settling the Peerage of the whole Kingdom upon such a foundation, as may secure the freedom and constitution of Parliaments in all future ages, that he is willing, that his prerogative stand not in the way of so great and necessary a work.

A motion being made for an address of thanks for this message, the Earl of Nottingham excepted against it, saying, It was unusual for the King to take notice of any thing depending in Parliament, before the same was laid before him in a Parliamentary way. But the Duke of Bucks over-ruled this objection, and said, It could not be supposed, that the King alone should be ignorant of what every body else knew; and that since his Majesty was pleased, for the good of his subjects, to suffer his prerogative to be restrained, they ought readily to accept, and thankfully acknowledge, so great and so gracious a condescension. Upon this the address was agreed to, and the debate was put off to the next day; when the Earl of Sunderland, in a long speech, ran over the several changes, that had happened in the Peerage since the Reign of Queen Elizabeth to this time; urged the necessity of limiting the number of Peers; and proposed the Duke of Somerset's scheme with relation both to the English and Scots Peers. Earl Cowper in answer to this speech endeavoured to shew, 'That what was intended to be done with relation to the Scots Peerage was a manifest violation of the treaty of Union, and the highest piece of injustice; for it was no less than to deprive persons of their right without being heard, and without any pretence of forfeiture on their part; urging, that the Scots Peers, who should be excluded from the number of the twenty-five hereditary, would be in a worse condition than any other subjects, since they would be neither electing nor elected, nor representing, nor represented, which could not fail of raising dangerous discontents amongst them. That besides it would be a breach of trust in those, who represented the Scots Peerage, wholly to divest their principals of a power, with which they had intrusted them only for a few years: And therefore he was of opinion, that the Scots Peers ought to have been consulted, before any steps were made in so nice and so important an affair.' These objections were answered by the Earls of Sunderland, Stanhope, and Cadogan, the Dukes of Bucks and Newcastle, the Bishop of Gloucester, and some other English Lords, who were supported by several Scots Peers, particularly the Dukes of Roxburgh and Montrose, the Marquis of Annandale, and the Earl of Illy. In the first place, it was alledged, 'That the settling the Peerage, in the manner proposed, was rather a benefit than a disadvantage to the Scots Peerage, whose Representatives were thereby increased by nine, and all made hereditary: And as for those Peers, who, for the present, would be excluded, they would afterwards have a chance to come in, upon failure of any of the twenty-five: That this regulation could not be looked upon as a violation of the Union, two things only being made unalterable fundaments of that contract, Religion, and the Proportion of public Taxes: That the consulting of the Scots Peers in this affair, would be altogether improper and unparliamentary, and attended with great inconveniences. The Earl of Illy in particular represented, That the bringing in a number of Peers into that House, by election, was certainly derogatory to the dignity of that August Assembly, and of the highest Tribunal in the united Kingdoms: And therefore he had long before wished to see this defect in the Union rectified, and the Scots Peers freed from that ignominious mark of distinction, which made them be looked upon as dependant on the Court and Ministry, and not at liberty to vote like the other Members, for the good and interest of their Country.' The Earl of Nottingham, the Lord Townshend, and some other Peers, declared, 'That they were not against the settling and limiting the Peerage, but only against the doing it in such a manner, as, in their opinion, was unjust, and might be attended with dangerous consequences.' But, after a long debate, resolutions agreeable to the Duke of Somerset's motion was agreed to, and the Judges were ordered to prepare and bring in the bill (1).

As this affair had made a great noise, and alarmed, not only the generality of the Scots Peers, but also many of the English Commons, a Pamphlet, said to be written by Mr. Benson, called the Plebeian, was published against the bill, which was answered by Mr. Addison, in his paper called the Old Whig. In these papers, the chief arguments, on both sides of that important Dispute about the Peerage-bill.

(1) The resolutions about the Scots Peers were these six:

I. That, in lieu of the sixteen elective Peers to sit in this House on the part of Scotland, twenty-five Peers, to be declared by his Majesty, shall have hereditary Seats in Parliament, and be the Peers on the part of the Peerage of Scotland.

II. That such twenty-five Peers shall be declared by his Majesty, before the next Session of Parliament.

III. That nine of the said twenty-five shall be appointed by his Majesty to have immediate right to such hereditary seats in Parliament, subject to the qualifications requisite by the laws now in being.

IV. That none of the remaining sixteen, so to be declared by his Majesty, or their heirs, shall become sitting Peers of the Parliament of Great-Britain, till after the determination of this present Parliament, except such as are of the number of the sixteen Peers now sitting in Parliament on the part of Scotland and their heirs.

V. That if any of the twenty-five Peers, so to be declared by his Majesty, and their heirs, shall fail, some one or other of the Peers of Scotland shall be appointed by his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, to succeed every such Peer so failing, and every Peer so appointed shall be one of the Peers on the part of the Peerage of Scotland, in the Parliament of Great-Britain, and so, toties quoties, as often as any such failure shall happen.

VI. That the hereditary right of sitting in Parliament, which shall accrue to the twenty-five Peers of Scotland, to be declared by his Majesty, shall be so limited, as not to descend to females.

The Resolutions concerning the English Peers (which were agreed to the next day) were these five:

I. That the number of Peers of Great-Britain, on the part of England, shall not be enlarged, without precedent right, beyond six above what they are at present: But, as any of the said present Peers, or such fix new Peers, in case they be created, shall fail, their number 1718-19. portant question, are largely and fully displayed (1).

The Peerage bill dropped. Whilst the public was in expectation of the issue of this affair, a sudden stop was put to all farther proceedings. Earl Stanhope, when the bill came to be read the third time, made a speech, wherein he observed, 'That this bill had made a great noise, and raised strange apprehensions: And since the design of it had been so misrepresented, and so misunderstood, that it was like to meet with great opposition in the other House, he thought it advisable to let the matter lie still till a more proper opportunity.' Upon this, the third reading was put off a fortnight, by which means the bill was dropped for this Session: For the King, four days after, came to the House of Peers, and put an end to the Session with the following speech, which the Lord-Chancellor read to both Pr. H. C. Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I AM now come to put an end to this Session, in which you have shewn many great and seasonable proofs of your duty and affection to my Person and Government, and of your care for the safety and welfare of your Fellow-subjects.

By the blessing of God on our endeavours, we have hitherto disappointed the ill designs of our enemies, who flattered themselves with success from our unhappy divisions.

We perceive, by the rash and wicked counsels which have lately prevailed in the Court of Spain, that the desperate and extravagant projects of one ambitious man, though not capable of giving fears to their neighbours, may occasion to them some expence and trouble.

That Court being influenced by counsels odious and destructive to the Spaniards, who find themselves neglected and oppressed, after having endeavoured to foment conspiracies and seditions both here and in France, and stooped to practices unusual, accompanied by manifestoes of a stile unheard of among great Princes, has at last proceeded to acknowledge the Pretender.

As this news has given great surprize to all Europe, I question not, but it will be received by every good Briton with indignation and contempt.

It is our happiness, at this juncture, to find ourselves assisted by the greatest powers in Europe against an enemy, that has no Allies, but those, who would betray the Government, under which they live, and are protected.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I thank you very heartily for the Supplies you have granted me this year. The manner, in which you have raised them, without any new burden to my people, the great addition you have made to the fund for sinking the debts of the Nation, the discharge of the Exchequer bills, and the provisions you have made to pay whatever remains justly due to foreign States and Princes, are the strongest proofs of your wisdom, as well as of your zeal for my Service, and the good of your Country. You may observe, I have hitherto been very cautious of making use of the power you have given me, to increase our forces by sea and land. If our enemies should oblige me to a greater expence, it shall be employed for your service. This is what the trust you reposed in me requires at my hands, and what I owe to so dutiful and affectionate a House of Commons.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

There being nothing more desirable, at all times, than a firm Union between Protestants, I reflect with satisfaction upon the law you have passed this Session, which will, I hope, prove effectual to that purpose. As it is a signal instance of moderation and indulgence in our established Church, so I hope it will beget such a return of gratitude from all Dissenting Protestants, as will greatly tend to her honour and security, both which I shall ever have near at heart.

I have always looked upon the glory of a Sovereign, and the liberty of a Subject, as inseparable; and think it is the peculiar happiness of a British King, to reign over a free people. As the civil rights, therefore, and privileges of all my subjects, and especially of my two Houses of Parliament, do justly claim my most tender concern; if any provision designed to perpetuate these blessings to your Posterity remains imperfect, for want of time, during this Session, maturely to discuss and settle matters of so great importance, I promise myself, you will take the first opportunity to render my wishes for your happiness compleat and effectual, and to strengthen the Union, which is of so much consequence to the welfare of this Kingdom.

number may be supplied by new creations of Commons, natural born subjects of this Kingdom. and so, zates quies, as often as such failure shall happen.

II. That no person be at any time hereafter created a Peer by writ, nor any Peerage granted by Patent for any longer estate than for the grantee, and the heirs male of his body.

III. That there be not any restraint on the Crown to create any of the Princes of the Blood Peers of Great-Britain, with right to sit in Parliament.

IV. That, whenever any of the Lords now sitting in Parliament, whose sons have been called by writ, shall die, then it shall be lawful for his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, to create a Peer to supply the number so lessened.

V. That every creation of a Peer hereafter to be made contrary to these resolutions shall be null and void to all intents and purposes.

(1) The Plebian has the following expressions: 'The greatest Traitor to civil society, that ever yet appeared, will be the man, if such a one can be found, who shall contend for such a bill, should it be proposed among the Commons, with the assurance in his pocket of being a Peer, as soon as the bill passes. And should he succeed, which God forbid, that honour, which is to be the reward of so base a treachery, will be a lasting mark of infamy to the family that bears it, whilst any notion of honour remains among mankind.'

Mr. Benson was soon after removed from his post of Surveyor-General of his Majesty's works, and was succeeded by Sir Thomas Huet.

" If the circumstances of my affairs shall allow " of my going abroad this summer, I shall take " the same care of your interests, as if I remain" ed here. The many Negotiations, which " will be on foot, to restore the peace of the " North, in which the trade and tranquillity of " this Kingdom may be very much concerned,
 " will make my presence there of great use to " these my Dominions. And, as in that case I
 " design, by the blessing of God, to meet you
 " early next winter, I will only recommend to " you most earnestly, that, laying aside all ani-
 " mosities, you would, in your several Coun" ties and Stations, use your utmost endeavours " to preserve the public peace, and see a due
 " execution of the laws."

After this speech, the Parliament was prorogued to the 19th of May; and afterwards, by several prorogations, to the 23d of November (1).

The King
 goes to Ha-novver.

Soon after the prorogation, the King declared his intention of going to Hanover, and appointed for Lords Justices, in his absence, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor Parker, the Dukes of Kingston, Argyle (now also Greenwich) Newcastle, Bolton, Marlborough, and Roxburgh, the Earls Sunderland, Berkeley, and Stanhope, and Secretary Craggs. The Prince and Princess of Wales, not being appointed Regents, retired into the Country, and appeared no more till the King's departure, a few days after which they came to St. James's to see the young Princesses, who kept a levee twice a week: And to them it was, that the Lords Justices, and a numerous appearance of foreign Ministers, Nobility, and Gentry, made their compliments on the King's birth-day, who was entered into the sixtieth year of his age.

As the King thought his presence in Germany necessary to forward the many Negotiations that were on foot, he set out the 11th of May, and, after a short passage of seventeen hours, arrived in Holland. With the King embarked Earl Stanhope, the Dukes of Munster (now Dukes of Kendal) and the Lord and Lady How, with some others. The King staid two days at Ofnaburg, and came to Herenhausen, the 18th of May.

He makes peace with Sweden.

The death of the King of Sweden having removed the chief obstacle to the peace of the North, the King turned his thoughts first that way. The new Queen, who had succeeded her Brother Charles XII, as well as the whole Nation, were desirous of peace; drained of men and money, they were unable to make war:
 Almost the whole army, led by the late King to the fatal expedition of Norway, miserably perished. But it was not sufficient to give peace to Sweden, it was necessary also to disarm her other enemies, and bound their pretensions. These enemies were the Czar, and the Kings of Denmark, Prussia, and Poland. King George, displeased with the Czar, whom he suspected of having entered into all the projects which had been formed against him, resolved to keep no measures with him. He began with a sincere reconciliation with Sweden, then endeavoured to soften the King of Denmark, and induce the two others to proceed with great moderation, to acknowledge him for Mediator, and join with him, if necessary, to compel the Czar to accept of equitable conditions.

The Duke of Orleans, in concert with King George, had offered his mediation to Sweden for a reconciliation with that Prince. The offer was accepted, and, in July, a provisional treaty was signed, by which a peace was to be concluded as soon as possible, agreeable to the plan, and terms agreed upon with the Mediator. This was punctually performed, and in November, the Sieur de Bassewitz, Minister of his Britannic Majesty, as Duke and Elector of Brunswick, signed the peace with the Plenipotentiaries of Queen Ulrica.

By this treaty Sweden gave up for ever, to the Royal and Electoral House of Hanover, the Duchies of Bremen and Verden, with all their rights and dependencies, according to the treaty of Osnaburg, of the 23d of October, 1648, by virtue of which the Kings of Sweden had enjoyed them. On the other hand, the Elector of Hanover engaged to continue to his new subjects their rights, privileges, effects, and religion; and to discharge the engagements of his predecessors in those Duchies. Moreover, he obliged himself to pay to the Queen of Sweden a million of Rix Dollars at two payments; the first before the signing of the treaty; the second, five or six weeks after the exchange of the ratifications.
 He engaged likewise to renew, both as King of Great-Britain, and Elector of Hanover, the Alliances formerly established with his Predecessors and the Kingdom of Sweden. Lastly, the treaty of Westphalia was renewed with a reservation of demanding and accepting the guaranty of the Emperor, and, according to circumstances, of some other powers.

At the same time the Lord Carteret, Ambasador Plenipotentiary from Great Britain to the Court of Sweden, was employed to negotiate the confirmation of this treaty of peace, by an Alliance between the two Crowns, still under the mediation and guaranty of France. But this Alliance was not concluded till the next year, as will be related.

These Negotiations with the Queen of Sweden were not the most difficult; she readily agreed to a peace, and considered it as the ground of her safety, and the end of her miseries. But it was not the same either with the King of Denmark or the Czar, who looked upon these Negotiations as the ruin of their schemes, and an obstacle to their conquests. As for King Augustus, he entered intirely into the views of the King of Great-Britain, and was contented with being acknowledged King of Poland; he did not even require, that the interests of his Competitor should

The King of Prussia was a little more difficult; but he complied at last, and, accepting the mediation of Great-Britain, granted a suspension of arms till the conclusion of the peace.

The King of Denmark had made great preparations for an expedition against Sweden, which he was to execute in person: He had already had some success, but of a sudden he desisted, and, consenting to a suspension of arms for six months, accepted of the mediation of France and Great-Britain, and, after numberless disputes, gave way to the instances of the Mediators, and accepted of a sum of money by way of satisfaction for the conquests, which he was obliged to restore. The Czar was the only Prince who would not comply, but sent his fleet to the Scheuron or Baffes of Sweden, where twelve or fifteen thousand Muscovites landed, and made a dreadful ravage. The English fleet, which, under Sir John Norris, was in those seas, to support the Negotiations, had orders to treat the Russian fleet, as Admiral Byng had done that of Spain; but the Czar recalled his fleet, and prevented the blow. Thus stood affairs in the North; it was time now to see what was done in the Mediterranean this summer.

Whilst Admiral Byng and the Viceroy of Naples were waiting for the return of Count Hamilton, whom they had agreed to send to Vienna, to represent the posture of affairs, and bring back the final resolutions of that Court concerning the operations of the war, the Admiral sailed to Port-Mabon to refit his squadron (1).

Signor Patinho had hitherto resided in Messina, directing the affairs of the Island for the interest of his Master with great prudence; but, his presence being wanted at the Court of Spain, he embarked on board a Felucca, on the 16th of January in the night, and put to sea, attended by two gallees. If the darkness had continued an hour longer, he would have undoubtedly fallen into the mouths of two of the English cruisers, which chafed his gallees into a bay near Palermo; but the Felucca escaped, and landed him in Italy, from whence he proceeded to Madrid, and, by his counsels and industry, all methods were used for supporting their army in Sicily with recruits of men, and all necessities of war. The Venetians and Genoese, and even the French Consuls in the ports of Italy, notwithstanding the severe prohibitions of the Regent, were corrupted to give them all the assistance possible; and, though many vessels were taken, many escaped. As to the French, Admiral Byng found himself under a difficulty how to treat the ships of a Nation, that was in strict Alliance with England. He made loud complaints of their partiality, till at last the Regent gave him leave to confiscate all those he met with in the service of Spain, which put some stop to their clandestine proceedings (2).

Admiral Byng, having refitted most of his squadron at Port-Mabon, hastened away from thence with four men of war the 30th of March, leaving the rest to follow him, and arrived the 4th of April at Naples, where he hoped to find the army from Hungary arrived, and in a readiness to embark; but, contrary to his expectations, he saw every thing in extreme backwardness, partly for want of money.

On the 23d of April, Count de Mercy arrived at Naples from Vienna, to take upon him the command of the whole army. He was a native of Lorraine, but brought up in the Emperor's service, where he had risen to the rank of General of the horse. He was of a tall graceful presence, with a very soldierlike appearance, but had the misfortune of being short-sighted, almost to purblindness. He had great strength of body

Patinho returns to Spain.

(1) Captain Matthews being left with a squadron at Penetelia, to observe Rear-Admiral Cammuck, and hinder his escaping out of Messina to the Southward, had the good fortune to run one of them ashore, a ship of sixty-four guns, called the S^{te} Roselia; and another called the St. Pedro of sixty guns was cast away in Tarento-Bay. Cammuck himself, endeavouring to get away to Spain in a small frigate of twenty-two guns, was chased the 6th of February by a ship of Captain Matthews's squadron, and escaped with much difficulty in his boat to Catania, but the frigate was taken, with all his effects and papers, amongst which was a commission from the Pretender, appointing him Admiral of the white squadron.

This unhappy man was a native of Ireland, and, being bred up at sea, had raised himself to the post of a Captain, and served in Queen Anne's war, with no bad character. But associating himself with those who were enemies to the House of Hanover, and becoming obnoxious to the Government, on the Accession of that Family to the Crown, he abandoned his Country, and entered into the service of Spain, where he was promoted to the rank of a Rear-Admiral, and served in that post in the expedition against Sicily. He had never been noted to want courage, but, in the action of Passaro, he ran away among the first, and escaped to Malta, affording an instance, how much a consciousness of guilt and dread of punishment depresses the heart, more than the fear of an enemy. He was a vain boasting man, with a roving unsettled head, filled with airy schemes and projects, without any judgment or discretion.

No. 95. Vol. IV.

He assured Signor Patinho, that he could put most of the English fleet into his hands, in recompence for that which he had lost; and, in that senseless confidence, wrote a letter to the Admiral, to let him know, that he had the Pretender's commands to assure him, if he would bring over the greatest part of his fleet to Messina, or to any port in Spain, he would create him Duke of Abemarle, with a Royal Bounty of one hundred thousand pounds to support the honour and dignity of that rank; and that every Captain should have ten thousand pounds, and the seamen a gratuity of two months wages. That Signor Patinho would satisfy him of the King of Spain's security for the performance of this agreement, and that no body else but the Dukes of Ormond and Mar were in the secret. Whether he wrote by direction or not, does not appear, but the letter met with the contempt it deserved. He likewise sent another letter to Captain Watson, with the promise of a reward of ten thousand pounds, a Commission of Admiral of the Blue, and to be made an English Peer, if he would bring his ships into Messina, which the honest Captain brought to the Admiral, with vehement expressions of abhorrence and indignation.

(2) Mr. Corbet mentions here an instance or two of the unfair practice of other Nations at this time upon the English trade, and which, it is apprehended, will always be the case, whenever England is engaged in foreign wars. The Admiral having intelligence from Genoa, that a privateer of twenty-four guns had been fitted out by French Merchants of that place, and was cruising with a Spanish Commission off of Cape Corse, and mind, and was indefatigable in the use of both, when necessary. He was full of fire, and his conversation abounded with wit and humour. He had great skill in courting and caring persons, when he wanted to gain any point, but, at other times, his behaviour discovered much haughtiness. He had an insatiable thirst for glory, which was seconded by a bold and most resolute temper, always headed his troops himself, and seemed to have a sort of passion for fighting. He was seldom in any action but he was wounded, and was not esteemed a fortunate Officer. He despised an enemy too much, was impatient for engaging, and had the character of not caring what men he sacrificed to obtain his purpose, when a few days patience might perhaps have succeeded as well without it; which opinion made the soldiers uneasy under him, as they were in continual apprehensions of being led to the slaughter. Upon the whole, as he had great parts, and great experience of service, he must have made a great General (as he was a complete fine Gentleman) if he had had a cooler temper, or could have commanded it better. But with all his faults he was certainly in the superior rank of men, of which there needs no better proof, than that he was a favourite of Prince Eugene. He was now going to encounter an old school-fellow in the Marquis de Lede, who was a Fleming by birth, and a good General under a quite opposite character, being as different from the other in person, as he was in temper. He was of a low misshapen stature, not affable nor open in his disposition, but much esteemed for his judgment and prudence, and was of great military experience too. He was as cautious and circumspect, as the other was bold and enterprising; and, in this respect, both seemed to be in their proper employment, the one in a situation of defence, and the other of attack. It was thought, that, in the course of this war, he slipped some opportunities, which the oversight, or wants of the Germans, gave him of acting upon them to advantage; but, he considered, that he was in a Country, where he was shut up from receiving any considerable supplies of men, while the enemy poured in what numbers they pleased, and that any large diminution
